First Edition, planned and edited by Sir GEORGE GROVE, D.C.L., in four volumes, with an Appendix edited by J. A. Fuller-Maitland, and an Index by Mrs. Edmond
Wodehouse, 1878, 1880, 1883, 1889.
Second Edition, edited by J. A. FULLER-MAITLAND, in five volumes, 1900.

L

L. H. (abbr. for Eng., left hand; Ger., linke Hand). This is often used in pianoforte, organ or harp music where the notation does not of itself make it clear that a certain note, chord or passage is to be played by the left hand.

LA. The sixth note of the major scale and first of the minor in the nomenclature of France and Italy.

LA BARRE, Michel de (b. Paris, c. 1674; d. Paris, c. 1744).

French flautist and composer. He was royal chamber musician and composed opera-ballets, trios, duets, solos and suites for flute, songs, etc. E. v. d. s.

LA BASSÉE, Adam de (b. La Bassée, ?; d. Lille, 25 Feb. 1286).

Netherlands ecclesiastic, poet and composer. Nothing is known of his biography except that he was canon at the collegiate church of Saint-Pierre at Lille towards the end of his life. He wrote in Latin rhymed prose and composed 'Chants liturgiques', adapting old church melodies as well as dance-tunes and trouvère songs for the setting of his words and recommending "the sound of the timbrel, the hurdy-gurdy and a psalter as well as songs and sweet consorts of voices". The 'Chants liturgiques' were republished in facsimile by the Abbé D. Charnel in the 'Messager des sciences historiques' (Ghent, 1858). E. v. d. s., rev.

LABBANÂTU (Instrument). See BABYLONIAN MUSIC.

L'ABBÉ. French family of musicians, whose real name was Saint-Sevin. The two elder members, who were brothers and both obliged to wear ecclesiastical dress on account of their church employment, thus became known as "L'Abbé l'aîné", or simply "L'Abbé", and "L'Abbé le cadet" respectively; and this name remained with them until their deaths and even passed on to the next generation.

(1) Pierre Philippe Saint-Sevin L'Abbé (b. ?; d. ?, 15 May 1768), violoncellist. He was music master at the church of Saint-Caprais at Agen early in the 18th century. In 1727 he gave up that post and went to Paris, where he obtained an engagement as violoncellist at the Opéra.

(2) Pierre Saint-Sevin L'Abbé (b. ?; d. ?, Mar. 1777), violoncellist. He also held a church post at Agen, but followed his brother to Paris in 1730, joining him in the Opéra orchestra. He seems to have been one of the cleverest violoncellists of his time, remarkable for his beautiful tone.

(3) Joseph Barnabé Saint-Sevin L'Abbé (b. Agen, 11 June 1727; d. Paris, 25 July 1803¹), violinist, nephew of the preceding, son of (1). He was a pupil of his father and became a musical prodigy, entering the orchestra of the Comédie-Française when only twelve years of age. He afterwards studied with J. M. Leclair. Admitted as violinist at the Opéra on 1 May 1742 (La Borde) or 1743, he retired after twenty years' service and devoted his time to the teaching profession and to composition. The musical gifts of "L'Abbé le fils", as he was called, were highly appreciated by contemporary opinion. He played at the Concert Spirituel from 1741 to 1755. Owing to the particularly high standard of his technique, he largely contributed to the development of violin execution in France. An interesting innovation of his was the writing out of cadenzas.

His works (9 printed numbers) consist of 2 books of violin sonatas with continuo (1748–c. 1764), symphonies for 3 violins and continuo (c. 1754), 5 collections of airs arranged for 1 and 2 violins, with variations, etc., and a pedagogic work, 'Les Principes du violon' (1761). M. L. P.

LA BEAUSSE, ? (b. ?; d. ?).

French 15th-century composer. A chanson of his is preserved at Oxford, Bodl. Can. misc. 213, and published in part by Dannemann.

LABEY, Marcel (b. Le Vésinet, Seine-et-Oise, 6 Aug. 1875).

French conductor and composer. He studied the pianoforte with Breitner and Delaborde in Paris, harmony with R. Lenormand, and counterpoint and composition with d'Indy at the Schola Cantorum. In 1902 he became Secretary of the Société Nationale de Musique, being responsible for the organization of its concerts. In the following year he was appointed to assist d'Indy with the orchestra class at the Schola Cantorum, and in this capacity he conducted numerous concerts both in Paris and in the provinces. In 1907-14 he was professor of the advanced class for pianoforte there. On the death of d'Indy in 1931 he became Vice-Principal of the Schola Cantorum, and in 1935 of the École César Franck. He directed the orchestra class and the conductors' class, and was also responsible for the concerts given by the school.

As a composer Labey must be regarded as one of d'Indy's disciples. He has written a dramatic work in three acts, 'Bérangère' (1912), which was selected as a prize-winner at the Concours de la Ville de Paris in 1921, but he is, in spite of this, more interested in symphonic music than in dramatic. Among his works are 'Fantaisie' for orchestra, 'Symphony No. 1' (first performed in 1904 under Cortot), 'Symphony No. 2' (performed at the Lamoureux concerts, Angers, Nancy, etc.), 'Lied' for cello and orchestra (1921), 'Overture pour un drame' (Lamoureux, 1921); 'Suite champêtre' for orchestra (1923); 'Symphony No. 3' (Poulet concerts, 1934); two Sonatas for violin and pianoforte (1905 and 1924); a pianoforte Quartet, a string Quartet (1919), two Trios; a Quintet for strings and pianoforte; numerous pieces for pianoforte, songs, choruses, etc. All these have been frequently performed both in France and elsewhere.

E. B. (ii).

LABITZKY. German-Bohemian family of musicians.

(1) Josef Labitzky (b. Schönfeld, Eger, 4 July 1802; d. Carlsbad, 18 Aug. 1881), violinist and composer. He was grounded in music by Veit of Bečov (Petschau). In 1820 he became first violin in the band at Marienbad and in 1821 removed to a similar position at Carlsbad. He then formed an orchestra of his own, and made tours in southern Germany. Feeling his deficiencies, he took a course of composition under Winter at Munich, and in 1827 he published his first dances there. In 1835 he settled at Carlsbad as director of the band, making journeys from St. Petersburg on the one hand to London on the other and becoming every day more famous, both as a performer and as a composer of dance music.

Labitzky's dances are full of rhythm and spirit. Among his waltzes, the 'Sirenen', 'Grenzboten', 'Aurora', 'Carlsbader' and 'Lichtensteiner' are good. In galops he fairly rivalled Lanner and Strauss, though he had not the poetry of those two composers.

(2) August Labitzky (b. Bečov, 22 Oct. 1832; d. Reichenhall, 28 Aug. 1903), violinist and conductor, son of the preceding. He became associated with his father as director of the band at Carlsbad in 1853.

(3) Wilhelm Labitzky (b. ? Carlsbad, c. 1836; d. ? Toronto, ?), violinist, brother of the preceding. He was an excellent player, but emigrated to Canada, where he settled at Toronto.

There was also a sister of (2) and (3), who was a favourite singer at Frankfort o/M.

F. G.

LABLACHE, Luigi (b. Naples, 6 Dec. 1794; d. Naples, 23 Jan. 1858).

Italian bass singer of French descent. His father, Nicolas Lablache, a merchant of Marseilles, had left France in consequence of the Revolution in 1791. His mother was Irish. The father died in 1799, but the family was patronized by Joseph Buonaparte, and Luigi was placed in the Naples Conservatorio della Pietà dei Turchini at the age of twelve. Gentilli taught him the elements of music and Valesi instructed him in singing; at the same time he studied the violin and cello under other masters. At this period his boy's voice was a beautiful contralto; his last use of it was to sing, as it was just breaking, the solos in Mozart's Requiem on the death of Haydn in 1809. Before many months were passed he became possessed of a magnificent bass, with a compass of two octaves, from E_b to e_b'.

Continually dominated by the desire to appear on the stage, the youth made his escape from the Conservatory no less than five times, only to be brought back in disgrace. To these escapades was due, however, the institution of a little theatre within the Conservatory, and Lablache was satisfied for a time.

Having at length completed his musical education, Lablache was engaged at the San Carlino Theatre at Naples, as buffo napoletano, in 1812, though then only eighteen. He made his début in Fioravanti's 'La molinara'. A few months later he married Teresa Pinotti, the daughter of an actor engaged at the theatre. His young wife persuaded him, not without difficulty, to quit the San Carlino to recommence serious study of singing, and to give up the dialect in which he had hitherto sung and spoken. Accordingly, a year later, after a short engagement at Messina, he went as primo basso cantante to the Opera at Palermo. His first appearance was in Pavesi's 'Ser Marc-Antonio', and his success was so great as to decide him to stay at Palermo for nearly five years. But the administration of the Teatro alla Scala at Milan engaged him in 1817, and he made his début as Dandini in Rossini's 'Cenerentola' with great success.

It is said that at Naples he had enjoyed the great advantage of the society and counsels of Mme Méricofre, a banker's wife, known in Italy before her marriage as La Coltellini. To such influence as this, and to that of his intelligent wife, Lablache perhaps owed some of the impulse which prompted him to continue to study; but much must have been due to his own desire for improvement.

In 1821 the opera 'Elisa e Claudio' was written for him by Mercadante; his position was made, and his reputation spread throughout Europe. From Milan he went to Turin, returned to Milan in 1822, then appeared at Venice and in 1824 in Vienna, and always with the same success. At the last city he received from the enthusiastic inhabitants a gold medal bearing a most flattering inscription. After twelve years' absence he returned to Naples, with the title of singer in the chapel of Ferdinand I and with an engagement at the Teatro San Carlo.

Although Ebers had endeavoured as early as 1822 to secure him for London, Lablache did not tread the English boards till the season of 1830, when he made his début on 30 Mar. in Cimarosa's 'Matrimonio segreto'. In London, as elsewhere, his success was assured from the moment he sang his first note, almost from the first step he took upon the stage. It is indeed doubtful whether he was greater as a singer or as an actor. His head was noble, his figure very tall, atoning for his bulk, which became immense in later years. He shone as much in comic as in tragic parts.

Lablache appeared for the first time in Paris on 4 Nov. 1830 as Geronimo in the 'Matrimonio segreto', and there too he was recognized immediately as the first basso cantante of the day. He continued to sing in Paris and London for several years; and it may be mentioned that his terms in 1828 for four months were 40,000 frs. (£1600), with lodging and one benefit night clear of all expenses, the opera and his part in it to be chosen by himself on that occasion, as also at his début.

In 1833 Lablache sang again at Naples, renewing his triumphs in Donizetti's 'Elisir d'amore' and 'Don Pasquale'. He returned to Paris in 1834, after which he continued to appear annually there and in London, singing at the English provincial festivals as well as at the Opera for many years. In 1836-37 he was Queen Victoria's singing-master, and she more than once expressed the warm esteem in which she held him.¹ In 1852 he sang in St. Petersburg with no less success than elsewhere. Whether in comic opera, in the chromatic music of Spohr or in that of Palestrina, he seemed equally at home. He sang in Vienna on 3 Apr. 1827 the bass solo part in Mozart's Requiem after the death of Beethoven, as he had, as a child, sung the contralto part at a memorial service for Haydn; and he generously paid Barbaia 200 florins for the operatic singers engaged on that occasion. He was also one of the thirty-two torch-bearers who surrounded Beethoven's coffin at its interment. Schubert dedicated to him his three Italian songs (Op. 83), written to Metastasio's words and composed in 1827, thus showing his appreciation of the great Italian's powers.

In 1856 Lablache's health began to fail, and he was obliged in the following spring to take the waters at Kissingen, where he was met and treated with honour by Alexander II of Russia. He received the medal and order given by the tsar with the prophetic words "These will do to ornament my coffin". After this he returned for a few days in Aug. to his house at Maisons-Laffitte, near Paris; but left it on the 18th to try the effect of his native climate at his villa at Posilipo. But the air was too keen for him, and he had to take refuge at Naples, prolonging his life only a short while, however. His remains were brought to Paris and buried at Maisons-Laffitte.

Lablache had many children; one of his daughters married the pianist Thalberg. A 'Méthode de chant', written by Lablache, was published in Paris, but it rather disappointed expectation. J. M., abr.

LABOR, Josef (b. Horovice, 29 June 1842; d. Vienna, 26 Apr. 1924).

Austrian (Bohemian) pianist, organist and composer. He studied at the Vienna Conservatory. Although blind, he made the most of his considerable gifts and became chamber musician to the King of Hanover in 1863. In 1868 he went to settle in Vienna, where he devoted himself to teaching and composition. He edited Biber's violon sonatas for the D.T.Ö., and among his compositions are church music, a 'Konzertstück' for pianoforte and orchestra, two pianoforte Quintets, a pianoforte Quartet, a pianoforte Trio, a violin and pianoforte Sonata, organ fantasies, pianoforte pieces, etc. E. B.

LA BORDE, Jean Benjamin de (b. Paris, 5 Sept. 1734; d. Paris, 22 July 1794).

French violinist and composer. He was a pupil of Dauvergne for the violin and of Rameau for composition, and attained great eminence as an amateur composer. He wrote 32 operas, many solo songs and several works on music, among which the 'Essai sur la musique ancienne et moderne' (1780) is the most important; his 'Recueils de chansons avec un accompagnement de violon et la basse continue' also deserves mention. The 4 volumes of his 'Choix de chansons mises en musique' (1773), with their charming illustrations, have become a bibliographical rarity. Some of the contents were edited separately by Lucy E. Broadwood. La Borde was guillotined.

LABROCA, Mario (b. Rome, 22 Nov. 1896).

Italian composer. He studied under Respighi and Malipiero, but came closer to Casella in his work on behalf of modern music. He actively participated in the affairs of the Corporazione delle Nuove Musiche and those of the Italian section of the I.S.C.M.; and he showed the same zeal when he was called upon to direct the musical division of the Direzione Generale dello Spettacolo attached to the Ministry of Popular Culture, as well as later in his post of manager of the Teatro Comunale of Florence (Maggio Musicale Fiorentino) in 1935-43. After having been artistic director of the Teatro alla Scala at Milan (1948) he became director of the music department of Radio Italiana.

Labroca's activities as a musical organizer, which made especially heavy claims on him after 1935, and those of music critic, which he exercised chiefly between 1924 and 1930, when he wrote for Roman dailies and for musical periodicals, did not prevent him from producing a considerable number of compositions. Among these the following may be mentioned in chronological order: Suite 'Ritmi di marcia' for pianoforte; Sonatina for violin and pianoforte; Suite for viola and pianoforte; string Quartet No. 1; Trio for violin, cello and pianoforte; 'Sinfonietta' for orchestra; string Quartet No. 2; 'Stabat Mater' for solo voices, chorus and orchestra; Symphony for small orchestra with pianoforte obbligato; 'Il lamento dei mariti e delle mogli' for 6 voices and small orchestra; 'Tre cantate dalla Passione secondo S. Giovanni' for bass, chorus and orchestra (Venice, International Festival, 1950).

Labroca's music was influenced by neo-classical tendencies, especially during the period of his close collaboration with Casella; but his is a case of neo-classicism animated by a strongly emotional temperament, and this manifests itself more and more decisively in his latest works—above all in the 'Passion Cantatas'—together with a pronounced vein of romanticism and a certain tinge of folk music, elements traceable both in his melodic forms and his instrumental writing.

LABUŃSKI, Feliks Roderyk (b. Ksawerynowo, 27 Dec. 1892).

Polish composer, critic and author. He studied the pianoforte in his childhood under R. Hill, in 1922-24 theory and composition with L. Marczewski and W. Maliszewski in Warsaw, and later with Nadia Boulanger and Paul Dukas in Paris. In 1927 he founded, together with Czapski, Perkowski and Wiechowicz, the Association of Young Polish Musicians in Paris, and he acted as its chairman in 1930-34. In 1931 his 'Triptyque champêtre' won a prize in a competition held in Warsaw. He returned to Poland and was appointed to the post of head of the "Serious Music Department" in the Polskie Radio of Warsaw. In 1936 he moved to the U.S.A., where he has been domiciled ever since. He has contributed to many periodicals ('Musical America', 'Musical Courier', 'Modern Music') as well as to the 'International Cyclopaedia of Music and Musicians'. His compositions include the following:

- 'Polish Cantata' for solo voice, chorus & orch. (1937).
- 'The Birds' for soprano, chorus & orch. (1934).
- 'Triptyque champêtre', suite for orch. (1931).
- Suite for stgs. (1935).
- 'Concertino' for pf. & orch.
- String Quartet (1934).
- 'Divertimento' for flute & pf. (1936).
- 'Fantastic Dance' for pf.
- 'Bagatelles' for pf.
- Mazurka and Prelude for pf.
- Numerous songs.

C. R. H.

LABUŃSKI, Wiktor (b. St. Petersburg, 14 Apr. 1895).

Polish pianist, conductor and composer, probably a cousin of the preceding. He studied the pianoforte under Nikolayev and theory under Wihtol; later the pianoforte with Safonov and Blumenfeld, and conducting with Emil Młynarski. For eight years (1920-28) he was head of the pianoforte department at the Cracow Conservatory. He went to the U.S.A., where he made his début at Carnegie Hall, New York, in 1928. The same year he was offered the post of head of the pianoforte department at the Nashville Conservatory. Later he became director of the Memphis College of Music.

In 1934 he visited his native country as guest conductor with the Warsaw Philharmonia, Warsaw Symphony Orchestra and Polskie Radio Symphony Orchestra. In 1935 the Curtis Institute of Music at Philadelphia conferred upon him the title of Doctor honoris causa. He lives permanently in the U.S.A. He has composed mainly for the pianoforte, e.g. a 'Concertino' for pianoforte and orchestra (1932), a Concerto (1937), and made a concert transcription of Bach's violin Prelude in E major.

C. R. H.

LA CASINIÈRE, Yves de (b. Angers, 11 Feb. 1897).

French composer, printer and lithographer.

A promising organist by the time he was twelve years of age, he lost his right arm during the first world war in 1918. He studied counterpoint and fugue with Caussade and composition with Max d'Ollone and Nadia Boulanger, and received the first award of the second Prix de Rome in 1925. In 1924 Stokowski performed with the Philadelphia Orchestra his symphonic poem 'Hercule et le centaure'. Other works are the symphonic poem 'Persée et Andromède' (1925), a Symphony (1930), two string Quartets (1930 and 1943) and other chamber music, a pianoforte Sonata (1923) and vocal music. During the 1920s he wrote accompanying music for Cavalcanti's then silent films, 'En rade', 'Rien que les heures', etc.

In 1930 La Casinière took to printing, especially of music. During the second world war his underground activity led to his imprisonment. After the liberation of Paris he resumed his work as printer, lithographer, free-lance composer and teacher. F. E. G.

LACERDA, Francisco de (b. Ribeira Seca, S. Jorge, Azores, 11 May 1869; d. Lisbon, 18 July 1934).

Portuguese conductor, musicologist and composer. He came of a family of musicians and amateurs. From his early youth he showed an inclination for music and a special interest in folksong studies. Having given up his medical course, he entered the Lisbon Conservatory, where he won many awards and was later appointed teacher. In 1895 he went to Paris with a state scholarship to attend the Conservatoire and the Schola Cantorum, where he was especially noticed by Vincent d'Indy. After a short stay in Portugal he dedicated himself to folk-music research, founded in Paris, with Bourgault-Ducaudray, an International Folklorist Association and began his career as a conductor. He spent many years in France and other European countries, taking a prominent share in the spread of modern Russian and French music, as conductor and artistic adviser to the Kursaal concerts of Montreux and of the Grand Classical Concerts at Marseilles. He had Ernest Ansermet for a pupil. The first world war caused him to return to his native country, where he continued his study of folk music.

In 1923 Lacerda founded in Lisbon the Orquestra Filarmonica de Lisboa and the artistic society Pro-Arte, and took part in the movements of the Homens Livres and the União Intelectual Portuguesa, where were gathered together some of the most remarkable Portuguese minds of the time. He returned to France and gave at Marseilles the first complete performance of Falla's 'La vida breve'. In 1928 he again went back to Lisbon, in poor health, and the last years of his life were devoted to the 'Cancioneiro musical português', a collection of more than 500 folksongs, of which only a small part has been published. As a composer he left some scattered works. To his activity as conductor and organizer is due much of the impulse given to the modern Portuguese musical movement. J. J. G.

LACH, Robert (b. Vienna, 29 Jan. 1874).

Austrian musicologist and composer. He studied at the Vienna Conservatory in 1893-99, with Robert Fuchs, and musical history and research under Wallaschek and Guido Adler. He graduated Ph.D. in Prague in 1902. His studies in folklore and melody bore fruit in the papers contributed to the S.I.M.G. In 1911 he became director of the musical department of the Vienna State Library, in 1915 a teacher of the University and in 1920 a professor. He contributed to Adler's 'Handbuch' (1924) a chapter on 'Musik der Natur- und orientalischen Kultur-Völker'. In 1927 he succeeded Adler in his professorship at the University of Vienna and the direction of the Music-Historical Institute.

Among Lach's scientific works the most important is 'Studien zur Entwicklungsgeschichte der ornamentalen Melopöie' (1913). In this extensive study he endeavours to ascertain the connection between exotic and occidental music, and he arrives at new conclusions affecting both domains. For the 'Sitzungsberichte der Akademie der Wissenschaften in Wien' Lach edited 3 volumes of songs of Russian war prisoners. For the Vienna State Academy of Music, where he lectured on the history of music, he wrote in 1927 a history of the institution. His other studies include:

- 'Mozart als Theoretiker' ('Sitzungsberichte der Akademie', 1918).
- 'Zur Geschichte des Gesellschaftsstanzen im 18. Jahrhundert' (Vienna, 1920).
- 'Die vergleichende Musikwissenschaft' ('Sitzungsberichte der Akademie', 1924).
- 'Schubert und das Volkslied' ('Schubertkongress', 1928).
- 'Das Ethos in der Musik von J. Brahms' ('Simrock-Jahrbuch', 1930).

As a composer Lach showed romantic tendencies. Among his works are two fairy operas, three cantatas, eight masses, a Requiem, ten symphonies, numerous chamber-music works, choruses, songs, etc. K. G.

LACHMANN, Robert (b. Berlin, 28 Nov. 1892; d. Jerusalem, 8 May 1939).

German authority on Oriental music, especially Arabian music of North Africa. He was the son of Jewish parents, his father, Dr. Georg Lachmann, a junior college professor (Gymnasial-Oberlehrer), being German, and his mother, born Handler, being English. He studied Germanic philology and languages at Berlin University and London University respectively, and at the outbreak of the 1914-1918 war was called to the German army. After two years' active service as a N.C.O. he was sent, owing to bad health, to the prisoners-of-war camp at Wünsdorf, where he came in contact with Muhammedan and Hindu prisoners from French and British regiments. From the former he learned Arabic and, being a musician, he took down the words and music of their songs. His work attracted the attention of Erich M. von Hornbostel and Kurt Sachs of Berlin who, as members of the Royal Phonographic Commission, visited Wünsdorf, and they recommended him to make a more serious study of his work when the war was over. After 1918, when he was demobilized, he studied musicology under Johannes Wolf and Karl Stumpf, this being his major subject, Arabic, under Mittwoch, being one of his minor subjects, at Berlin University, and in 1922 he took his degree of Ph.D., his thesis being 'Die Musik in den tunesischen Städten', which was published in the 'Archiv für Musikwissenschaft' (1923).

In 1924, being desirous of an official career, Lachmann entered the Berlin State Library as a volunteer worker and, having passed his examination for a librarian's diploma, he was appointed to a library post at Kiel in 1926. Meantime he had been prosecuting studies in Oriental music farther afield in a search for parallels. This resulted in two interesting studies on certain phases of music in India and Japan, as is indicated respectively by two of his articles: 'Ein grundlegendes Werk über die Musik Indiens' ('Archiv für Musikwissenschaft', 1924) and 'Musik und Tonschrift des No' ('Bericht über den musikwissenschaftlichen Kongress der Deutschen Musikgesellschaft', 1925). Returning to Berlin in 1927, he was appointed, in Nov., a librarian in the music department of the State Library under Johannes Wolf. By this date he had filled almost every spare moment of leisure in his researches into Oriental music. In Nov. 1925 he made a short trip to Tripoli, and in the spring of 1926 he was in Tunisia, on both occasions making phonographic records of country and bedouin music. In 1927 his 'Zur aussereuropäischen Mehrstimmigkeit' ('Kongressbericht der Beethoven-Zentenarfeier', Vienna) and in 1928 his article (in collaboration with A. H. Fox Strangways) on 'Muhammedan Music' in the 3rd edition of this Dictionary appeared. Then came his first book, 'Musik des Orients' (Breslau, 1929), which revealed Lachmann at his best. It was followed by two thoughtful studies: 'Die Musik der aussereuropäischen Natur- und Kulturvölker' (in E. Bücken's 'Handbuch der Musikwissenschaft', Potsdam, 1929) and 'Die Weise vom Löwen und der pythische Nomos' (in the 'Festschrift für Johannes Wolf', Berlin, 1929). This latter, which he had phonographed in Tunis, Lachmann believed to be a descendant of the 'Nomos Pythicos' of antiquity. In Mar. and Apr. 1929 he was again busy recording in Tunisia.

His first attempt at translating from the older Arabic theorists of music was his 'Al-Kindi: Risāla fī khubr ta'lif al-alhān' (Leipzig, 1931), which he accomplished in collaboration with Máhmúd el-Hefnī. It is a praiseworthy piece of work. In 1932 his experience in recording music led to his appointment as President of the Commission of Recording Music at the "Congress of Arabian Music" in Cairo, 1932, where the best Arabian music from Morocco in the West to Irak in the East was recorded at his selection. The need for a society and a special journal devoted to the prosecution of research into Oriental music was felt by most workers in this field, and it was due to Lachmann that the Gesellschaft zur Erforschung der Musik des Orients was founded in 1930, with Johannes Wolf, Georg Schünemann, Erich M. von Hornbostel and Kurt Sachs as sponsors, although the projected quarterly journal, the 'Zeitschrift für vergleichende Musikwissenschaft', did not make its appearance until 1933, when its title showed that an even wider interest had been evoked. It was edited by Lachmann until its second-last number in 1935, when its continuance became impossible. During its run three important articles appeared from Lachmann's pen, the first two in conjunction with Hornbostel: 'Asiatische Parallelen zur Berbermusik' and 'Das indische Tonsystem bei Bharata und sein Ursprung', both in 1933, and 'Musiksysteme und Musikauffassung' in 1935.

The coming to power of the Nazis in Germany robbed Lachmann of his position at the State Library. He languished until the opening of 1935, when the University of Jerusalem invited him to take charge of its department of extra-European Music. There he established his own valuable archives of Oriental music, to which he added a thousand new records during his four years of unremitting toil at Jerusalem. Here he made other useful contributions to our knowledge of Oriental music, e.g. a fresh interpretation of Bible cantillation and a new outlook on the music of the Samaritans. Nor did he ignore his earlier interest in Arabian music, as two articles in the Arabic journal 'Al-Kulliyat al-'Arabiyya' (1935-36) give evidence in 'The Future of Arabian Music' and 'The Musical Education in the Arab College'. His posthumous book, 'Jewish Cantillation and Song in the Isle of Djerba' (Jerusalem, 1940) was his last effort, although he did not live to complete its English translation.

LACHNER. German family of musicians. They were the children of an organist at Rain o/Lech, Bavaria, a man of worth and character, but very poor, who was twice married and brought up a very large family. Of the following (1) was a son of the first wife, the others were children of the second.

(1) Theodor Lachner (b. Rain o/Lech, 1798; d. Munich, 22 May 1877), organist. He was a sound musician, but unambitious, and ended his career as organist at Munich and chorus master at the court theatre.

(2) Thekla Lachner (b. Rain o/Lech, ?; d. Augsburg, ?), organist, half-sister of the preceding. She was organist at St. George's Church, Augsburg.

(3) Franz Lachner (b. Rain o/Lech, 2 Apr. 1803; d. Munich, 20 Jan. 1890), conductor and composer, brother of the preceding. He was solidly educated in other things besides music, but music was his desire, and in 1822 he prevailed on his parents to let him go to Vienna. He put himself under Stadler and Sechter, and was constantly in the company of Schubert, with whom he became very intimate. In 1826 he was made vice-Kapellmeister of the Kärntnertor Theatre and the next year, on the retirement of Weigl, principal Kapellmeister. He retained this post till 1834, and it was a time of great productivity. In that year he went to Mannheim to conduct the Opera there, and in 1836 he advanced to the top of the ladder as court Kapellmeister — in 1852 general music director — at Munich. There he remained till 1865, when he retired on a pension. In 1872 the University of Munich gave him the honorary degree of Ph.D.

Lachner's writings are of prodigious number and extent. Two oratorios, 'Moses' and 'Die vier Menschenalter'; four operas ('Die Bürgschaft', Pest, 1828; 'Alidia', Munich, 1839; 'Catarina Cornaro Königin von Cypern', Munich, 3 Dec. 1841; 'Benvenuto Cellini', Munich, 1849); a Requiem; three masses; various cantatas, entr'actes and other pieces; many large compositions for men's voices; eight symphonies, among them those in D minor (No. 3), in C minor (Op. 52), which won the prize offered by the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Vienna, and in D major (No. 6), which Schumann finds twice as good as the prize one; seven suites, overtures and serenades for orchestra, the orchestration of Schubert's 'Song of Miriam'; five quartets; concertos for harp and for bassoon; a Nonet for wind instruments, trios, duos, pianoforte pieces of all dimensions; and a large number of vocal pieces for solo and several voices. All that industry, knowledge, tact and musicianship can give is here — if there were but a little more of the sacred fire! No one can deny to Lachner the praise of conscientiousness and artistic character; he was once deservedly esteemed by his countrymen almost as if he were an old classic and held a similar position in the south to that of Hiller in the north.

(4) Christiane Lachner (b. Rain o/Lech, 1805; d. Rain, ?), organist, sister of the preceding. She was organist at her native place.

(5) Ignaz Lachner (b. Rain o/Lech, 11 Sept. 1807; d. Hanover, 24 Feb. 1895), organist, conductor and composer, brother of the preceding. He was brought up to music, and at twelve years of age was sent to the "Gymnasium" at Augsburg, where he is said to have had no less a person than Napoleon III (then Count Saint-Leu) as a schoolfellow. In 1824 he joined his brother in Vienna, where in 1825 he was made vice-Kapellmeister of the Kärntnertor Theatre. In 1831 he became court music director at Stuttgart and in 1842 rejoined his brother in a similar position at Munich. In 1853 he took the conduct of the theatre at Hamburg, in 1858 was made court chapel master at Stockholm and in 1861 settled down for good at Frankfurt o/M., where he filled many musical posts and retired in 1875.

He produced a long list of works — three operas ('Der Geisterthurm', Stuttgart, 1837; 'Die Regenbrüder', with Eduard Mörike as part-author of the libretto, Stuttgart, 1839; 'Loreley', Munich, 1846); several ballets, melodramas, etc. etc.; masses, symphonies, quartets, pianoforte works and many songs, one of which — 'Überall Du' — was very popular in its day.

(6) Vincenz Lachner (b. Rain o/Lech, 19 July 1811; d. Carlsruhe, 22 Jan. 1893), organist, conductor and composer, brother of the preceding. He was also brought up at the Augsburg "Gymnasium". He began by taking Ignaz's place as organist in Vienna in 1834, and rose to be court Kapellmeister at Mannheim from 1836 to 1873, when he retired on a pension. He was in London in 1842, conducting the German company. After his retirement he settled at Carlsruhe, where he taught at the Conservatory from 1884. His music to Gozzi's 'Turandot' was performed at Mannheim in 1843. Some of his songs were favourites in their day.

LACHNITH, Ludwig Wenzel (b. Prague, 7 July 1746; d. Paris, 3 Oct. 1820).

Bohemian horn player and composer. He was in the service of the Duke of Zweibrücken, and thence went to Paris, where he made his début at the Concert Spirituel as a horn player. He was a clever, handy creature, who wrote not only quantities of all kinds of instrumental music, but several pasticcios and other pieces. His notorious achievements, however, were his adaptations of great operas, by way of making them acceptable to the big public, such as 'Les Mystères d'Isis', for which both libretto and music of Mozart's 'Zauberflöte' were "arranged" into what Fétis calls "a monstrous compilation" (Opéra, 20 Aug. 1801). No wonder that the piece was called 'Les Misères d'ici' and that Lachnith was styled "le dérangeur". He was adept also at working up the music of several composers into one piece and torturing it to the expression of different words and sentiments from those to which it had originally been set — e.g. 'Le Laboureur chinois', in which the music of "several celebrated composers" was "arrangée par M. Lachnith" (5 Feb. 1813). In these crimes he had an accomplice in the elder Kalkbrenner, who assisted him to concoct two "oratorios in action" — 'Saul' (6 Apr. 1803) and 'The Taking of Jericho' (11 Apr. 1805).

Lachnith also wrote several operas of his own, e.g. 'L'Heureuse Réconciliation' (1785), 'L'Antiquaire' (1789) and 'Eugénie et Linval' (1798). G., rev.

LACHOWSKA, Aga (b. Lwów, 1886).

Polish mezzo-soprano singer. Educated both in Poland and abroad she established her position in the operatic field in Poland, Spain and Italy, especially as the heroines in 'Carmen' and 'Samson and Delilah'. She also frequently appeared on the concert platform, delightfully interpreting songs by old and modern composers. C. R. H.

LACOMBE, Louis (Trouillon) (b. Bourges, 26 Nov. 1818; d. Saint-Vaast-la-Hougue, 30 Sept. 1884).

French pianist and composer. He entered the Paris Conservatoire under Zimmerman at the age of eleven, and at thirteen carried off the first pianoforte prize. In 1832 he undertook a concert tour with his sister and in 1834 settled in Vienna, where he had lessons from Czerny and studied theory, etc., with Sechter and Seyfried.

From 1839 he lived in Paris and devoted himself mainly to composition, writing numerous pieces for pianoforte solo, studies, etc., a Quintet for violin, oboe, cello, bassoon and pianoforte, and two trios, his best-known pieces of chamber music; two dramatic symphonies for solo voices, chorus and orchestra, 'Manfred', after Byron (1847), and 'Arva' (1850), as well as a melodrama with choruses, 'Sapho', which received a prize at the Exhibition of 1878. The two stage works performed in the composer's lifetime were music for J. A. P. Niboyet's légende 'L'Amour' (Théâtre Saint-Marcel, Paris, 2 Dec. 1859) and 'La Madone', one-act opera (Théâtre-Lyrique, 16 Jan. 1861); the four-act 'Winkelried' was given on 17 Feb. 1892, at Geneva; the two-act 'Le Tonnelier de Nuremberg' in Hugo Riemann's adaptation, as 'Meister Martin und seine Gesellen', was given at Coblenz on 7 Mar. 1897, and the three-act 'Korrigane' at Sondershausen in 1901.

A monument was erected to Lacombe's memory in 1887 in his native town. In 1896 his treatise 'Philosophie et musique' appeared posthumously. J. A. F.-M., rev.

LACOMBE, Paul (b. Carcassonne, 11 July 1837; d. Carcassonne, 5 June 1927).

French composer. He was taught theory in his birthplace by a former pupil of the Paris Conservatoire, an organist, François Teyssere. In 1866 he began to correspond with Bizet, and he was his disciple until Bizet's death. Lacombe belonged to the group of composers whose desire was to reform French music after 1870. He travelled in Europe, but lived in his native town till his death. In 1901 he was elected "corresponding member" of the Institut, and he was made chevalier of the Legion of Honour in 1902.

Lacombe produced more than 150 works — instrumental music, chiefly for pianoforte, and songs. There are also some unpublished compositions. His first Sonata for violin and pianoforte (1868) was played by Delaborde and Sarasate in 1869. A great many of his works were performed by the Société Nationale de Musique between 1872 and 1921. He also composed orchestral music: an 'Ouverture symphonique' (Pasdeloup concerts, 1876); 3 symphonies (the third awarded the prize of the Société des Compositeurs de Musique, 1886); a Suite for pianoforte and orchestra. In chamber music his important works are 3 violin sonatas, a cello sonata, 3 trios and a quartet. His last works were: 'Marche dernière' (orchestra), 'Dialogue sentimental' (flute, bassoon and pianoforte, 1917), 'Petite suite', 'Deux Pièces' (pianoforte, 1922), 'Trois Mélodies' (1922), 'Berceuse' (1924).

Lacombe's music owes much to the romanticism of Mendelssohn, Chopin and Schumann.

French composer. He was from 1710 to 1714 conductor of the Paris Opéra, which it is said he had joined as a chorus singer in 1693. His last known work dates from 1732, but according to Durey de Noinville's 'Histoire du Théâtre de l'Académie Royale de Musique', published in 1757, he was still alive then.

Lacoste's first opera was 'Aricie' (1697), followed by 'Philomèle' (1705), 'Bradamante' (1707), 'Créuse l'Athénienne' (1712), 'Télégonie' (1725), 'Orion' (1728) and 'Biblis' (1732). Apart from 'Philomèle', which was revived three times, reached provincial stages and was even parodied, they were failures; but all of them were published in full score by Ballard. Besides the operas — to the number of which Fétis adds an undated 'Pomone' — Lacoste wrote a book of solo cantatas with continuo. He was by some contemporaries accused of plagiarism and too close imitation of the style of Campra. He died after 1757.

LACOUR, Marcelle (Antoinette Eugénie) de (b. Besançon, 6 Nov. 1896).

French harpsichordist. She studied music thoroughly in all its branches (history of art and music, pianoforte, harp, singing, harmony and the teaching of music) both at Besançon and in Paris. Deciding to specialize in harpsichord playing, she worked for some time under Wanda Landowska. She lives in Paris, and each year gives concerts in France and abroad, particularly in Italy, Belgium, Germany, England and Portugal. She is remarkable for her scholarly knowledge of old music and the delicacy of her interpretation of it. Numerous composers have dedicated their works to her and have written her new works for the harpsichord, among them Florent Schmitt, Honegger, Martinů, Tansman, Turina, Demuth, Murrill and others.

LACY, Frederick (St. John) (b. Blackrock, Co. Cork, 27 Mar. 1862).

Irish musical educationist and composer. He studied at the R.A.M. in London, of which he became Associate (1888) and Fellow (1911). He taught in London from 1886 to 1900, but was appointed lecturer in music at Queen's College, Cork, in 1906, and Professor of Music at University College, Cork, in 1908. He became examiner for musical degrees at the N.U.I. in 1909 and examiner in theory to the Intermediate Board of Education in 1922; Vice-President of the Cork Orchestral Union, 1905–9; President of Cork Literary and Scientific Society, 1915–17.

In addition to various songs, partsongs, song cycles and sacred music, Lacy composed a fine Serenade for orchestra (Op. 21) and a book of Irish tunes for Irish regiments. He became also well known as a lecturer.

W. H. G. F.

LACY, John (b. ?; d. Devonshire, c. 1865).

English bass singer. He was a pupil of Rauzzini at Bath. After singing in London he went to Italy, where he became complete master of the Italian language and style of singing. On his return he sang at concerts and the Lenten oratorios, but although he possessed an exceptionally fine voice and sang admirably in various styles, circumstances prevented him from taking any prominent position. In 1818 he accepted an engagement at Calcutta, and, accompanied by his wife, left England, returning about 1826. Had he remained there he would most probably have been appointed successor to Bartleman.

Mrs. Lacy, originally Miss Jackson (b. London, 1776; d. London, 19 May 1858), appeared as a soprano singer at the Concert of Ancient Music on 25 Apr. 1798. In 1800 she became the wife of Francesco Bianchi, the composer, and in 1810 his widow. In 1812 she was married to Lacy and sang as Mrs. Bianchi Lacy in 1812–15. She was noted for a grand, simple style and for her perfect delivery of Italian.

LACY, Michael Rophino (b. Bilbao, 19 July 1795; d. London, 20 Sept. 1867).

Irish violinist. He was the son of an Irish merchant, learned music from an early age and made rapid progress on the violin, appearing in public at the age of six in a concerto by Giannovichini at a concert given at Bilbao by Andreossi. In 1802 he was at college at Bordeaux and in 1803 was sent to Paris to finish his education. He attained to considerable skill as a linguist. Kreutzer was his principal instructor in music. About the end of 1804 he performed before Napoleon at the Tuileries. He was then known as "le petit Espagno". He played in the principal Dutch towns on his way to London, which he reached in Oct. 1805. There he soon gave concerts at Hanover Square Rooms, under the sobriquet of "The Young Spaniard", his name not being announced until May 1807, when an engraved portrait of him by Cardon after Smart was published. He next performed at Catalani's first concert in Dublin, during a visit of Michael Kelly's opera company to Ireland, and was afterwards engaged for Corri's concerts at Edinburgh at 20 guineas per night.

A few years later he quitted the musical for the theatrical profession and performed the principal genteel comedy parts at the theatres of Dublin, Edinburgh, Glasgow, etc. In 1818 he was appointed leader of the Liverpool concerts vice Janiewicz, and at the end of 1820 returned to London and was engaged as leader of the ballet at the King's Theatre.

Lacy adapted to the English stage both words and music of several popular operas; his adaptations display great skill, although gross liberties were frequently taken with the original pieces, which can only be excused by the taste of the time. Among them are 'The Turkish Lovers' from Rossini's 'Turco in Italia', 1827; 'Love in Wrinkles' from Fétis's 'La Vieille', 1828; 'The Casket', music from Mozart, 1829; 'The Maid of Judah' from Scott's 'Ivanhoe', the music from Rossini's 'Semiramide', 1829; 'Cinderella', the music from Rossini's 'Cenerentola'; 'Fra Diavolo', 1831; 'Robert le Diable', under the title of 'The Fiend Father', 1832; 'The Coiners' from Auber's 'Le Serment', 1833.

In 1833 he produced an oratorio entitled 'The Israelites in Egypt', a pasticcio from Rossini's 'Mosè in Egitto' and Handel's 'Israel in Egypt', which was performed with scenery, dresses and personation. He rendered great assistance to Schoelcher in collecting the material for his 'Life of Handel'.

ŁADA, Janina (b. Warsaw, 1876; d. Zakopane, 30 Mar. 1947).

Polish pianist. She studied at the Cracow Conservatory with Domaniewski and later with Leschetizky in Vienna. In 1919-22 she gave many pianoforte recitals in Poland, Germany and Austria. She also taught the pianoforte at the Cracow Conservatory. Later she settled at Zakopane, where she remained until her death.

C. R. H.

ŁADA, Kazimierz (actually Ładowski) (b. Kaliskie, ?; d. Włocławek, 1872).

Polish violinist and composer. He was taught first by his elder brother Maciej and later by Collet in Paris. From 1840 onwards he toured all over Europe. His numerous compositions, now forgotten, include a 'Kujawiak' in D major, 'Cygan' ('The Gypsy') and many other concert pieces of a virtuoso character. He also published in Warsaw a 'History of Music' in 1861.

C. R. H.

LADMIRAULT, Paul (Émile) (b. Nantes, 8 Dec. 1877; d. Saint-Nazaire, 30 Oct. 1944).

French composer. He showed great musical gifts from childhood and in 1884 began to play the pianoforte. Later he also took violin, organ and harmony lessons, and he began to compose at the age of eight. An opera, 'Gilles de Retz', for which his mother had written the libretto, was produced at Nantes on 18 May 1893, but never repeated or published. He studied first at the Conservatory of his native town, but in 1895 entered the Paris Conservatoire, where after a year's military service in 1899 he finished his studies under Gédalge and Fauré. But he left after three vain attempts to obtain the Prix de Rome.

Ladmirault's works were soon taken up, mainly by the Société Nationale de Musique, including the 'Suite bretonne' in 1904 and the symphonic prelude 'Brocéliande au matin', which was repeated at the Colonne concert of 28 Nov. 1909. Both were extracts from a second opera, 'Myrdhin', which was never performed. In 1926 the ballet 'La Prêtresse de Korydwen' was produced at the Paris Opéra and in 1929 he wrote incidental music for 'Tristan et Iseult'. But he never settled in Paris, and became professor of harmony at the Nantes Conservatory. During the second world war Ladmirault, with his wife, was isolated in the "pocket" of Saint-Nazaire and surrounded by U.S.A. gunfire concentrated on the enemy's desperate last stand.

Ladmirault is one of the "regional composers" of whom the French school of his time produced several; he resembles Séverac in this respect, but while the latter represents southern France, he stands for Brittany and sometimes for the Celtic spirit in a wider sense. For this reason, perhaps, his music never became widely known, but it deserves attention for its refined and poetical qualities, as well as for the Breton accents which give much of it a special character.

The following is a list of Ladmirault's chief compositions (some unpublished):

STAGE WORKS

- 'Gilles de Retz', opera in 3 acts (Louise Ladmirault) (1892-93).
- 'Myrdhin', opera in 4 acts (L. Ladmirault & Albert Fleury) (1899-1902).

LADURNER, Ignaz Anton (b. Aldein, Tyrol, 1 Aug. 1766; d. Massy, Seine-et-Oise, 4 Mar. 1839).

Austrian composer. The eldest son of Franz Xavier Ladurner, he was educated at the monastery of Benediktbeuern. In 1782-84 he filled his father's post as organist. He made further studies at Munich and went with a Countess of Heimhausen to Bar-le-Duc. He was succeeded in the latter appointment by his younger brother. In July 1788 he went to Paris as composer and teacher, became professor at the Conservatoire and teacher of Auber and Boëly. He retired to his country seat near Massy in 1836.

Ladurner composed 2 operas ('Wenzel, ou Le Magistrat du peuple', Paris, 1794, and 'Les Vieux Fous', Paris, 1796), sonatas for pianoforte and for violin, divertissements, variations, etc. E. v. d. s., adds.

LADURNER, Joseph Aloys (b. Algund, 7 Mar. 1769; d. ?).

Austrian composer, brother of the preceding. He was in the service of the Countess of Heimhausen at Bar-le-Duc in succession to his brother, and became court chaplain, councillor of the consistory, etc., at Brixen. He was a talented composer of church music. He died some time after 1835. E. v. d. s.

LA FAGE, (Juste) Adrien (Lenoir) de (b. Paris, 30 Mar. 1805; d. Charenton, 8 Mar. 1862).

French composer and writer on music. He was a grandson of the celebrated architect Lenoir. After education for the church and the army, he settled to music as a pupil of Perne for harmony and counterpoint, devoting himself especially to the study of plainsong. Perne recommended him to Choron, who took him first as pupil and then as coach or assistant master. In 1828 he was sent by the government to Rome and studied for a year under Baini. While in Italy he produced a comic opera, 'I creditor', but comic opera was not to be his road to distinction. On his return to Paris, in Dec. 1829, he was appointed maître de chapelle of Saint-Étienne-du-Mont, where he substituted an organ (built by John Abbey) for the harsh out-of-tune serpent hitherto used to accompany the voices.

The years 1833-36 La Fage spent in Italy and there lost his wife and son. He returned to Paris and published the 'Manuel complet de musique vocale et instrumentale' (1836-38), the first chapters of which had been prepared by Choron, 'Séméiologie musicale' (1837), 'De la chanson considérée sous le rapport musical' (1840), 'Miscellanées musicales' (1844), 'Histoire générale de la musique' (1844) and many biographical and critical articles collected from periodicals. He again visited Italy after the Revolution of 1848, and during this trip took copies of manuscripts never before consulted. He also visited Germany and Spain, and during the London Exhibition of 1851 made a short excursion to England. He then settled finally in Paris and published the works which place him in the first rank of "musicians"—to use a favourite word of his own—of his time. In 1853 he published three books on ancient music—'Nicolai Capuani presbyteri compendium musicale', 'De la reproduction des livres de plain-chant romain' and 'Lettre écrite à l'occasion d'un mémoire pour servir à la restauration du chant romain en France, par l'abbé Céleste Alix'—and in 1859 he brought out 'De l'unité tonique et de la fixation d'un diapason universel'. Overwork as an author and as editor-in-chief of 'Le Plain-chant', a periodical which he founded in 1859, brought on a nervous affection, which ultimately led to his removal to the asylum for the insane at Charenton.

La Fage composed much music of many kinds, both vocal and instrumental, sacred and secular, but it is as an historian and didactic writer that he is remembered. His 'Cours complet de plain-chant' (Paris, 1855-56, two vols. 8vo) is a book of the first order and fully justifies its title. It was succeeded in 1859 by the 'Nouveau Traité de plain-chant romain', with questions, an indispensable supplement to the former. His 'Histoire générale de la musique et de la danse' (Paris, 1844) is incomplete, treating only of Chinese, Indian, Egyptian and Hebrew music, but it is a careful and conscientious work. His learning and method appear conspicuously in his 'Extraits du catalogue critique et raisonné d'une petite bibliothèque musicale' (Rennes, n.d., pp. 120, 8vo, 100 copies only), and in his 'Essais de dipthérogaphie musicale' (Paris, 1864, two vols. 8vo, one containing very curious musical examples). He left a valuable library (the catalogue was published, Paris, 1862, 8vo), afterwards dispersed by auction; but his unpublished works and materials are in the Paris Bibliothèque Nationale, to which he bequeathed all his papers, with the manuscripts of Choron and Baini in his possession.

French violinist and composer. He had his first instruction on the violin from his mother, a sister of Berthame, a well-known violinist of that period, whom he also accompanied on his travels through Germany, performing successfully, when only eleven years of age, at Hamburg, Oldenburg and other towns. On his return to Paris he continued his studies under Kreutzer and soon appeared at the Théâtre Feydeau, though not as a violinist, but as a singer of French ballads. After some time he again took up the violin, this time under the tuition of Rode, and soon proved himself a player of exceptional merit.

From 1801 to 1808 Lafont travelled and played with great success in France, Belgium, Holland, Germany and Russia. In 1808 he was appointed Rode's successor as solo violinist to the tsar at St. Petersburg, a position in which he remained for six years. In 1815 he returned to Paris and was appointed solo violinist to Louis XVIII. In 1816 he had a public contest with Paganini at Milan.¹ In 1831 he made a long tour with Henri Herz, the pianist, which occupied him till 1839, when his career was suddenly ended by a carriage accident in the south of France, through which he lost his life.

Spohr, in his autobiography, praises Lafont's fine tone, perfect intonation, energy and gracefulness, but deplores the absence of deep feeling and accuses him of mannerism in phrasing. He also relates that Lafont's repertory was confined to a very few pieces, and that he would practise a concerto for years before venturing on it in public. Lafont's compositions for the violin are of no musical value; they comprise seven concertos, a number of fantasies, rondos, etc. He wrote a number of duos concertants in conjunction with Kalkbrenner, Herz, etc., and more than 200 ballads (romances), which for a time were very popular. The only opera of his that can be verified is 'La Rivalité villageoise' (1799). Fétis mentions a second one, 'Zélie et Terville' (1803), but this is by Blangini; and yet another, supposed to have been written in Russia, cannot be traced.

LAGARDE, Pierre¹ (b. nr. Crécy, Brie, 10 Feb. 1717; d. ?).

French composer. Little is known about his early years before 1750, when he was assistant conductor at the Paris Opéra; in 1755 he was joint-conductor there, with Chéron. Later he became music teacher of the royal children (1764) and still later superintendent of music to the Comte d'Artois. He still received a pension from the Opéra in 1792. Lagarde published a large amount of miscellaneous vocal music, cantatas, cantatilles, brunettes, duos, airs, etc., among them two collections called 'Les Soirées de l'Isle Adam' (1764-66). For the stage he wrote the opera-ballets 'Aegle' (Versailles, 13 Jan. 1748, Paris, Opéra, 18 Feb. 1751), the score of which was published, 'Silvie' (Versailles, 26 Feb. 1749), 'La Journée galante' (Versailles, 25 Feb. 1750), consisting of 'Aegle' and two additional acts, and 'Les Fêtes de Thalie' (Bellevue, 11 Apr. 1752).

LA GUERRE. French family of musicians.

(1) Michel de La Guerre (b. Paris, c. 1605; d. Paris, 13 Nov. 1679), organist and composer. He was made organist of the Sainte-Chapelle in Paris on 1 Jan. 1633, in place of La Galle, according to the registers of the proceedings of the Chapter. He remained organist there for the rest of his life, and from 1658 he was given, with his family, free quarters in the precincts of the palace. At the same time he added to his post as organist that of "Receveur Général du temporel de la Sainte-Chapelle", that is to say "man of business" to the canons, and this occupation turned him somewhat from his musical activities during the later years of his life. He died in the palace.

None of his compositions has survived, though court songs by several poets of the mid-17th century became well known through his musical settings.

He probably also wrote motets and organ works. About 1650 he was well known as a composer. His name merits recognition in musical history as that of the author of the first French opera, a comédie de chansons, as it was called, 'Le Triomphe de l'Amour sur des bergers et bergères', written to a libretto of the court poet Charles de Beys. It was sung at the Louvre before the king on 22 Jan. 1655, after having been rehearsed in public on 15 Dec. 1654. Two years later, on 26 Mar. 1657, it was revived at the court, and this time it was produced with scenery. Of the libretto, which is a short pastoral in one act, there are two editions in quarto, and both appear to have been published by the composer. The first is of 1654; the other, undated, seems to be of 1661, and it contains also a little collection of verses by various authors which La Guerre is stated to have set to music. This second edition was made with the object of claiming priority in the invention of the comédie française en musique, which Perrin, in the libretto of his 'Pastorale', had attributed to himself, in 1659 and once more in 1661; this 'Pastorale', with music by Cambert, had been first performed in Apr. 1659, more than four years after La Guerre's work.

During those years almost all the composers of court airs tried to compose dramatic music, in imitation of the Italian operas presented under the ægis of Mazarin. They are written as dialogues with music, sometimes on fairly extended lines linked with airs and duets where the employment of recitatives was more or less shunned; and both 'Le Triomphe de l'Amour' and the 'Pastorale d'Issy' are nothing more than dialogues of this kind. However, they were not sung singly, but as scenes, and they were in fact the first attempts at French opera; unfortunately no trace of the music of either remains.

Michel de La Guerre had, by his wife Marguerite Trespagne, ten children, of whom two became organists.

(2) Jérôme de La Guerre (b. Paris, c. 1654; d. ?), organist, son of the preceding. He was admitted in 1675 as substitute for the "recette du temporel de la Sainte-Chapelle". He replaced Michel in this post from 26 Mar. 1678 and took charge of the organ likewise from 1679. But on 20 Sept. 1698, with the object of devoting himself entirely to business, he appointed in his place as organist his brother Marin. In the following years, although he had associated in his management his wife, Claude Marguerite de Saizy, and her sister-in-law, Catherine de Saizy, his affairs became imperilled, and he had to abandon the "recette du temporel" in 1716, with a debt of 11,000 livres, which he had to repay at once. The Chapter registers mention him often at this time and also the subject of the various dwellings which he occupied in the precincts of the palace. Probably he had taken up the organ again in 1704 at the death of his brother. He had as his successor Pierre Février, author of a book of harpsichord pieces.

(3) Marin de La Guerre (b. Paris, 1 Dec. 1658; d. Paris, 16 July 1704), organist, brother of the preceding. He was, in 1686 until the death of his mother, whose certificate he signed, organist of the Jesuit Church in the rue Saint-Antoine. In 1690 he was also organist of Saint-Séverin, and in 1698 he took his brother Jérôme's place at the Sainte-Chapelle.

He died in the palace and was buried the day after his death in the lower chapel. He had married, probably in 1687, Élisabeth Jacquet, the celebrated clavecinist and composer. They had a son who showed great musical gifts and appeared as an infant prodigy, but who died in his tenth year.

As in the case of Michel, the works of his two sons have not been preserved.

LA GUERRE, Élisabeth Jacquet de (b. Paris, 1659; d. Paris, 27 June 1729).

French composer. She belonged to a family of professional musicians; her father was an organist and teacher of the harpsichord; her brother, Pierre Jacquet, played the organ of Saint-Louis-en-l'Île. A precocious child, she gave, from the age of five years, it appears, "des marques d'une science infuse pour le clavecin".¹ She was presented at court and Louis XIV interested himself in the gifted girl. He always treated her with benevolence, and the majority of her works were dedicated to the king. Some years later, about her fifteenth year, Mme de Montespan took control of her, and charged herself with completing Élisabeth's education. When she was eighteen the 'Mercure de France' in 1677² announced her compositions, and during her sojourn at Versailles a pastoral of hers was played (1685) in the Dauphin's apartments which Louis XIV wished to hear repeated several times.

She left the court only to be married to Marin de La Guerre, organist of Saint-Louis des Jésuites, Saint-Séverin, and later of the Sainte-Chapelle. Soon after her marriage (1687) she published her first book, a collection of harpsichord pieces, of which, unhappily, not a single copy appears to exist to-day. The year 1691 appears to be the date of her ballet, 'Les Jeux à l'honneur de la victoire', prepared to celebrate the taking of Mons, and which does not seem to have been produced. She composed an opera for the Académie de Musique, 'Céphale et Procris', with a libretto by Duché. This work, which the 'Mercure' announced in 1691, was played in 1694, but with only moderate success. Leaving dramatic music, she (still called "Mademoiselle" de La Guerre, the title of Madame [then equivalent to "My Lady"] being reserved for women of quality) was smitten, like Couperin, by the Italian sonatas, the introduction of which into France had at that time excited the musicians and the concert-going public. She composed from this time her most notable works: new harpsichord pieces, published 1707; sonatas in three parts about 1695, of which the manuscript copies are in the Brossard Collection; sonatas for violin and bass, of which six were printed in 1707; and finally cantatas. Of these the first two books are dated 1708 and 1711. The third, belonging to the time after 1715, is dedicated to the Elector of Bavaria, who appears to have appreciated Mme de La Guerre and for whom, according to Brossard, she also wrote a pastoral, 'La Musette, ou les Bergers de Suresne', published anonymously in 1713. She assisted at that time at the Théâtre de la Foire, and there occurs in Le Sage's 'La Ceinture de Vénus' a comic duet of hers which had a great success. Among vocal religious works of hers is a 'Te Deum' for full choir, sung in the chapel of the Louvre in 1721 to celebrate the recovery of Louis XV.

She lived in L'Île Saint-Louis, at the corner of the Rue Regrattière, at least after 1704, the date of her husband's death. There she gave periodical concerts, which were much sought after and which ceased in 1716-17. Her skill as a harpsichordist, together with her compositions and her remarkable talent for improvisation, made her attractive to all. Later she lived in the Rue des Prouvaires, parish of Saint-Eustache, in which church she was buried on 28 June 1729, having died the previous day.

Her contemporaries have not belittled her; her fame was great, even outside her own country. Her opera and also her pastoral, 'Les Bergers de Suresne', if it really is by her, do not show a great deal of personality. One finds the pure style of Lully, with a gracious melodic vein, utilized not without spirit. But her keyboard pieces give evidence of subtle harmonic sentiment and refinement. They rank, without doubt, with the harpsichord compositions of the school of Chambonnières. Her sonatas, on the other hand, must stand among the best of those which the imitation of Corelli produced in France quite at the end of the 17th century. The sustained interest which presents their well-ordered development and their often original modulations puts them by the side of Couperin's sonatas. Her cantatas were among the first to be published in France, where this form, imitated, like the sonata, from Italy, had in the 18th century an enormous vogue. A dozen of them (the two first books) are written to words by the poet Houdar de La Motte, and their subjects are taken from the Bible. The three others are secular. For the most part they present, with brilliant symphonic interludes, airs of graceful form and varied expression, always closely allied to the texts which the author chose. The duet of 'Raccommodement de Pierrot et de Nicole', composed for the Théâtre de la Foire, which was published at the end of the 3rd volume, has a pleasant vis comica.

LAGUERRE, Jean¹ (b. ? London, c. 1700; d. London, 1748).

Anglo-French tenor singer. He was the son of Louis Laguerre, the artist who painted the greater part of Verrio's large picture in St. Bartholomew's Hospital, London, 'The Labours of Hercules' in chiaroscuro at Hampton Court, the staircase at Wilton, etc., and is immortalized by Pope in the line

Where sprawl the saints of Verrio and Laguerre.

This painter went to England in 1683 and died in 1721, his son Jean having, as it is supposed, been born about 1700. The lad was instructed by his father for his own profession, and had already shown some ability; but, having a talent for music, he took to the stage, where he met with fair success. He sang at concerts in 1723-25. It may have been he who, under the name of "Mr. Legar"², played the part of Metius in 'Camilla' (revived, 1726), which had formerly (1706 and 1708) been sung by Ramondon, a low tenor. Again, he is advertised ('Daily Journal', 13 Mar. 1731) as sustaining the added part of Corydon in Handel's 'Acis and Galatea', "for the benefit of M. Rochetti, at Lincoln's Inn, Theatre Royal, on Friday 26th", his name being spelt as in the cast of 'Camilla'. In 1733 he sang Mercury in John Durant Breval's mock-opera 'The Rape of Helen' (performed only once at Covent Garden, 19 May 1733). His name is correctly spelt in the libretto published four years later.

LA HALLE, Adam de¹ (b. Arras, c. 1240; d. ?; c. 1286).

French trouvère, nicknamed le bossu or le boiteux d'Arras. He is one of the most prominent figures in the long line of trouvères who contributed to the formation of the French language in the 12th and 13th centuries. Tradition asserts that he owed his nickname to a personal deformity; but he himself writes "On m'appelle bochu, mais je ne le suis mie". His father, Maître Henri, a well-to-do burgher attached to the sheriffdom of Arras, sent him to the Abbey of Vauxcelles near Cambrai, to be educated for holy orders; but, falling desperately in love with a "jeune demoiselle" named Marie, he evaded the tonsure and made her his wife. He soon effected a separation, however, went to Paris to complete his studies and retired, in 1263, to Douai², where he appears to have resumed the ecclesiastical habit. After this we hear little more of him, until the year 1282, when, by command of Philip the Bold, the Comte d'Artois, Robert II, accompanied the Duc d'Alençon to Naples, to aid the Duc d'Anjou in taking revenge for the Sicilian Vespers. Adam de La Halle, having entered Count Robert's service, accompanied him on this expedition and wrote some of his most important works for the entertainment of the French court in the Two Sicilies. A story of his death at Naples, between 1285 and 1288, is told by his contemporary, Jean Bodel d'Arras, in 'Le Gieus du Pelerin'; the statement in Prud'homme's 'Dictionnaire historique' that he returned to France and became a monk at Vauxcelles may therefore be incorrect.

The first of the compositions of his which are held to have been the beginning of opéra-comique was 'Le Jeu Adam, ou de la feuillée', performed at Arras about 1262; it is a piece³ of considerable freedom, not to say licence, and the author had to learn greater seemliness before he wrote his most interesting work. This was a dramatic pastoral entitled 'Le Jeu de Robin et de Marion', written for the French court at Naples, and first performed in 1275 or 1285. Ten personages appear in the piece, which is written in dialogue, divided into scenes and interspersed — after the manner of an opéra-comique — with airs, couplets and duos dialogués, pieces in which two voices sing alternately, but never together. The work was first printed by the Société des Bibliophiles de Paris in 1822 (30 copies only), from a manuscript in the Paris Bibliothèque Nationale; one of the airs is given in Kiesewetter's 'Schicksal und Beschaffenheit des weltlichen Gesanges' (Leipzig, 1841), and two were published by Tappert in 1874. In 1872 the works of Adam de La Halle were published by Coussemaker; and in June 1896 a performance of 'Le Jeu de Robin et Marion' was given at Arras in connection with the festivities in honour of the composer.⁴ The authentic text was edited by Ernest Langlois in 1896, and Julien Tiersot edited the complete work, adding accompaniments to the songs.

Adam de La Halle was a distinguished master of the chanson, of which he usually wrote both the words and the music. A manuscript⁵ of the 14th century, in the Paris Library, contains sixteen of his chansons a 3, in rondeau form, and six motets, written on a canto fermo, with florid counterpoint in the other parts. Combarieu speaks of seven motets; other poetical and musical works of his are found in manuscripts at Paris, Arras, Montpellier, Aix, Cambrai, Rome, Oxford and Siena. Kiesewetter printed one of them, and also one of the motets a 3, in the work mentioned.

LAHEE, Henry (b. London, 11 Apr. 1826; d. London, 29 Apr. 1912).

English organist and composer. He studied under Sterndale Bennett, Goss and Cipriani Potter, held the post of organist at Holy Trinity Church, Brompton, from 1847 to 1874, and was well known in London also as a professor and composer. Lahee was the victor in various prize competitions for glees and madrigals: in 1869 with 'Hark, how the birds' (Bristol); in 1878, with 'Hence, loathed melancholy', after Milton (Manchester); in 1879, with 'Away to the hunt' (Glasgow); in 1880 and 1884, with 'Love in my bosom' and 'Ah! woe is me' (London Madrigal Society). Equally good work can be seen in his other choral songs, such as 'The Unfaithful Shepherdess', 'Love me little, love me long' and the popular 'Bells', and in his anthems no less than in his various songs and instrumental pieces.

Good taste is shown by this composer in the choice of his words, and he found Longfellow congenial with his musical style. The cantata 'The Building of the Ship' was written in 1869 for John Curwen, who desired a work of moderate difficulty for the use of Tonic-Sol-faists. It was performed on a large scale in the Hanover Square Rooms, attained considerable popularity in the provinces and made its way to Africa and America. The subject of another cantata, Tennyson's 'The Sleeping Beauty', afforded Lahee scope for a greater variety of treatment, and contains some graceful writing for women's voices. L. M. M.

Netherlands composer. He was a choir-boy at Antwerp Cathedral and a pupil of Barbé (1) there, and later became a chorister at Soignies Cathedral. In 1560 he was sent to Madrid to join the royal chapel of Philip II, and he remained in Spain as a chorister for ten years. In 1570 he was sent back to the Netherlands to be enrolled as a student at the University of Louvain; but he left there on 28 Mar. 1572 to become choirmaster at the church of Saint-Rombaud at Mechlin in succession to Séverin Cornet. In 1573, while still there, he is mentioned as holding some clerical dignity at Toledo, but he was never a fully ordained priest. In 1576 he took two prizes at the competitions of Évreux, for the second-best motet, 'Nonne Deo subjecta', and the best chanson, 'Mais voyez mon cher esmoy'. About 1577 he obtained an appointment at Tournai Cathedral, and from there he dedicated eight masses to Philip II in Oct., published as 'Octo Missae, quinque, sex et septem vocum . . .' with Christophe Plantin of Antwerp the following year.¹ In 1578 he became a canon at Tournai and in 1581 prebendary; but he seems to have been at Arras by that time, and in 1582 he returned to Madrid to become chapel master in the royal chapel, where he improved the service list and enlarged it by having music copied for it. He held church benefices at Courtrai and elsewhere, but lost them on getting married about the early part of 1586. He became ill on 16 June of that year and was no longer alive on 19 Feb. 1587.

The eight Masses of 1577-78 are remarkable as being all missae parodiae, the motives being borrowed from the most celebrated motets of the great Netherlands masters. Thus there are 2 masses a 5 based on two motets by Lassus a 5, 'Oculi omnium' and 'Gustate et videte'; 2 masses a 6 based on two motets by Lassus a 6, 'Quare tristis es' and 'Fremuit Spiritus Jesu'; 2 masses a 7 based on Josquin's celebrated motets 'Praeter rerum seriem' and 'Benedicta coelorum regina'; 2 other masses a 5 based on Rore's 'In convertendo' and Crecquillon's 'Nigra sum sed formosa'. The whole work is thus a homage paid by La Hèle to his greater predecessors. A number of works of La Hèle are supposed to have perished in a fire at Madrid in 1734.

According to van der Straeten other known works by La Hèle are a Credo for 5 voices, a Kyrie a 5 and another a 6, two 4-part Passions, a 'Lamentatio Jeremiae' a 5 and another a 6, and 2 motets a 8 and one a 4. The printed 'Octo Missae' are in the libraries of Brussels (Bibl. Roy.), Antwerp (Musée Plantin), Tournai (Bibl. Comm.), Paris (Cons.), Vienna (State Lib.), Milan (Cath. Lib.), Cambrai, Rome (Sistine Chapel and Lateran) and Stockholm. Manuscript copies of the mass 'Fremuit Spiritus Jesu' are at Turin and Danzig. The Évreux prize motet is in a volume entitled 'Musici sacrum cantionum . . .' (Prague, 1593), to be found in London (B.M.), Berlin (State Lib.), Munich (State Lib.), Ratisbon (Proske Coll.), Cologne, Vienna (City Lib.) and Zwickau. The prize chanson is in Phalèse's volume 'Le Rossignol musical des chansons de divers auteurs' (Antwerp, 1598), which also contains another, 'Au contraire, vos beaux yeux', and is at Brussels (Bibl. Roy.), The Hague (Scheurleer Coll.) and Danzig (City Lib.).

LAHOUSAYE, Pierre (b. Paris, 12 Apr. 1735; d. Paris, 1818).

French violinist and composer. He was a pupil of André Noël Pagin (1721-?), who himself had been a pupil of Tartini, and during a long stay in Italy Lahoussaye took further lessons with the "maestro delle nazioni" at Padua. He stayed for some years at the court of Parma, playing in the court orchestra there under Traetta, and in 1768 went with Guglielmi to London, where he became leader at the King's Theatre. After his return to Paris he was appointed chef d'orchestre of the Concert Spirituel (under the directorship of the singer Joseph Legros) in 1777, a post he gave up in 1782 to become conductor of the Comédie-Italienne. In 1790 he changed over to the Théâtre de Monsieur (later Théâtre Feydeau); in 1801, on the amalgamation of the Favart and Feydeau theatres, he lost his post, and in his old age saw himself reduced to a second violin desk at the Opéra. For a few years he also held an appointment as professor at the Conservatoire. Fétis, who knew Lahoussaye personally, speaks of him in very sympathetic terms.

Of Lahoussaye's compositions only his Op. 1, consisting of 6 violin sonatas, was published (copy in B.M.). For the stage he wrote a

LAIDLAW, Robena Anna¹ (b. Bretton, Yorkshire, 30 Apr. 1819; d. London, 29 May 1901).

English pianist. She was educated in Edinburgh at the school of her aunt, and in music by Robert Müller, a pianoforte teacher there. Her family went to Königsberg in 1830, and there her vocation was decided. She improved in playing rapidly and in three or four years appeared in public in Berlin with great applause. In 1834 she was in London studying under Herz and played at Paganini's farewell concert. In 1836 she returned to Berlin, and played at a Gewandhaus concert at Leipzig on 2 July 1837. Soon afterwards Schumann distinguished her by the dedication of his 'Fantasiestücke', (Op. 12)², and she made the composer's acquaintance. After a lengthened tour through Prussia, Russia and Austria, she returned in 1840 to London. She was appointed in that year pianist to the Queen of Hanover. In 1855 she married a Mr. Thomson and retired. G.

LAJARTE, Théodore (Édouard Du-faure) de (b. Bordeaux, 10 July 1826; d. Paris, 20 June 1890).

French writer on music and composer. He was a pupil of Leborne at the Paris Conservatoire, and in early life wrote a good many small operettas, etc. ('Monsieur de Floridor', 1 act, Opéra-Comique, 11 Oct. 1880; 'Les Deux Jumeaux de Bergame', ballet, Opéra, 26 Jan. 1886), but was best known for his works on musical history. He published 'Bibliothèque musicale du Théâtre de l'Opéra' (2 vols. 1876-79), a very important catalogue of the operas produced at the Paris Opéra, with annotations based upon the archives of the institution; 'Instruments Sax et fanfares civiles' (1867); a 'Traité de composition musicale' (in collaboration with Bisson, 1880). He also edited a collection of 'Airs à danser' from Lully to Méhul and a number of old operas and ballets in vocal score, in nine series, comprising in all forty compositions, under the title of 'Chefs-d'œuvre classiques de l'Opéra français' (Paris) and 'Curiosités de l'Opéra' (1883).³ He was sub-librarian of the Opéra from 1873 to 1890. Academy of Music in Budapest under Victor Herzfeld (composition) and Árpád Szendy (pianoforte), and concurrently read law at the University, where he obtained a degree in 1913. In 1910 he became associated with Bartók's and Kodály's folk music movement and joined their collecting expeditions, which he has continued independently and in the company of folklorists ever since. On his early travels he visited Leipzig (1910), Geneva (1910-11) and Paris (1911-13), where his becoming acquainted with some of the leading musicians contributed to the widening of his experience and outlook. In 1913 he joined the staff of the Ethnographical Department of the Hungarian National Museum. His travels were interrupted in Aug. 1914, when, at the outbreak of the first world war, he returned to Hungary and joined the services. After the war, in 1919, he was appointed professor of composition and of chamber music, subsequently also of musical aesthetics and theory of Magyar music, at the National Conservatory in Budapest, of which he became hon. director after the second world war and where he remained until the institute ceased to function in 1949.

In 1926 Lajtha became choirmaster of the Goudimel Choir attached to the Budapest Congregation of the Calvinist (Presbyterian) Church. In 1929 he won the Coolidge Prize for his third string Quartet; from 1930 he was music expert of the Institute of Intellectual Co-operation, a League of Nations organization; and in 1932 he was appointed director of the music section of the Commission Internationale des Arts et Traditions Populaires. He organized a chamber orchestra in 1941 and conducted its performances until 1944. After the end of hostilities he was appointed director of the music department in the Hungarian Broadcasting Service in 1945.

In the years between the wars Lajtha travelled widely in Europe, appearing frequently in Paris, the place of his most important successes. In 1947, when the C.I.A.P. held its first post-war meeting in Paris, he took part in the deliberations which resulted in the setting up of the International Folk Music Council. In the same year he visited London, where he finished his important third Symphony and Variations for orchestra. In 1951 he was awarded the Hungarian State Kossuth Prize in recognition of his merits in connection with Hungarian folk music. The following year he was appointed professor-supervisor of musical folklore researches by the Budapest Academy of Music.

THE MUSIC.—Lajtha's musical personality occupies in many respects a unique position among Hungarian composers. Like Bartók and Kodály he is not only acknowledged as a composer of distinction, but also recognized as an authority on folk music; further, again like Bartók and Kodály, his activities have not been confined to creative and scientific work, but also included teaching: in this respect his influence is felt in the particular outlook of certain younger musicians. His main distinguishing characteristic, on the other hand, is his attachment to French — and generally to Latin — culture in sensibility and taste, discernible above all in the quality of his musical inspiration and in the manner of its expression. In this he is one of the few non-conformists among the personalities of Hungarian musical history, most of whose development was affected by German influences; while among living composers he is the only one who remains consistently faithful to French artistic ideals. Superior workmanship is the most prominent and consistent feature of his music; and the principle that "in all works of art the quality of craftsmanship is a decisive factor of evaluation" has always guided his artistic consideration. As a consequence his orchestral and chamber music respectively represent genuine works of their kind whose musical qualities cannot be divorced from their medium of expression.

Regarding the Hungarian accent, the influence of Magyar folk music is less obvious in his works than in those of Bartók and Kodály, chiefly because Lajtha was attracted by another aspect of the traditional materials: it is their melodic shape and form — viewed primarily as an objective musical element regardless of their peculiarly national characteristics — which inspired him. This conception admits a considerable stylistic freedom of treatment: thus the Magyar flavour succeeds in permeating equally his Italianized passages (e.g. the slow movement of the Sonatina for violin and pianoforte; 'Aria' in Sonata for cello and pianoforte), his sectional forms (couplets, rondeaux, etc.) modelled on classical French prototypes, dance movements and contrapuntal textures (fugues). This conception also permitted him to resort to popular tunes — some of which would not satisfy the modern definition of a folk tune — often assuming the understanding of an allusive quotation, and to subject them to "western" treatment, i.e. elaborate harmonization and contrapuntal development (e.g. especially the Serenade for string trio; also the Sinfonietta for string orchestra). Here is to be observed an unexpected affinity with the 19th-century "romantic" Hungarian composers, who also availed themselves of popular tunes and treated them in western (mainly German) fashion, and whose style and endeavours were vehemently rejected by the generation immediately following, to which Lajtha himself belongs.

survey of Lajtha's music reveals an almost unbroken continuity of development, in the early phases of which the harmonic aspects are stressed, giving place, during subsequent stages, to predominantly contrapuntal treatment and arriving in recent years at an equilibrium of craftsmanship and invention of exceptional clarity and directness. Seen from another standpoint, Lajtha's development may be characterized as a gradual assertion of melody.

Regarding the style of his harmony, the early works show a complex idiom derived from the experimental tendencies of the first decade of the 20th century: superimposed fourths, appoggiaturas and suspensions and other dissonant aggregates furnish the basis of chordal structure whose progression is predominantly chromatic. These are evident in his early pianoforte works, where the specific influences of Bartók and Debussy are also discernible; in addition the part-writing of his pianoforte Sonata, apart from its considerable harmonic complexities, is conceived in the grand virtuoso manner of Liszt. In his subsequent works, where the contrapuntal aspect is gradually gaining prominence, his harmony, though not relinquishing the advanced vocabulary, is subordinated to the horizontal elements. Discords are more purposefully used, and their tension values consequently become increased. Emergence of counterpoint has also led to a preoccupation with chamber combinations during a period which may be said to have started, approximately, with the years following the first world war and lasted up to about the mid-1930s. The most typical works, with the points previously mentioned well in evidence, are his third and fourth string Quartet, the second string Trio and the fifth string Quartet, which indicates a transition to his subsequent creative period. This was characterized, as far as harmony is concerned, by a return to a chordal structure of diatonic purity, in which Lajtha rediscovered the far from exhausted potentialities of the common chord. The new harmonic conception is evident in the extended D major passages of the 'Capriccio' and the sustained E♭ of his third Symphony. Nevertheless, Lajtha's is fundamentally a contrapuntal temperament. Even in his early works contrapuntal passages appear frequently, and their neatness and competence of treatment, although embryonic, provide a curious contrast to his harmonic extravagance.

In his second period horizontal elements dominate the field, manifesting themselves, above all, in the frequency of complete fugues expanding into independent movements, prolonged fugal and imitative passages, and of canonic treatment. The contrapuntal aspect is also evident in his particular treatment of figuration; though obviously instrumental in character, his invention shows a conspicuous melodic shapeliness. The primacy of horizontal values in these works also appears in the contrapuntally conditioned harmony which is derived from the interplay of the various polyphonic strains. In the earlier works of this period the resulting harmony is often bitonal or polytonal: thus in his chamber music with pianoforte, in which this treatment is particularly advantageous owing to the differentiation of colour. In the later works of this period, and also in more recent ones, his return to a simplified harmonic basis resulted in a more euphonious texture (chamber music with harp, 'Capriccio', third string Trio). The vitality of his counterpoint gains a great deal from the energy of his rhythmic drive: derived from folk-music impulses, Lajtha's symphonic music absorbed this element into a "civilized" musical speech much more readily than did Bartók's or Kodály's.

In his subsequent period the assertion of melodic values is his main concern. Seeking to display them in a suitable formal disposition has prompted him to investigate the designs of Italian and French 17th- and 18th-century composers; the titles of many of his movements — 'Aria', 'Strophes et ritournelles', etc. — indicates this attitude. The conspicuous simplification of musical grammar, concurrently with and in consequence of a superior technical accomplishment, produces in these works an equilibrium between transparency of expression and range of emotional sensibility, between technique and inspiration: a classical art in the truest sense of the word (Symphonies, especially the third, 'Sinfonietta' for strings, third string Trio, second Quartet for harp, violin, viola and cello).

SCHOLARSHIP. — Lajtha's folk-music investigation included the collecting of melodies from those districts which were left largely untouched by Bartók and Kodály. These explorations yielded many variants of the previously collected material which, together with not a few hitherto unknown tunes, supplemented the work of the two pioneers. Lajtha took a considerable share of the "laboratory work", conducted in the Ethnographical Museum, of transcribing melodies from phonograph recordings preserved there: he has been engaged in this almost continuously from the time of his joining the Society up to the present day. As a delegate of the Hungarian Ethnographical Society he took an active part in the memorable gramophone recording scheme undertaken jointly by the Society and the Hungarian Broadcasting Station in 1937. Among his numerous collecting expeditions those in the 1930s (Great Hungarian Plain and adjoining districts) and during the years 1940-44 (Transylvania) are the most important. The latter resulted in a particularly rich harvest: a representative selection of it was published in a Transylvanian periodical and an important part, whose evaluation may considerably modify the current view concerning the origin and development of Magyar music, was prepared for publication in 1950.

Lajtha's conception of folk music, shared by most students of the phenomenon, is of the "dynamic" school of thought and may be best summarized in his own words:

... la ... mélodie enregistrée mécaniquement ne donne qu'un instantané du chant vivant, alors que celui-ci, ayant essentiellement un caractère d'improvisation continue, modifie sinon essentiellement, du moins dans une mesure importante, ses éléments caractéristiques. La musique populaire vit d'une vie organique... elle change comme change par exemple le visage d'un homme à différents moments, différentes conditions, ou différents états d'âme (p. 11).

La musique populaire a créé dans ses chants, ses mélodies, ses airs de danse, un style qui est sorti de l'âme du peuple sans qu'on en décèle l'origine, et dont la tradition s'est perpétuée, modifiée involontairement au cours des siècles... (p. 17).

La musique populaire produit du nouveau, soit par un processus de variations, soit sous l'effet d'influences étrangères ou d'influences nationales artistiques (p. 19).¹

His interest in the subject led him to investigate other, related manifestations of folk art: he is a leading authority on folk dance. He also served the cause of folk music by taking part in many conferences and joining the international organizations. He participated, together with Bartók, in the first International Congress of Folk Art, held in Prague in 1928, at which their suggestions resulted in the adoption of a number of far-reaching resolutions. In fact the Congress constituted the first step towards the setting up of the International Folk Music Council, ante-dating its official foundation by some twenty years.

As a teacher Lajtha exercises an influence necessarily less than that of the professors at the State Academy, which absorbs by far the greater number of music students of the country; yet in encouraging his pupils to study the Latin musical culture he did a great service to the indigenous development of a healthy musical life. Being a professor of theory and practice of Hungarian music, he was the first to introduce folk music into the ordinary curriculum, based partly on Bartók's book ('Hungarian Folk Music') and partly on practical exercises in the Ethnographical Museum. In his composition class he insists on the investigation of modern, especially French music. In general he does not attach great importance to an academic, prescribed course of study, but relies on the intellectual curiosity of his students, which he stimulates with his sharp-witted conversation and by allowing free discussion of controversial points.

LAKATOS, István (i.e. Stephen) (b. Nagyzerlenc, Hungary [now Rumania], 26 Feb. 1895).

Hungarian critic and writer on music. Having terminated his studies at the Unitarian College of Kolozsvár, he matriculated at the Technical University, Budapest, in 1913 and received his civil engineering diploma there in 1922. Having returned to Kolozsvár (now Cluj, Rumania) he joined the technical staff of the Municipal Council, and in 1949 became director of the Department of High-roads there; he taught at the Technical College of that city between 1928 and 1936. He studied philosophy at the Kolozsvár University of Sciences and obtained the Ph.D. for his thesis 'A román népdal és irodalma' (see below) in 1938. He took an active part in the musical life of Cluj, by organizing two musical exhibitions (1941 and 1942) and founding a string quartet which, during the thirty years of its existence, introduced many new chamber works, including string quartets by Debussy, Lekeu, Malipiero, Milhaud, etc., to the public of that city. He has been music critic successively of various dailies and periodicals. His monographs and studies published independently and his numerous essays and studies contributed to periodicals disclose a great number of facts and details relating to the history of music in and the connections of various musicians with Transylvania. His most important writings are listed below.

LALANDE, Désiré (Alfred) (b. Paris, 5 Dec. 1866; d. London, 8 Nov. 1904).

French oboist. He was the son of a well-known bassoon player. After studying for two and a half years at the Paris Conservatoire he obtained his first important engagement under Lamoureux in that conductor's famous orchestra. He went to England in 1886, joined the Hallé Orchestra and played in Manchester for five years. He next joined the Scottish Orchestra when conducted by Henschel and subsequently became a member of the Queen's Hall Orchestra in London, with which organization he played till his death in London from pneumonia. It was during this latter part of his career that he may be said to have established his reputation completely as one of the most gifted instrumental players of his time, possessing, as he did, a beautiful tone, great powers of refined expression and a perfect technique. He was also constantly in request for cor anglais solos.

LALANDE, Henriette Méric. See MÉRIC-LALANDE.

LALANDE, Michel (Richard) de (b. Paris, Dec. 1657; d. Versailles, 18 June 1726).

French organist and composer. He was the fifteenth child of a tailor and was at first a chorister of the church of Saint-Germain l'Auxerrois, where he studied music under Chaperon and learnt, almost entirely by himself, to play the violin, bass viol, organ and harpsichord. When, on the breaking of his voice at the age of fifteen, he was obliged to leave the maîtrise, he bethought himself of turning his violin playing to account and applied for admission into Lully's orchestra. He was refused, and swore out of pique never to touch the violin again, giving substance to his resolution by breaking his instrument forthwith. He gave himself up to the organ and made such progress that he was soon appointed organist of four different churches in Paris — Saint-Gervais, Saint-Jean en Grève, Petit Saint-Antoine and that of the Jesuits of the Maison Professe, who confided to him the composition of symphonies for several of the tragedies performed at their college. He soon afterwards applied for the post of organist to the king, but though Lully pronounced him to be the best of the competitors, he was refused on account of his youth. His performance had, however, brought him to the notice of the Maréchal de Noailles, who engaged him to teach his eldest daughter and recommended him to Louis XIV, who chose him to superintend the musical education of the princesses, afterwards the Duchesse d'Orléans and Madame la Duchesse. In 1683, on the retirement of Du Mont and Robert, the post of surintendant de la chapelle royale was at first divided among four musicians, Couppillet, Minoret, Colasse and Lalande, who were to serve for three months by turns. This marked the starting-point of Lalande's successful career at court. He rose steadily through a number of different offices until by 1704 he was in complete control of the royal chapel and also director of the chamber music, serving as composer in both capacities. In 1684 the king had given him a wife, Anne Rébel, said to be the best singer of the court, had paid the expenses of the wedding and had presented a dowry to the bride. In 1722, having lost his wife and two gifted daughters, who died of smallpox in the same year as the dauphin (1711), Lalande begged the king to allow him to remit three-quarters of his salary as master of the royal chapel, and to return to the original arrangement of sharing the duties with others. He presented as his substitutes and assistants Campra, Bernier and Gervais. As a reward for his disinterested conduct the regent granted him a pension of three thousand livres. In the following year he married again — Mlle de Cury, daughter of one of the Princesse de Conti's surgeons — and he died three years later at the age of sixty-eight, having spent forty-five years in the service of the court.

Lalande's fame rests chiefly on the impressive collection of forty-two motets for chorus and orchestra, composed for the chapel at Versailles, which were published posthumously at the king's expense in 1729. These reveal a distinctive personality, in many respects far removed from the style of Lalande's illustrious predecessor Lully. Italian influence is equally strongly in evidence with both composers, but in Lalande it produced a brighter and clearer texture than in Lully, and a firmer, more balanced melodic line. Lalande was outstanding among his French contemporaries for his fluent and muscular handling of polyphony; his clean, energetic writing often achieves effects of real brilliance and exhilaration — qualities not otherwise predominant in the French church music of this period. Although Lalande had a definitely contrapuntal outlook, and therefore might have been expected to have been in reaction against current trends, his traditional technique is combined so skilfully with the more homophonic methods of the admired Italian style that he achieved far greater success than those that attempted a more servile imitation of popular models. His use of counterpoint is never academic, but always directed to an artistic end; his selection and treatment of counter-subjects is particularly felicitous. By keeping the soprano lines well up in their register he prevents his five-part polyphonic writing from becoming thick and heavy, and in the occasional passages in ten real parts the result is massive without being confused. The solos have often much elegance and charm; the declamation is perhaps inclined to be more flowing and persuasive than eloquent, but particular attention is paid to verbal rhythm and emphasis. Noteworthy is the widespread use of obbligato instruments (violin, oboe or flute) with the solo voices in the dialogue style which found its culmination in the arias of J. S. Bach. Lalande's use of the orchestra generally in these motets shows a lively appreciation of its resources and a careful regard for technical detail in matters such as bowing and figuration which is in advance of his time. The contents of this important series of volumes reveal a composer who is always an expert stylist and frequently much more than that. Lalande brought qualities to French church music comparable, in type if not in degree, to some of the contributions of Schütz to the German music in the preceding epoch.

Other church music by Lalande comprised three 'Leçons de ténèbres', a 'Miserere' for solo voice and a number of 'Symphonies des Noëls'—short interludes for violins, flutes and oboes played between the end of matins and midnight on Christmas Eve at Versailles. For secular court occasions he composed the following works: the cantata 'Le Concert d'Esculape' (1683), 'Ballet de la jeunesse' (Versailles, 1686), 'Le Palais de Flore, ou Le Trianon' (1689), 'L'Amour fléchi par la Constance' (Fontainebleau, 1697), 'Adonis', 'Les Fées' and 'Myrtil et Mélécerte' (1698), 'L'Hymen champêtre' (1700), 'Ballet de la paix' (1713), 'Les Folies de Cardenio' (Tuileries, 1720), 'Ballet de l'inconnu' (Paris, 1720), 'L'Amour berger', 'Églogue', 'Les Fontaines', the delightful 'Symphonies pour les soupers du roi', copied by Philidor in 1703 at the king's request, and other miscellaneous instrumental music, some of which appeared in the 'Recueil d'airs de violons' (1727).

LA LAURENCIE, Lionel de (b. Nantes, 24 July 1861; d. Paris, 21 Nov. 1933).

French musicologist. After following the study of law and of science he learnt the violin from Léon Reynier and harmony from Alphonse Weingartner and Bourgault-Ducoudray at the Paris Conservatoire in 1891-92. At the end of 1898 he devoted himself entirely to the study of music, gave some very popular courses at the École des Hautes Études Sociales, on such subjects as 'Quelques Maîtres de l'ancienne école de violon' (1906), 'Les Origines de l'opéra-comique' (1907), 'Le Ballet de cour avant Lully' (1910), 'Les Pastorales en musique au XVII^e siècle' (1911), 'Les Formes instrumentales' (1913). He also gave numerous lectures both in France and abroad.

La Laurencie contributed a number of articles to the 'Mercure musical' (1905-6), the review S.I.M., the 'Revue musicale', to the quarterly publications of the I.M.G., to the 'Rivista musicale italiana', and wrote a number of books, of which the best-known are 'Le Goût musical en France' (1905), 'Académie de musique et le concert de Nantes' (1906), 'Quelques Documents sur Jean Philippe Rameau et sa famille' (1907), 'Rameau' (1908) and 'L'École française de violon de Lully à Viotti' (3 vols., Paris, 1922-24). A later work, on the lutenists, was published in 1929 as 'Les Luthistes'. It is an excellent and authoritative work, giving evidence of sound research and vast erudition. Other later works by La Laurencie are 'Inventaire critique du fonds Blancheton à la Bibliothèque du Conservatoire' (2 vols., 1930-31); 'A. B. Bruni' (in collaboration) (1931); 'Orphée de Gluck' (1934); 'Catalogue des livres de musique de la Bibliothèque de l'Arsenal' (in collaboration with A. Gastoué) (1936). He was also responsible for the introduction to 'Airs au luth . . . du XVI^e siècle' (Pub. Soc. Franç. Musicol., Series i, Vol. IV).

La Laurencie was president at different times of the Société Française de Musicologie, of which he was one of the founders, and he succeeded Lavignac as editor of the 'Encyclopédie de la Musique et Dictionnaire du Conservatoire'.

LALEWICZ, George (orig. Jerzy) (b. Suwalki, Poland, 21 Aug. 1875; d. Buenos Aires, 1 Dec. 1951).

Argentine (naturalized) pianist. He was a pupil of Annette Essipov for pianoforte and of Liadov and Rimsky-Korsakov for composition in St. Petersburg. In 1900 he won the Anton Rubinstein competition in Vienna, and he was professor of pianoforte at the Odessa Conservatory (1902-5), Cracow Conservatory (1905-12) and the Vienna Imperial Academy (1912-19). He toured extensively all over Europe from 1905 to 1914. In 1921 he became professor at the Conservatorio Nacional in Buenos Aires. Among his pupils were Arthur Rodzinsky, Miesyslaw Munz, Sygmunt Dygat, Leo Podolsky, Herbert Renison, Lia Cimaglia and Pia Sebastiani.

LALO, (Victor Antoine) Édouard (b. Lille, 27 Jan. 1823; d. Paris, 22 Apr. 1892).

French composer of Spanish descent. He studied at the Lille Conservatory under Müller for violin, and for cello under a German named Baumann, who had played in Vienna under Beethoven. Sent to Paris in 1839, he entered the Conservatoire, in Habeneck's violin class, and studied composition privately with the pianist Schulhoff and the composer Crèveœur. He then played the viola in the Armingaud-Jacquard Quartet from its foundation (1855).

His first compositions date from about 1845, and he published in 1848 and 1849 songs bearing the mark of this period. He competed at the Théâtre-Lyrique in 1867 with an opera, 'Fiesque' (1866), which took a third place; it was subsequently printed and partly performed at the Concert National in 1873. The ballet music from this work, under the title of 'Divertissement', was given with great success at the Concert Populaire of 8 Dec. 1872. Lalo next composed a violin Concerto in F major, played by Sarasate at the Concert National of 18 Jan. 1874 (and at the London Philharmonic Society the following May), and a 'Symphonie espagnole' for violin and orchestra, played by the same artist at the Concert Populaire of 7 Feb. 1875.

After these two great successes, which gave Lalo a front-rank position as a composer for the concert-room, he produced an 'Allegro symphonique', the overture to his opera 'Le Roi d'Ys', a cello concerto, played by Fischer at the Concert Populaire in 1877, a Scherzo² for orchestra (all performed in Paris), and a 'Fantaisie norvégienne'³ for violin and orchestra, first given in Berlin. His 'Rapsodie norvégienne' and his 'Concerto russe', the latter played by Marsick at the Concert Populaire, were the last important works for the concert-room written before his ballet 'Namouna', performed at the Opéra on 6 Mar. 1882. This work has something of a symphonic style and is orchestrated in a manner far superior to that of many more popular ballets, but it was coldly received by the public. 'Namouna' was given only fifteen times, but when transferred to the concert-room in the form of an orchestral suite in five movements it achieved the success it deserved. An andantino and two other movements from it, arranged for violin and orchestra, were also received with favour at the Concerts Modernes, and a Serenade, arranged for four stringed instruments, was also successful.

After this reparation for his former failure, Lalo again set to work and orchestrated the whole of his 'Roi d'Ys', of which the general plan had been sketched some five or six years before, and wrote a Symphony in G minor, performed at the Lamoureux concert of Feb. 1887, which was much praised by musicians. The opera was produced at the Opéra-Comique on 7 May 1888, with well-deserved success.⁴

Apart from stage and orchestral works Lalo produced chamber music and songs. Some of his instrumental music gained a reputation in Germany as well as in France, though his dramatic work received but tardy recognition. His talent was of an extremely individual kind and was formed, not by the discipline of the Conservatoire, nor by the influence of professors, but by the direct study of such masters as Beethoven, Schubert and Schumann, for whom he had a special predilection. His chief characteristics were the expressive grace of certain ideas, the piquancy of some of his themes and, above all, the richness and skill of his orchestration.

Lalo was one of the most distinguished of French composers of his time and fully deserved the decoration of the Legion of Honour conferred upon him in July 1880.

LALO, Pierre (b. Puteaux, Seine, 6 Sept. 1866; d. Paris, 9 June 1943).

French critic, son of the preceding. He was a contributor to the 'Journal des Débats' and first appeared as music critic with an article on d'Indy's 'Fervaal' in the 'Revue de Paris' of 15 May 1898. He succeeded J. Weber as music critic of 'Le Temps' in

Oct. of that year, his own successor in that post, when he retired in 1914, being Henri Malherbe. Lalo published a selection of his articles in 'La Musique' (Paris, 1898-99) and another book, 'De Rameau à Ravel: portraits et souvenirs', appeared posthumously (Paris, 1947).
 M. L. P., adds.

LALOUETTE (Lallouette), Jean François (b. Paris, 1651; d. Paris, 31 Aug. 1728¹).

French violinist, conductor and composer. He was a pupil of Lully for composition and of Guy Leclerc for violin. In the Carnival of 1677² he composed intermèdes for a private performance in Paris of a comedy by Desbrosses and Verneuil. He was violinist and afterwards conductor at the Opéra (1668-77), but was dismissed for having claimed collaboration in Lully's 'Isis'. He then became chapel master of Rouen Cathedral in Mar. 1693 and, in 1695, of Notre-Dame at Versailles.

Lalouette wrote interludes and ballets for the Opéra as well as church music in the later stages of his career. A book of 'Motets à 1, 2 et 3 voix' was published in his lifetime (1726) and another containing "le psalme 'Miserere' . . . et l'hymne 'Veni Creator'" appeared posthumously (1730). There is a Mass of his in manuscript.

LALOY, Louis (b. Grey, Haute-Saône, 18 Feb. 1874; d. Dôle, 3 Mar. 1944).

French musicologist and critic. He studied at the Schola Cantorum in Paris from 1899 to 1905 and later contributed to the 'Revue Musicale', the 'Mercure Musical', 'Comœdia' and numerous other journals. In 1906-7 he lectured at the Sorbonne. In 1914 he became Secrétaire Général of the Opéra, and in 1936 he was appointed professor of the history of music at the Paris Conservatoire. Among his published works are 'Aristoxène de Tarente et la musique de l'antiquité' (1904), 'Rameau' (1908), 'Cl. Debussy' (1907) and 'La Musique chinoise' (1912). He also translated Guido Adler's 'Richard Wagner' into French (1910).

LAMBARDI. Italian family of musicians.

(1) Camillo Lambardi (b. Naples, c. 1560; d. Naples, 1634), tenor singer and composer. He married Lucrezia Esposito in 1579 and was admitted as tenor to the Santa Casa dell' Annunziata at Naples, where he was a pupil of Gian Domenico da Nola. On the latter's retirement in 1588 Lambardi took on the chapel master's duties. He was not officially appointed maestro di cappella, however, until 5 May 1592, with the approval of the organists, Scipione Stella and Jean de Macque, on condition that he obeyed their instructions and performed only their music, and not his own. But on 24 May 1595, by which time they had both left the service of the Annunziata, he was allowed to perform his own music also. His salary was increased on 8 Oct. 1614. He was a much respected musician and published church music for Holy Week for 2 choirs (1592), 2 books of madrigals, etc.

F. W. (ii).

(2) Francesco Lambardi (b. Naples, 1587; d. Naples, July 1642), son of the preceding. In 1599 he was a sopranello in the Santa Casa dell' Annunziata at Naples, where he next became a tenor and then organist in the royal chapel. He concurrently filled both employments until 1615, when he was appointed first organist, a post he held until 1636, except for a break in 1624. In the last years of this period his brother Giacinto assisted him. He published three sets of 'Villanelle' for 3-5 voices (Naples, 1607; 1614, reprinted 1618; and 1616), which also contained a few solo songs with continuo. The partbooks are widely dispersed and hardly a complete copy exists in any one library. The prefaces reveal connections with the family of Carlo Gesualdo, and the last book preserves music which had been commissioned for use in the royal palace at Naples. Certain of Lambardi's songs may be found complete in collections of Scipione Lacorcia, Girolamo Montesardo, Camillo Lambardi (an older relation) and others.

(3) Andrea Lambardi (b. Naples, ?; d. Naples, 1629), brother of the preceding. As a boy he was sopranino singer at the Santa Casa dell' Annunziata under his father, and later he became a tenor in the Neapolitan royal chapel.

(4) Giacinto Lambardi (b. Naples, ?; d. ? Naples, ?), brother of the preceding. He is known only as the composer of the music for a mascherata, 'Monte Parnaso', performed at Naples in 1630, the first attempt at anything in the nature of opera in that city.

F. W. (ii).

LAMBARDI, Girolamo (b. ?; d. Venice, ?).

Italian 16th-17th-century composer. Nothing is known of his life: some call him a pupil of Palestrina, others of Zarlino. He left a large quantity of church music.

LAMBE, Walter (b. ?; d. ?).

English 15th-century composer. The Eton Manuscript includes the following motets by Lambe:

'Ascendit Christus', a 4; 'Gaude flore virginali', a 4; 'Nesciens mater', a 5 (end missing); 'O Maria plena gratiae', a 6 (end missing); 'O regina coelestis gloriae', a 5; 'Salve regina', a 5; 'Stella coeli', a 4; and a Magnificat a 5.

Lost from the Eton Manuscript are:

'Gaude flore virginali', a 5; 'O virgo virginum praeclara', a 4; and 'Virgo gaude gloriosa', a 5.

At Lambeth Palace (MS 1) are:

'O Maria plena gratiae', a 6, and 'Gaude flore virginali', a 5, without name but probably by Lambe, as it is next to 'O Maria' and is among the lost motets of the Eton Manuscript.

"An Inventarye of the Pryke Songys longynge to the Kyngys College in Cambraye" (1529), printed in 'The Ecclesiologist' for Apr. 1863, refers to "6 bokys of parchmente conteynyng Wa[l]ter Lambes Exultavit". This is presumably a 6-part Magnificat differing from that at Eton. The presence of the 3-part Sanctus by one Lambe in the Old Hall Manuscript shows either that there were two composers of this name or that Lambe is of an earlier generation than any of the Eton composers except Dunstable. If there was only one Lambe, he was either a contemporary of Dunstable, Power and Bedyngham (which his music in the Eton manuscript makes it clear that he was not) or one of a small group of composers who link these names with the Fayrfax school. W. Barclay Squire¹ refers to a man of this name in a list of the clerks of St. George's, Windsor, from 1468 to 1479. At 'Nesciens Mater' in the Eton

Manuscript Lambe is described as "de Coll. Magd. Oxon".

'O Maria plena gratiae' is scored by H. B. Collins and is in the Oratory collection at Birmingham; a copy of this, with apparatus from the Eton Manuscript (Collins used Lambeth only) is at Nashdom Abbey. Part was broadcast in the History of Music in Sound, 1948.

LAMBELET, George (b. Corfu, 24 Dec. 1875; d. Athens, 30 Oct. 1945).

Greek composer and musicologist. He belonged to a musical family. His father, Edward Lambelet (Corfu, 1820-1903), was a composer; his elder brother Napoleon (Corfu, 1864-London, 1932), also a composer, exercised a certain influence in Greece towards the end of the 19th century and was honoured with the National Medal of Letters and Arts.

George Lambelet studied at Naples for seven years; he returned to Greece and settled in Athens in 1901. He was perhaps the first Greek musician to understand in all its extent the value of Greek folk music and the resources it offered for the creation of a national school, and he published enlightened studies on these lines. His first study, 'National Music', appeared as early as 1901 in the magazine 'Panathenaea' (Vol. III). Other studies on various subjects were published in the 'Critique', a magazine he edited with the composer George Axiotis (1875-1924), in the 'Musical Chronicles' he edited with J. Papadopoulos, in 'Nea Estia' and elsewhere. Mention may be made of the following: 'Language and Music' ('Musical Chronicles', Apr. 1928), 'Greek Music and the Subdivisions of the Tone' (M. Chron., 1929) and 'The Spirit of Music in the Ancient Greek Tragedy' ('N. Estia', July, Aug. 1940). He also published the booklets 'Music and Poetry' (Athens, 1926) and 'Nationalism in Art and Greek Folk Music' (Athens, 1928). His chief musicological work, however, was 'La Musique populaire grecque' (Athens, 1934), containing 60 Greek folksongs and dances harmonized, with an interesting critical study (on Greek scales, harmonization, etc.) edited in French and Greek by the Greek Ministry for Foreign Affairs; Lambelet was awarded a prize by the Academy of Athens (24 Mar. 1940) for this work. He harmonized in all 100 folksongs of which 40 appeared on records.

As a composer Lambelet was consistent with his principles as musicologist, and his music is deeply national in its characteristics. He was chiefly a song-writer and left some interesting songs, like 'Lacrymae rerum' and 'The Flower crowned'. Of his choral works 'The Hymn to Peace' was first performed on the occasion of the 27th Peace Conference held in Athens (Oct. 1929) and the 'Balkan Hymn' together with the 'Hymn to Peace' and the symphonic poem 'The Feast' under D. Mitropoulos on the occasion of the First Balkan Congress (Oct. 1930). He published two collections of poems, 'Verses' (1909) and 'Old and New Rhythms' (1930). He received the Greek National Medal for Letters and Arts.

Further compositions are: 'Prayer' for women's voices with orchestra or pianoforte, 'Hymn to Greece', 'In the Field' and other choral works; 'Feast', 'Elegy' and 'Dirge' for orchestra; Fugue for string quartet and orchestra. Also a collection of school songs with pianoforte, 'The Swallows', to poems by Papantoniou, many songs and some pianoforte pieces.

LAMBERT, Aleksander (b. Warsaw, 1 Nov. 1862; d. New York, 31 Dec. 1929).

Polish pianist and composer. After receiving his first lessons from his father he was sent to Vienna with recommendations from Leschetizky and Rubinstein, where he studied with Epstein (pianoforte) and Bruckner (composition), and graduated with high honours in 1879. He spent then three years on concentrated studies alone, and afterwards moved to Weimar, then the musical Mecca of Liszt. In 1883 he was nominated to the post of pianoforte teacher at the Berlin New Academy. Besides his pedagogic activities he appeared frequently on the concert platform with Joachim in Germany and Sarasate in Russia. He visited the U.S.A. in 1880 and again in 1884, appearing as soloist with the New York, Boston and other big American orchestras, as well as giving many pianoforte recitals. He accepted an offer to become director of the New York College of Music (1887-1905), and afterwards he taught there privately.

Lambert's works, mainly for the pianoforte, also include a 'Piano Method for Beginners' and a 'Systematic Course of Studies' (in 3 vols., 1907), which have been widely used.

C. R. H.

LAMBERT, Constant (b. London, 23 Aug. 1905; d. London, 21 Aug. 1951).

English composer, conductor and writer on music. He came from an artistic family, his father, George Washington Lambert, being a painter (an A.R.A.), and his brother, Maurice Lambert, a sculptor. He was educated at Christ's Hospital and at the R.C.M. in London, where he studied under at least two distinguished teachers, R. O. Morris and Vaughan Williams. It was while he was still a student at the College that the painter Edmund Dulac introduced him to Diaghilev who, with his remarkable perception of talent, immediately commissioned him to write a ballet for his company. (He was the first English composer to be so honoured.) This ballet was 'Romeo and Juliet', a work in two tableaux which depicted the members of a ballet school rehearsing scenes from the tragedy, at the conclusion of which the hero and heroine, lovers in actual fact, elope in an aeroplane. The choreography was by Nizhinska, and the ballet was first produced at Monte Carlo on 4 May 1926. The music consists of 13 short movements, each in an old musical form (e.g. Gavotte and Trio, Siciliana, Musette) invigoratingly filled by the composer's light but sure writing. In this early music by Lambert there is much evidence of his respect for "accepted" composers (the finale begins with a theme that might have been written by Domenico Scarlatti); but he did not hesitate to use such modern devices as jazzy displacements of accents and passages of polytonality. An expert hand in counterpoint is also to be noted.

Shortly before the first performance of 'Romeo and Juliet' Lambert had become known as a reciter in the first public performances of the revised settings by Walton of Edith Sitwell's 'Façade' poems, and Lambert's next composition was partly written in the Derbyshire home of the Sitwell family. This work was another ballet, 'Pomona', which may be described as a Latin pastoral depicting the finally successful wooing of Pomona, the goddess of fruit, by the god Vertumnus. The choreography was again by Nizhinska, who produced the work at its first performance in Buenos Aires on 9 Sept. 1927. The music for the ballet (which is in one act) consists of eight movements scored for a small orchestra. It has a cool, refreshing and undisturbing quality which had only been hinted at in the previous work. A dance suite from it has been played in the concert-hall.

'Pomona' was composed in the earlier part of 1926, and in the later months of the year Lambert set eight poems by Li-Po in the translation of Shigeyoshi Obata. The accompaniment of these songs in the original version was scored for flute, oboe, clarinet, string quartet and double bass, but this was later condensed into pianoforte score, in which form the work was published. The first set ('A Summer Day'; 'Nocturne'; 'With a Man of Leisure'; 'Lines') came out in 1927; the second ('The Ruin of the Ku-Su Palace'; 'The Intruder'; 'On the City Street') in 1928, and the remaining song ('The Long-Departed Lover') in 1930. All the songs are dedicated to the Chinese film actress Anna May Wong.

In 1927 Lambert composed what has remained his most important "pure" orchestral work, 'Music for Orchestra'. Scored for large orchestra, it was recognized as a full development of the contrapuntal facility which had shown itself in Lambert's earlier ballets.

It is often regarded as having had a liberating and purifying influence on the younger composers of the time. 'Music for Orchestra' was dedicated to Lord Berners.

Lambert was interested in and influenced by jazz, and in 1927 he began to absorb it systematically and to use the influence in his compositions. The first of these works was the 'Elegiac Blues' written in memory of Florence Mills for small orchestra or pianoforte, and the second was begun in the same year. This was to become the most famous of all his works — 'The Rio Grande', a poem by Sacheverell Sitwell set for solo pianoforte, chorus and orchestra (which excluded all woodwind instruments but included an enlarged percussion section). It was first performed at Manchester on 12 Dec. 1929 with Sir Hamilton Harty playing the solo part. The second performance took place on the following day at Queen's Hall in London. It was an immediate success, and the audiences of the time found the combination of the popular idiom and the brilliant choral and orchestral writing most appealing; and it has proved not to be as ephemeral as much work written in the idiom.

Between 1928 and 1931 Lambert's attention as a composer was concentrated on the writing of two large pianoforte works — a Sonata and a Concerto. They both have as a basis the alert jazzy idiom which Lambert had evolved in 'The Rio Grande'. The keyboard writing in the Sonata is indeed very similar to that in the cadenzas of the earlier work. But there is in both the later compositions a deep seriousness and an intellectual vigour which were not so obvious in the sprightly, rather satirical 'Rio Grande'. It is perhaps significant that the influence of Bernard van Dieren becomes most evident in these works. The Concerto, which has some deeply moving passages, especially in the second movement, is dedicated to the memory of Lambert's friend Philip Heseltine, who died in 1930. It is in three movements ('Overture', 'Intermède' and 'Finale') and the instrumental accompaniment is scored for nine players (flute-piccolo, three clarinets, trumpet, trombone, cello, double bass and percussion). Perhaps because of the unusual combination of instruments required for performance the work has rarely been played.

In 1930 Lambert returned to the ballet. The Camargo Society was formed in London in that year with the intention of continuing the work of Diaghilev, who had recently died. It chose Lambert to be its conductor. This was the beginning of a long and famous connection with the art of the ballet, which involved so much work that he was left with very little time to devote to composition. While working for the Society, Lambert directed the performance of Vaughan Williams's 'Job: a Masque for Dancing' in his own version for theatre orchestra at the 1931 I.S.C.M. Festival at Oxford. Out of the Society grew the Vic-Wells Ballet Company, and Lambert became the musical director of it at its inception and remained with it until his resignation in 1947.

Owing to his activities as conductor and critic, Lambert, from the completion of the pianoforte Concerto onwards, composed sparingly — although he received the Collard Fellowship of the Musicians' Company in 1934. The composition of 'Summer's Last Will and Testament', his largest work, was spread over more than three years. This masque is a concert work "for orchestra, chorus and baritone solo", based on the "pleasant comedy" of the same name by Thomas Nashe (1593). It was first performed at a B.B.C. Symphony Concert in London on 29 Jan. 1936, the composer conducting. It is a remarkable work, as diverse in its scope as was the Elizabethan London which housed and inspired Nashe, and it exhibits Lambert's most mature style. The contrapuntal texture of the large and elaborate score shows how much Lambert had developed since his last work had appeared, but the old titles of the movements are reminiscent of the earliest ballets. The masque begins with an orchestral 'Intrata', and the chorus joins the orchestra in the next four movements ('Madrigal con ritornelli', 'Coranto', 'Brawles', 'Madrigal con ritornelli'). The orchestra alone then plays a 'Rondo Burlesca' called 'King Pest', which is based not only on Nashe, but also on Edgar Allan Poe's short story of the same name. This section has been performed as a separate work. Then the baritone soloist, chorus and orchestra conclude the work with a 'Saraband' which expresses the effects of the ravages of the plague described in the previous movement. The terrifying nature of this section (with its reiterated "Lord have mercy on us") is of more than transient beauty and most memorable in performance.

Lambert's next composition was another one-act ballet: 'Horoscope'. Based on zodiacal theories, it depicts the love-story of a man (born with the sun in Leo and the moon in Gemini) and a woman (born with the moon in Gemini but the sun in Virgo). The opposing signs, Leo and Virgo, struggle to keep them apart, but they are finally brought together by the Gemini and the moon. The ballet, for which the choreography was devised by Frederick Ashton, was first produced in London, at Sadler's Wells, on 27 Jan. 1938. The music was a fulfilment in Lambert's maturer style of the promise shown in the earlier ballets: all influences were fully assimilated, and the music is very satisfying. A concert suite from it has been frequently performed, but this does not include the opening eerie 'Palindrome', which is one of the few musical specimens of this form, and certainly the most successful.

The two most notable compositions after 'Horoscope' were the setting for male-voice choir and strings of the dirge from Shakespeare's 'Cymbeline', composed in 1940 and dedicated to Patrick Hadley, and the orchestral 'Aubade héroïque' (1942). The latter work was inspired by the calm of the sunlit morning when the composer and the Vic-Wells Ballet Company were escaping from the invading Germans in Holland in 1940. Lambert admirably captured the disturbing presence of war in his pastoral music. The work was dedicated to Vaughan Williams on his seventieth birthday (1942).

Lambert later composed scores for two films: 'Merchant Seamen' (1943) and 'Anna Karenina' (1947). Both excellent for their original purpose, a suite from the former has been played with success in the concert-hall.

Despite all this activity as a composer, however, Lambert came to be known to the public less as a composer than as a conductor, and his work for the Vic-Wells Ballet did much to emphasize this. He arranged, orchestrated and directed ballets for them and incidentally raised to popularity many little-known works (e.g. the score he arranged from Meyerbeer for 'Les Patineurs'; that from Purcell for 'Comus'; that from William Boyce for 'The Prospect before Us'; and very many others — including an arrangement for pianoforte and orchestra of Liszt's 'Dante' Sonata). His work with the ballet company included conducting for such outstanding events as their performances at the Paris Exhibition of 1937, the gala performance before the King and Queen in honour of the French President in 1939 and the performances in Holland when the Germans began the invasion in 1940. During the early part of the war he devoted most of his time to accompanying ballet performances at the pianoforte.

He gradually became known as a conductor in his own right, however, and his skilled interpretations of a wide range of works (including many "light" works and complex modern music) led to his being appointed associate conductor for two seasons of Promenade Concerts (1945 and 1946), and subsequently to his conducting many rarely performed works on the B.B.C.'s Third Programme.

Apart from all the arranging he undertook as a matter of course for the ballet, he also found time to transcribe (and thus resuscitate) works by William Boyce, Handel and Thomas Roseingrave, among others. His critical writings, always acute in thought and well written, appeared in 'Figaro', 'The New Statesman and Nation' and 'The Sunday Referee'; but his most famous work in this direction is the provocative and eminently readable 'Music Ho!: A Study of Music in Decline', which was published in 1934 and had the unusual honour (for a book on music of this kind) to be reissued in a popular paperbacked series (1948). He also contributed light essays on non-musical topics to magazines.

His work in these varied activities established him as one of the most brilliant and versatile musicians of his time, and his announced intention of devoting more time to composition from 1950 onwards was eagerly received, but unhappily frustrated by his too early death.

LAMBERT, George Jackson (b. Beverley, Yorkshire, 16 Nov. 1794; d. Beverley, 24 Jan. 1880).

English organist and composer. He studied under his father until he was sixteen, then in London under Samuel Thomas Lyon, and finally he became a pupil of Crotch. In 1818 he succeeded his father (d. 15 July) at Beverley. His compositions include overtures, instrumental chamber music, organ fugues, piano-forte pieces, etc. In 1874 ill-health and deafness compelled him to relinquish his post and retire from active life.

The two Lamberts successively held the office of organist of Beverley Minster for the long period of ninety-six years, the father for forty and the son for fifty-six years, and but for the latter's deafness would have held it for a century, a circumstance probably unparalleled.

W. H. H.

LAMBERT, Herbert (b. Bath, 22 Dec. 1881; d. Bath, 7 Mar. 1936).

English clavichord and harpsichord maker. The 20th-century revival of interest in the keyboard instruments preceding the piano-forte, which owed its inception to the scholarship and enthusiasm of Arnold Dolmetsch, received after the 1914-18 war a marked stimulus not only from the demand for accuracy in the performance of music written for these instruments and the familiarization of their distinctive tones by means of broadcasting, but equally from the fact that craftsmen interested themselves in the making and reconditioning of harpsichords and clavichords. Among the craftsmen attracted to the movement the name of Herbert Lambert is remembered for his notable technical achievements in instrument making; for while he was by profession a photographer of the first rank, he was by instinct a craftsman and by nature an experimentalist. To improvements in the construction of the clavichord especially he devoted hours of research in his workshop at Combe Down near Bath, accepting nothing on the grounds of tradition and rejecting only when modern theories and materials enabled him to produce that particular quality of tone he strove after and obtained. His success was due to the substitution of thinner strings, a genius for fine adjustment and an instinctive feeling for correct proportions. His experiments in stringing led him to make a most important contribution to the history of instrument making — an easily portable clavichord. These exquisite little instruments, of the old Italian pentagonal spinet shape, were necessarily equipped with considerably shorter strings, and Lambert discovered that by the use of single gold strings for the upper notes the volume of tone was almost equivalent to that in the clavichord of traditional size, and the beauty of tone was actually enhanced. To have provided the keyboard player with an instrument which is as easily carried as a suitcase may justly be counted a real achievement.

Lambert's untimely death at the age of fifty-four interrupted constructional experiments on a harpsichord which he was building in the light of an intensive study of various instruments made by the famous Ruckers family. In this instrument he was assisted by T. R. C. Goff, with whom he discussed his technical innovations. Lambert's name is perpetuated in a small book of compositions for the clavichord written in 1928 by Herbert Howells and entitled 'Lambert's Clavichord'.

LAMBERT, Lucien (b. Paris, Jan. 1858; d. Oporto, 21 Jan. 1945).

French pianist and composer. He began his musical studies with his father and had a successful career as a pianoforte virtuoso in America and on the continent. On returning to Paris he worked with Massenet and Théodore Dubois and produced 'Prométhée enchaîné', a scène lyrique which gained the Rossini prize of the Institut (Conservatoire, 19 Apr. 1885); 'Sire Olaf', incidental music for a play by A. Alexandre, given at Lille in 1887 and in Paris 1888; 'Brocéliande', a 4-act opera, Rouen, 25 Feb. 1893, the overture to which became widely popular; 'Le Spahi', in 4 acts, Opéra-Comique, Paris, 18 Oct. 1897; 'La Marseillaise', Paris, 14 July 1900; 'La Flamenca', in 4 acts, at the Théâtre de la Gaité, Paris, 31 Oct. 1903; 'La Roussalka', ballet, Opéra, Paris, 8 Dec. 1911; two more operas, 'Penticosa' and 'La Sorcière', were not produced. In the concert-room Lambert was represented by an 'Andante et fantaisie tzigane' for pianoforte and orchestra, 'Tanger le soir', a Moorish rhapsody for orchestra, and other things, most of which were heard for the first time at the Société Nationale de Musique. He also published songs, pianoforte pieces, etc.

Italian 16th-17th-century singer and composer. He was a priest and became treasurer of the cathedral of San Petronio at Bologna, to which he was also attached as a singer for a very long period. Among his compositions are a book of madrigals (1560), 7 penitential psalms (1569) and villotte, etc., in collective volumes. E. v. d. s.

LAMBERTINI, Luiz Joaquim (orig. Luigi Gioacchino) (b. Bologna, 17 Mar. 1790; d. Lisbon, 13 Nov. 1864).

Portuguese pianoforte manufacturer of Italian birth. He was related to the celebrated Cardinal Lambertini, Archbishop of Bologna, who became Pope Benedict XIV, and is said to have been a fellow-student of Rossini and an excellent pianist. In 1836 he left Italy for Portugal and by 1838 had established his business in Lisbon, where it still exists.

A descendant of Luiz Joaquim, Michel Angelo Lambertini, is known as a historian and writer on Portuguese music.

LAMBETH, Henry Albert (b. Hardway nr. Gosport, 16 Jan. 1822; d. Glasgow, 27 June 1895).

English organist, conductor and composer. He studied for some time under Thomas Adams, went to Glasgow about 1853 as city organist, on the recommendation of Henry Smart, and in 1859 was appointed conductor of the Glasgow Choral Union. This post he held till 1880. In 1874 he formed a choir of from 20 to 30 selected voices, and in the department of Scottish music their concerts met with great success under the name of the Glasgow Select Choir. He left this society in 1878.

Lambeth harmonized several of the best Scottish melodies in a most effective manner. He composed several songs and pianoforte pieces, also settings of Psalms LXXXVI and CXXXVII, both of which were performed by the Glasgow Choral Union. He was organist and choirmaster successively at St. Mary's Episcopal Church and at Park Church. He edited the 'Scottish Book of Praise' with D. Baptie in 1876. W. H. (ii).

LAMENT. In Scottish and Irish folk music are melodies named "Laments" or "Lamentations". In Scottish music these were mainly confined to the Highlands, and were generally purely bagpipe tunes, consisting of an air, sometimes set vocally, with a number of more or less irregular variations or additional passages. Each of the clans or important families had its particular "lament" as well as its "gathering", and the former was played on occasions of death or calamity. Many of the laments are of wild and pathetic beauty: 'McGregor a ruaro' and 'MacCrimmon's Lament' are among those which have become more widely familiar.

The latter, Sir Walter Scott says, "is but too well known from its being the strain with which the emigrants from the West Highlands and Isles usually take leave of their native shore". The burden of the original Gaelic words is "we return no more". Of the same class is 'Lochaber no more', which is a true "lament" to the Highlander. The melody in one of its earlier forms is entitled 'Limerick's Lamentation' or 'Irish Lamentation', and there seems to be but little doubt that the song was written to an air then generally recognized as a "lamentation". For examples of the Gaelic laments the reader is referred to Patrick McDonald's 'Highland Vocal Airs' (1783), Albyn's 'Anthology' (1816-18) and other collections of Highland airs.

Bunting supplies several current in Ireland, and in the 'Arie di camera' (c. 1727) are some of the earliest in print, viz. 'Limerick's', 'Irish', 'Scotch', 'Lord Galloway's' and 'MacDonagh's' Lamentations. The Irish laments, however, never became so generally familiar as the Scottish did in their own country.

P. K.

LAMENTATIONE. A hybrid word (Lat. lamentatio; Ital. lamentazione), one of the nicknames for Haydn's Symphony No. 26, in D minor, composed about 1765, another being "Christmas" Symphony.

LAMENTATIONS (Lat. Lamentationes Hieremiae). On the Thursday, Friday and Saturday in Holy Week the three first lessons appointed in the Roman Breviary for the Office of Matins (commonly called Tenebrae) are taken from the Lamentations of Jeremiah; and the extraordinary beauty of the music to which they are sung, in the Sistine Chapel and other large Roman Catholic churches, contributes not a little to the impressive character of the service.¹

It is impossible to trace to its origin the plainsong melody to which the Lamentations were anciently adapted. The most celebrated version — though not, perhaps, the purest — is that printed by Guidetti in his 'Directorium chori' of 1582. The best modern editions are those of Solesmes, e.g. the 'Officium ultimi tridui majoris hebdomadis'; in which the lessons are given, at full length, in Gregorian notation, although the music is really no more than a simple chant in mode vi, repeated, almost notatim, not only to each separate verse of the sacred text, but even to the prefatory "Incipit Lamentatio Jeremiae Prophetæ" and the names of the Hebrew letters with which the several paragraphs are introduced:

Early in the 16th century the use of the plainsong Lamentations was discontinued, in the Pontifical Chapel, to make room for a polyphonic setting, by Elzéar Genet, more commonly known by his Italian nickname of Carpentrasso, who was attached to the papal court in 1508-18. These compositions remained in constant use till the year 1587, when Pope Sixtus V ordained that the first Lamentation for each day should be adapted to some kind of polyphonic music better fitted to express the mournful character of the words than that of Carpentrasso, and that the second and third lessons should be sung, by a single soprano, to the old plainsong melody as revised by Guidetti. The disuse of Carpentrasso's time-honoured harmonies gave great offence to the choir; but, the pope's command being absolute, Palestrina composed some music to the first Lamentation for Good Friday, in a manner so impressive that all opposition was at once silenced; and the pope himself, on leaving the chapel, said that he hoped in the following year to hear the other two first lessons sung in exactly the same style. Palestrina produced, in Jan. 1588, a volume containing a complete set of the nine Lamentations — three for each of the three days — which were printed the same year by Gardano, under the title of 'Lamentationum liber primus'. The work was prefaced by a formal dedication to the pope, who, though he still adhered to his resolution to have the second and third lessons sung always in plainsong, expressed great pleasure in accepting it; and in 1589 it was reprinted at Venice, in 8vo, by Girolamo Scotto.

More complex in construction than Palestrina's 'Improperia', though infinitely less so than his masses and motets, these Lamentations are written throughout in the devout and impressive style which produces so profound an effect in the first-named work, and always with marked attention to the mournful spirit of the words. They do not, like the plainsong rendering, embrace the entire text, but after a certain number of verses pause on the final chord of a prolonged cadence and then pass on to the strophe "Jerusalem, Jerusalem" with which each of the nine lessons concludes. In the single lesson for Good Friday — which, though not included in the original printed copy, is undoubtedly the most beautiful of all — the opening verses are sung by two sopranos, an alto and a tenor, a bass being added in the concluding strophe with wonderful effect. A similar arrangement is followed in the third Lamentation for the same day; but the others are for four voices only, and most of them with a tenor in the lowest place, while in all, without exception, the introductory sentences, "Incipit Lamentatio" or "De Lamentatione", as well as the names of the Hebrew initial letters, are set to harmonies of infinite richness and beauty.

Since the death of Palestrina the manner of singing the Lamentations in the Pontifical

Chapel has undergone no very serious change. In accordance with the injunction of Pope Sixtus V the second and third lessons for each day have always been sung in plainsong: generally by a single soprano, but sometimes by two, the perfection of whose unison performance has constantly caused it to be mistaken for that of a single voice. Until the year 1640 the first lesson for each day was sung from Palestrina's printed volume. In that year the single unpublished lesson for Good Friday, composed in 1587, was restored to its place, and the use of the published one discontinued; while a new composition, by Gregorio Allegri, was substituted for Palestrina's lesson for Holy Saturday.

Benedict XIII inaugurated a radical change, by decreeing that the first lessons should no longer be sung in this shortened form, but with the entire text set to music. To meet his desire three Lamentations, by modern writers, were submitted for approval, but unanimously rejected by the College, who commissioned Giovanni Biordi to add to the compositions of Palestrina and Allegri whatever was necessary to complete the text. His work was unhesitatingly accepted and retained in use till the year 1731, when Clement XII restored the Lamentations to their original shortened form. In this form they were allowed to remain till 1815, when the indefatigable Baini restored Palestrina's printed Lamentation for the first day, retaining the manuscript for the second and Allegri's really beautiful composition for the third; while the last-named composer's inferior work (of 1651) was made to fall into disuse.

Besides the printed volume just mentioned, Palestrina composed two other entire sets of Lamentations, which, though written in his best and purest style, remained unpublished for two centuries and a half. One of them was prepared, as early as 1560, for the use of the Lateran Basilica, where the original manuscript is still preserved. The other reaches us only through the medium of a manuscript in the Altaemps Otthoboni collection, now in the Vatican library. In 1842 Alfieri printed the three sets entire, in the fourth volume of his 'Raccolta di musica sacra', together with the single Lamentation for Good Friday, to which he appended Biordi's additional verses, without, however, pointing out the place where Palestrina's work ends and Biordi's begins. The three single Lamentations, sung in the Pontifical Chapel, are given, with Biordi's now useless additions, in a volume of the same editor's 'Excerpta', published in 1840, and, without Biordi's verses, in Choron's 'Collection de pièces de musique religieuse'. Both these editions are out of print and difficult to obtain, but a fine reprint of the nine pieces contained in the original 'Lamentationum liber primus' will be found in Proske's 'Musica divina', Vol. IV. Capes, in his selection from the works of Palestrina, has given the first Lamentation in Coena Domini, and the first in Sabb. Sancto, from the first book (1588) and introduced between them the single lesson for Good Friday (1587) already mentioned. The Lamentations of Palestrina are contained in Vol. XXV of Haberl's collected edition. In 1919 Casimiri published 'Il codice 59', containing the corrected manuscript of Palestrina's Lamentations in the composer's autograph.

Though the Lamentations of Carpentrasso, Palestrina and Allegri are the only ones that have ever been actually used in the Pontifical Chapel, many others have been produced by composers of no small reputation. Those of Okeghem date from 1474. As early as 1506 Ottaviano dei Petrucci published at Venice two volumes containing settings by Johannes Tinctoris, Ycart, Orto, Francesco (d' Ana) da Venezia, Johannes de Quadris, Agricola, Bartolomeo Tromboncino and Gaspar and Erasmus Lapidica. All these works were given to the world before that of Carpentrasso, which, with many more of his compositions, was first printed at Avignon, by Johannes Channay, in 1532. But the richest collection extant is that entitled 'Piissimae ac sacratissimae Lamentationes Jeremiae prophetae', printed in Paris, by Le Roy and Ballard, in 1557, and containing, besides Carpentrasso's capo d' opera, some extremely fine examples by La Rue, Fevin, Arcadelt, Festa and Claudin Le Jeune.

Lamentations by English composers of the 16th century, such as Tallis, Byrd and Robert Whyte, are now known to be more numerous than was once supposed. W. S. R., rev.

LAMENTO (Ital., lament, lamentation). A type of plaintive air in early 17th-century Italian opera, conventionally occurring before the tragic culmination of the plot. Monteverdi's 'Lamento d'Arianna', the only surviving portion of his opera 'Arianna', is the most famous example. "When I am laid in earth" in Purcell's 'Dido and Aeneas' clearly follows the same convention.

LAMOND, Frederic (b. Glasgow, 28 Jan. 1868; d. Stirling, 21 Feb. 1948).

Scottish pianist. He was at first a pupil of his brother, David Lamond, and in 1880 obtained the post of organist at Laurieston parish church. He studied the violin with H. C. Cooper, and in 1882 went to Frankfort o/M. to the Raff Conservatory, where Heermann was his master for the violin, Max Schwarz for the pianoforte, and Urspruch for composition. There he laid the foundation of his wide musical culture, and for a time his ambition was to devote himself to composition. It is perhaps due to his all-round musical interest and cultivation that all his life he impressed his audiences as a musician first and as a pianist only incidentally. But if technical conquests never seemed to come easily to him, he nevertheless acquired, in his own way, a remarkable virtuosity. His pianoforte studies were completed under Bülow and Liszt. His first important appearance as a mature pianist took place in Berlin on 17 Nov. 1885, when he made a great success; and he appeared in Vienna soon afterwards. His first recital in Great Britain took place at Glasgow on 8 Mar. 1886, and soon afterwards he gave a set of recitals at Princes Hall, London. For the fourth of these, on 15 Apr., St. James's Hall was taken, and Liszt's presence set the seal on the young player's reputation. The recitals showed the depth of Lamond's interpretations of Beethoven, a master in whom he took especial delight. During the next few years he played much in Germany, but appeared occasionally in London. On 5 Apr. 1890 he played Saint-Saëns's C minor Concerto at the Crystal Palace, when his own Symphony in A was given (it was first played at the Glasgow Choral Union on 23 Dec. 1889 and revived at Queen's Hall in 1912).

Lamond's first appearance with the Philharmonic Society in London took place on 14 May 1891, when he played Brahms's second Concerto with great skill. The same society performed his overture, 'From the Scottish Highlands', on 7 Mar. 1895. In 1896 Lamond played in Russia and in 1897 gave a series of recitals in London, at one of which a couple of pianoforte pieces of his own were played. From 1904, when he married the German actress Irene Triesch, he lived in Berlin, but he made an annual appearance in England up to 1914. His performances there were renewed in 1919. In 1917 he accepted a professorship in the Conservatory at The Hague. During and after the second world war he and his wife, who were not accepted by the Nazi régime, nor willing to accept it, lived in London.

Among Lamond's compositions may be mentioned a Sonata, Op. 2, for cello and pianoforte and a Trio for violin, cello and pianoforte.

LAMOTTE, Franz (b. ?, 1753; d. ?, 1781).

Violinist and composer of uncertain nationality. He is said to have been born in Flanders and educated in London; according to Burney he was a pupil of Giardini. He gave a concert at the Burg Theatre in Vienna on 29 Dec. 1766, when the 'Wienerisches Diarium' gives his age as thirteen and states that the prodigy had arrived a short time ago and that he was generally called "the young Englishman". Lamotte then went on a European tour. Gerber heard him at Hiller's at Leipzig about 1767 and was impressed by his stupendous technique; Leopold Mozart mentions him in a letter of 1772 as having been at Naples. From 1772 till his early death Lamotte was employed in the Austrian imperial chapel; but he still went abroad a good deal, appearing in London first in 1776 and again in 1778-79, when he gave a number of subscription concerts with Rauzzini. His compositions include 3 violin concertos and several sonatas and solos for his instrument, some of them published. Contemporary accounts abound in the anecdotes usually recounted about young virtuosi. Burney, who heard him in 1772, calls him the "best solo player and sightsman upon the violin at Vienna"; Mozart writing two years after Lamotte's death (6 Dec. 1783) asks his father to tell Heinrich Marchand to "concentrate hard on staccato playing, for it is just in this particular that the Viennese cannot forget Lamotte".

LAMOUREUX, Charles (b. Bordeaux, 28 Sept. 1834; d. Paris, 21 Dec. 1899).

French violinist and conductor. He began his violin studies under Beaudoin and was then sent to the Paris Conservatoire, where he was in Girard's class. He obtained a second accessit for the violin in 1852, the second prize in the following year and the first in 1854. He also studied harmony under Tolbecque and attended the counterpoint course of Leborne, finishing his theoretical studies under the famous organist Alexis Chauvet. He was solo violinist in the orchestra of the Théâtre du Gymnase (1850) and afterwards joined that of the Opéra, where he played for many years. He was admitted a member of the Société des Concerts du Conservatoire and, like all the members of these orchestras, gave private lessons. But these insignificant posts were not sufficient for Lamoureux, who dreamt of great undertakings in the musical art of France. Together with Colonne, Adam and A. Pilet he founded in 1860 a society for chamber music of a severe character, in which he showed a taste for new works by producing compositions hitherto unnoticed. He was also the first in France to perform Brahms's sextets. Having travelled in Germany and England, he was anxious to organize performances on a large scale, such as he had heard under Hiller and Costa, of the masterpieces of Handel, Bach and Mendelssohn.

After several preliminary trials at the Salle Pleyel, where he performed among other things Bach's 'Streit zwischen Phöbus und Pan', he succeeded by his own energy and resources in founding the Société de l'Harmonie Sacrée on the model of the Sacred Harmonic Society of London. The first festival was given at the Cirque des Champs-Élysées on 19 Dec. 1873. The success of an admirable performance of 'Messiah' was such that amateurs came in crowds to the following performances. Lamoureux then produced Bach's St. Matthew Passion on 31 Mar. 1874 and Handel's 'Judas Macabæus' on 19 Nov. 1874. Not content with confining himself to well-known masterpieces, he produced Massenet's 'Ève', then unpublished, on 18 Mar. 1875.

These performances showed that Lamoureux was a conductor of great merit, who succeeded in obtaining from his orchestra a matchless precision of attack and regard to expression. When Carvalho became director of the Opéra-Comique in 1876 he offered Lamoureux the post of conductor, but in less than a year the latter resigned, owing to some difficulties arising out of the rehearsal of Chaumet's 'Bathylé' in May 1877. In Dec. of the same year Lamoureux was appointed conductor of the Opéra (1877-79) and this caused him to give up the sub-conductorship of the Concerts du Conservatoire, which he had held since 1872. In 1878 he was decorated by the Legion of Honour and in the following year he resigned his post at the Opéra on account of a dispute with Vaucorbeil as to the tempo of one of the numbers in Mozart's 'Don Giovanni'.

From that time he determined to be self-dependent and, after having carefully prepared the undertaking, he founded on 23 Oct. 1881 the Nouveaux Concerts, called the Concerts Lamoureux, which were held for some years in the theatre of the Château d'Eau and afterwards at the Eden-Théâtre (1885) and the Cirque des Champs-Élysées (1887), where their success constantly increased. In the year of their foundation he appeared as a conductor in London, giving two concerts in St. James's Hall on 15 and 22 Mar. 1881.

Not only did Lamoureux develop as a conductor a precision and firmness, a care for the perfection of the smallest details, without excluding passion and warmth of expression; he also gave a welcome to the works of contemporary musicians such as Reyer, Saint-Saëns, Lalo, d'Indy, Chabrier, Franck, Dukas, etc., and succeeded in placing himself at the head of the Wagnerian movement in France. He gave excellent performances of selections from Wagner's operas to a public that had been too long deprived of these works. The first act of 'Lohengrin', Acts I and II of 'Tristan' and Act I of 'Die Walküre' were given in their entirety. Encouraged by the warmth of the applause and the moral support of his audience, Lamoureux decided to give a performance in a Paris theatre of 'Lohengrin', then almost unknown in France. After a whole year of preparation a perfect performance was given at the Eden-Théâtre (3 May 1887), which was not repeated. Lamoureux lived, however, to see the ultimate triumph of Wagner in Paris. He produced 'Tristan' at the Théâtre Nouveau on 28 Oct. 1899, less than two months before his death.

In Apr. and Nov. 1896, in Mar. and Nov. 1897 and in the spring of 1898 he gave concerts with his orchestra in the Queen's Hall, London; and in May 1899 they were the chief attraction of a London Musical Festival in the Queen's Hall. He was succeeded as conductor by his son-in-law, Camille Chevillard.

English organist and composer, son of Johann Friedrich (John Frederick) Lampe. He succeeded his grandfather, Charles Young, as organist in the London church of All Hallows, Barking, in 1758 and held the appointment until 1769. On 7 May 1763 he married Miss Smith, a singer, and in the following year published 'Six English Songs as sung by Mr. Lowe & Mrs. Lampe Junr. at Mary-bone Gardens'; the "junr." in the title would indicate that his mother, Isabella Lampe, was still alive in 1764.

LAMPE, Johann Friedrich (John Frederick) (b. Saxony, c. 1703; d. Edinburgh, 25 July 1751).

German-English bassoonist and composer, father of C. J. F. Lampe. Of his early years in Germany and his musical education there nothing is known apart from a record that connects him with St. Catherine's School, Brunswick, and his own mention of the fact that he was once a student at Helmstedt. He went to London about 1725 and was engaged as a bassoon player in the orchestra of the King's Theatre and later as composer at the Haymarket Theatre. He began to write for the stage in 1730 and in the following year published his first collection of songs, which appeared in 5 weekly parts, containing 8 ballads each, on subscription, as 'Wit Musically Embellish'd'. The "new English opera . . . after the Italian manner", 'Amelia' (1732), marks the beginning of Lampe's collaboration with Henry Carey, which in 1737 culminated in their burlesque opera 'The Dragon of Wantley'. This met with remarkable success and is an admirable example of the true burlesque, said to have been an especial favourite of Handel. In 1738 there followed a sequel, 'Margery, or A Worse Plague than the Dragon', by the same author and composer, which, however, like most sequels, was much less successful; both 'The Dragon' and 'Margery' were published in full score by J. Wilcox.

About this time, in 1738 or 1739, Lampe married Isabella Young, daughter of Charles Young, organist of All Hallows, Barking, thus becoming the brother-in-law of T. A. Arne (who had married Cecilia, Isabella's sister, in 1736). Both Mrs. Arne and Mrs. Lampe were accomplished singers and frequently appeared on the concert platform in town and at the pleasure gardens as well as on the stage. In 1741 Lampe, his wife and some other singers went on a provincial tour, performing 'Amelia' and 'The Dragon of Wantley' at Preston and Chester, where Burney, then a boy of fifteen, heard them. The Lampes left London about 1748, went to Dublin, and in 1750 to Edinburgh, where he died, leaving behind him the reputation of a good musician and excellent man. He was buried on 28 July 1751 in the Canongate Churchyard. Charles Wesley, whose hymns he set to music in 'Hymns on the Great Festivals . . .' (1746), often mentions him with great affection and wrote a hymn on his death: "'Tis done! the Sovereign Will's obeyed!'

Isabella Lampe returned to London after her husband's death. On 2 May 1753 she had a benefit performance at Covent Garden.

Besides his works for the stage (see list below) Lampe wrote a great number of songs, partly collected in 'Wit Musically Embellish'd' (see above), 'British Melody' (1739), 'Ladies' Amusement' (Dublin, c. 1748), etc. According to Hawkins he set Swift's cantata 'In harmony would you excel' and published it anonymously as 'The Force of Music and Poetry'; but no copy of this seems to be known. A 'Kirchen-Musik' to celebrate the repression of the Stuart rebellion of 1745 was sung in German in the Savoy Chapel on 9 Oct. 1746 and published at Hanover. Of Lampe's instrumental works the 'Cuckoo Concerto' for flute, strings and harpsichord was for a time popular; he also published two theoretical works, 'A Plain and Compendious Method of Teaching Thorough Bass' (1737) and 'The Art of Musick' (1740).

The following is a list of Lampe's works for the stage, all but one produced in London:

- 'Diana and Actæon', pantomime (author not known), Drury Lane Theatre, 23 Apr. 1730.
- 'Amelia' (Henry Carey), Haymarket Theatre, 13 Mar. 1732.
- 'Britannia' (Thomas Lediard), Haymarket, 15 Nov. 1732.
- 'Dione' (?), Haymarket, 23 Feb. 1733.
- 'The Opera of Operas, or Tom Thumb the Great' (Eliza Haywood and William Hatchett, altered from Fielding's burlesque), Drury Lane, 7 Nov. 1733.¹
- 'Aurora's Nuptials' (?) for Drury Lane, 1733, not performed, lib. publ. 1734.
- 'Cupid and Psyche, or Columbine Courtesan' (?), Drury Lane, 4 Feb. 1734.
- 'Fatal Falsehood, or Distress'd Innocence' (tragedy by John Hewitt), Drury Lane, 11 Feb. 1734.
- 'The Tragedy of Chrononhotonthologos' (Carey), Haymarket, 22 Feb. 1734.
- 'The Dragon of Wantley' (Carey), Haymarket, 16 May 1737.
- 'Margery, or A Worse Plague than the Dragon' (also called 'The Dragoness'; Carey), Covent Garden, 9 Dec. 1738.
- 'Orpheus and Eurydice' (Lewis Theobald), Covent Garden, 12 Feb. 1740.
- 'The Sham Conjurer' (?), Covent Garden, 18 Apr. 1741.
- 'The Queen of Spain, or Farinelli in Madrid' (James Worsdale), Haymarket, 19 Jan. 1744 (music perhaps by Lampe).
- 'The Kiss Accepted and Returned' (James Ayres), Haymarket, 16 Apr. 1744.
- 'Pyramus and Thisbe' (? from Shakespeare), Covent Garden, 25 Jan. 1745.

LAMPE, Johann Friedrich (b. Wolfenbüttel, 1744; d. ?).

German composer, singer and clavier player. He was musical director of the Hamburg theatre from 1773 until Nov. 1777, but seems to have stayed on there as a singer for several more years. In 1788 he was a member of the court theatre at Schwedt in Pomerania, and is said to have settled later as a music teacher at Düsseldorf. He wrote symphonies (not extant), songs and, for the stage, prologues, incidental music and 'Das Mädchen im Eichthale', a German adaptation of Bickerstaffe's 'Love in a Village' and Burgoyne's 'The Maid of the Oaks', first performed at Hanover in 1776 and subsequently at Hamburg, Berlin, etc. The score of this has been preserved at the Berlin High School for Music.

great talent for music and was placed under Pietro Rizzi of Lodi. In 1820 he entered the Conservatory at Milan. Devoting himself afterwards to the teaching of singing, he became associated with Masini in the direction of the Teatro Filodrammatico at Lodi. Selecting many of the members of his company from the natives of the surrounding country, he educated and brought out at his theatre many famous singers. Gradually pupils began to flock to him from other parts of Italy and from elsewhere in Europe, and he there trained many of the most distinguished operatic vocalists. In 1850 he was appointed professor of singing to the Milan Conservatory, a post from which he retired with a pension in 1875, when he began to devote himself entirely to private pupils.

A friend of Rubini and Pasta, and associated with the great singers of the past, Lamperti followed the method of the old Italian school of singing. Basing his teaching upon the study of respiration, he thoroughly grounded his pupils in the production of pure tone.

Lamperti was Commendatore and Cavaliere of the order of the Crown of Italy and a member of many academies and foreign orders. He wrote several series of vocal studies and a treatise on the art of singing, which was translated into English by one of his pupils.

LAMPUGNANI, Giovanni Battista (b. Milan, 1706; d. ? Milan, 1781).

Italian composer. He studied in his native town and had already ten more or less successful operas to his credit when, in the autumn of 1743, he went to London to succeed Galuppi as composer to the King's Theatre. He started his activity by producing two operas, 'Alfonso' and 'Alceste' on 3 Jan. and 24 April 1744.¹ During the next two seasons he shared his conductor's responsibilities at the Haymarket with various other composers, Gluck among them.

It is not quite certain when Lampugnani left London; but it seems likely that he returned to Milan in time to prepare the production (20 Jan. 1746) of his new opera 'Il gran Tamerlano' there, and that the new version of the 'Rossane' of 1743, called 'Alessandro nell'Indie' and witnessed by Burney (15 Apr. 1746), was put on at the Haymarket without his active collaboration.

He revisited London in 1755, when his 'Siroe' was produced and had a run of twelve nights. Burney's comment on his music is rather half-hearted, and the praise he bestows on it in one sentence he takes away in the next.

The last years of his life Lampugnani spent in his native town, as conductor or maestro al cembalo at the Teatro Regio Ducal, and in that capacity he played the second cembalo to young Mozart's first in the latter's 'Mitridate' in Dec. 1770 and took over from him after the third performance.² Apart from numerous operas (see list below) Lampugnani wrote some instrumental works. During his first stay in London Walsh published his Op. 1, consisting of six trio sonatas, and reissued it a few years later as "by Lampugnani and G. B. Sammartini", together with Op. 2, another six sonatas by the same two composers.

The following is a list of Lampugnani's operas:

- 'Candace' (Milan, 1732).
- 'Ezio' (Milan, 1736).
- 'Antigono' (Milan, 1737).
- 'Demofonte' (Piacenza, 1738).
- 'Angelica' (Venice, 1738).
- 'Il passaggio . . . di Maria Amalia', serenata (Ferrara, 1738).
- 'Didone abbandonata' (Padua, 1739).
- 'Adriano in Siria' (Vicenza, 1740).
- 'Semiramide riconosciuta' (Rome, 1741).
- 'Arsace' (Crema, 1741).
- 'Alfonso' (London, 3 Jan. 1744).
- 'Alceste' (London, 24 April 1744).
- 'La finta schiava' (Venice, 1744) (pasticcio).
- 'Il gran Tamerlano' (Milan, 1746).
- 'Rossane' (London, 15 Apr. 1746).
- 'Tigrane' (Venice, 1747).
- 'L' Olimpiade' (Florence, 1748).
- 'Andromaca' (Turin, 1748).
- 'Artaserse' (Milan, 1749).
- 'Alessandro sotto le tende di Dario' (Piacenza, 1751).
- 'Vologeso' (Barcelona, 1753).
- 'Siroe, re di Persia' (London, 14 Jan. 1755).
- 'Il re pastore' (Milan, 1758).
- 'Le cantatrici' (Milan, 1758).
- 'Il conte Chicchera' (Milan, 1759).
- 'Amor contadino' (Venice, 1760).
- 'Giulia' (Milan, 1760).
- 'Enea in Italia' (Palermo, 1763).
- 'L' illustre villanella' (Turin, 1769).

Airs by Lampugnani were also introduced into the following London pasticcios: 'Alessandro in Persia' (1741); 'Meraspe' (1742); 'Gianguir' (1742); 'Annibale in Capua' (1746); 'L' ingratitude punita' (1748); 'Ipermestra' (1754).

LANCERS' QUADRILLE. A square dance for eight or sixteen couples. It is said to have been the invention of a Dublin dancing-master, John Duval; but Joseph Hart claimed to have invented it in 1819, according to the title-page of his original edition, published in 1820:

Les Lanciers, a second set of Quadrilles for the Piano Forte, with entirely new figures, as danced by the Nobility and Gentry at Tenby in the summer of 1819. Composed and most respectfully dedicated to Lady and the Misses Beechy by Joseph Hart. London, for the Author, Whitaker & Co., 75 St. Paul's Churchyard.

The dance consisted of five figures — La Rose, La Lodoiska, La Dorset, Les Lanciers and L'Étoile — danced to airs by Spagnoletti, by Kreutzer, from 'The Beggar's Opera' ("If the heart of a man"), by Janiewicz and by Storace ("Pretty Maiden", from 'The Haunted Tower') respectively. In Duval's version¹ the names of the figures and music are substantially the same, though in the figures themselves there is considerable difference. Hart's figures, with a slight difference or two, are still danced, 'L'Étoile' being now called 'Les Visites' and 'Les Lanciers' danced last.

LANCIANO, Flavio Carlo (b. Rome, ?; d. ?).

Italian 17th-18th-century singer and composer. He was maestro di cappella at Santa Maria in Trastevere and Sant' Agostino, Rome, at the beginning of the 18th century. He wrote about 10 Latin oratorios for the archconfraternity, "del Crocifisso", between 1683 and 1706, also Italian oratorios, 'Santa Dimma, figlia de re d' Irlanda' (1687), 'La gioia nel seno d' Abramo' (1689), 'Absalone ribello' (1691) and 'Santa Clotilda, reina di Francia' (1702); and the operas, 'Il visir amante geloso, ovvero Le disgrazie di Giurgia' (Todi, 1685), 'L' amante del suo nimico' (Rome, 1688) and 'Amore e gratitudine' (Rome, 1691). A serenata for 3 characters of 1685 is preserved in the Biblioteca Estense, Modena, where there is also the score of 'Santa Dimma'; the 'Santa Clotilda' oratorio is in the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris, and another, undated oratorio, 'Il martirio di Sant' Eustachio', in the Conservatoire there. None of his works appears to have been printed.

LAND, Jan Pieter Nicolaas (b. Delft, 23 Apr. 1834; d. Arnhem, 30 Apr. 1897).

Dutch orientalist and musician. Although of Scandinavian descent, he was a thorough Dutchman², brought up at Leeuwarden in Friesland, educated at the well-known Moravian school at Neuwied on the Rhine and subsequently at the University of Leyden, where he devoted himself to Semitic philology and took his degree of Doctor of Theology. He next spent two years in England working among the Syriac manuscripts at the B.M. On returning to Holland he was made professor of classical and oriental languages at the Academy (now the Municipal University) of Amsterdam; whence, in the 1870s, he was speedily promoted to the chair of Logic and Metaphysics at Leyden. This latter post he held for over twenty years, filling in due course the office of Rector of the University and lecturing on Syriac when required, until 1895, when a paralytic seizure compelled his retirement to Arnhem, where he still occupied himself with learned tasks until his death.

Land was devoted to music, especially of the 17th century, and fond of transcribing lute music for his friends from the original tablature. The following works concern music:

- 'Noord Nederlands muziekgeschiedenis' (1874-81).
- 'De Koorboeken van de S'Pieterskerk te Leyden' (1880).
- 'Over de toonladders der arabische muziek' (1880).
- Huygens, 'Correspondance et œuvres musicales' (1882).
(In this work Jonckbloet collaborated.)
- 'De Pathodia van Constantijn Huygens'.
- 'Recherches sur l'histoire de la gamme arabe' (1884).
- 'Essai de notation musicale chez les Arabes et les Persans' (1885).
- 'Het Tijdschrift der Vereniging voor Noord Nederlands muziekgeschiedenis' (1885).
- 'Quirinus van Blankenburg en zijne Fuga Obligata' (1882).
- 'Joan Albert Ban en de theorie der Toonkunst' (1882).
- 'Het Luitboek van Thysius,' (Containing, among others, both English and French songs.)
- 'Tonschriftversuche und Melodieproben aus dem muhammedanischen Mittelalter' (1886). (A continuation of the lute-book of Thysius, with songs and dance music.)
- 'Het volmaecte Klauwier of Joan Albert Ban.'
- 'De Gamelan te Jogjakarta' (with examples of Javanese music).
- 'Werken van Sweelinck te Oxford.'

LANDI, Camilla (b. Geneva, 1866; d. ?).

Italian mezzo-contralto singer. She was the daughter of Milanese parents, both singers. On 8 Dec. 1884 she made her début at a concert given by Servais at the Sala di Filarmonica, Florence, and made a very favourable impression. In 1886-92 she lived in Paris and made a great success at the Lamoureux concerts, and at Rouen, Bordeaux, etc. On 1 Oct. 1888 she played for one night at the Paris Opéra as Amneris in 'Aida', and on 5 June 1890 at the Odéon as Ursula on the production in Paris of Berlioz's 'Béatrice et Bénédict' by the Société des Grandes Auditions.

On 10 Nov. 1892 Camilla Landi made her début in England, under Hallé at Manchester, and became an immediate favourite at subsequent concerts under him in that city and elsewhere. On 22 Feb. 1893, under Hallé, she made her début at an orchestral concert at St. James's Hall in London. On 25 Mar., at the Crystal Palace, she confirmed the favourable impression she had made, and later in the autumn she sang at the Bristol Festival. For the next few years she lived in London, where her mother had established herself as a teacher, and became a great favourite at the above concerts, the Philharmonic and elsewhere. In 1897 and 1898, announced as from London, she sang in Germany and Austria-Hungary, with the greatest success. Her German engagements were principally in Berlin, her mother having settled for the time at Leipzig, where she had made her German début. In 1899 she sang in Holland, Belgium, Russia and Poland, and in 1900 again in Germany, etc. She reappeared in London, giving vocal recitals in 1904-7. She lived subsequently at Geneva. Her voice had a large compass, from the low d to a'', and a quality of infinite charm.

A. C.

LANDI, Stefano (b. Rome, c. 1590; d. Rome, c. 1655).

Italian contralto singer and composer. His first known work is the tragicomedia pastorale 'La morte d' Orfeo', one of the earliest operas, thought to have been performed before the pope in 1619 although no account of such performance exists.¹ The score was printed by Gardano of Venice in that year², and in the dedication, dated 1 June 1619, Landi calls himself maestro di cappella to Marco Cornaro, bishop of Padua. By 1620, at the latest, the composer had returned to Rome; in 1624 he was maestro di cappella at Santa Maria dei Monti and on 29 Nov. 1629 he was appointed contralto singer at the Cappella Giulia, St. Peter's.

Landi wrote, after 'La morte d' Orfeo', a second opera 'Il S. Alessio', which was first given at the Palazzo Barberini on 23 Feb. 1632 and printed by Masotti of Rome two years later, when the work was revived in honour of the visit of a Polish prince to Rome. Both 'La morte d' Orfeo' and 'Il S. Alessio' are important milestones in the development of opera; Baini, in his biography of Palestrina, calls 'S. Alessio' "la più sentimentale musica drammatica" of that period. It in fact anticipates many significant features of later 17th-century opera, including as it does comic situations, highly developed duets, trios, choruses, etc.³ In his non-dramatic works, too, Landi shows himself as one of the outstanding composers of his time; they consist of madrigals for 4 and 5 voices (1619 and 1624), arias for 1 and 2 voices (5 books, 1620-38), psalms (1624), a 'Missa in benedictione nuptiarum' for 6 voices (1628), a book of masses a cappella for 4 and 5 voices, etc. A number of instrumental compositions formerly in the Heyer collection, Cologne, possibly belong to the Neapolitan Stefano Landi

LANDINI (Landino), Francesco (b. Fiesole, 1325; d. Florence, 2 Sept. 1397).

Italian instrumentalist and composer. His father, "Jacopo the painter", was probably Jacopo del Casentino, who died in 1358. In early childhood Francesco became blind as a result of smallpox, but despite this handicap he became a highly skilled musician as well as a widely read scholar in the liberal arts. At some time before 1351 he was in the service of Martino della Scala, tyrant of Verona; in 1346 he wrote a song to celebrate the birth of two Visconti princes. In 1364 he was crowned with a laurel wreath by the King of Cyprus at Venice, as winner of a poetical contest. But the greater part of his life was spent as a much admired musician of Florence, especially famous for his virtuoso performance on the portative organ, but also a player of the lute, rebec, recorder and other instruments, and a composer as well. He was buried in the church of San Lorenzo where he had long been organist. Landini's tombstone has a fine full-length bas-relief of the composer playing his little organ, with two angel musicians above his head.

His music represents the highest point reached by Italian ars nova music in its hundred years of swift rise and swifter decline. Most of his surviving works are ballate or dance-songs, though he left a dozen beautiful madrigals (quite a different form from the later 16th-century madrigal) and a lively canonic fishing-scene in caccia form. Designed for a mixed team of voices and instruments, these two- and three-part compositions reveal a limpid yet sensuous beauty in performance which it is difficult to match in any other music.

LÄNDLER.¹ A national dance popular in Austria (especially Styria), Bavaria and Bohemia. It probably derives its name from the Ländel, a district in the valley of the Ens, where the dance is said to have had its origin; but according to some authorities the word simply means "country dance", i.e. a waltz danced in a country fashion. In fact the Ländler is a homely waltz and differs from the waltz only in being danced more slowly. It is in 3-4 or 3-8 time and consists of two parts of eight bars, each part being repeated two or more times. Like most early dances it occasionally has a vocal accompaniment. Both Mozart (K. 606) and Beethoven (Nottebohm pp. 150, 151) wrote genuine Ländler, but the compositions under this name by Jensen, Raff, Reinecke and others have little in common with the original dance. The following example is the first part of a Styrian Ländler²:

The little waltz so well known as 'Le Désir', usually attributed to Beethoven, though really composed by Schubert, is a Ländler. To know what grace and beauty can be infused into this simple form one must hear Schubert's 'Wiener Damen-Ländler' or 'Belles Viennoises' in their unsophisticated form, before they were treated by Liszt.

LANDORMY, Paul (Charles René) (b. Issy, 3 Jan. 1869; d. Paris, 17 Nov. 1943).

French musicologist and critic. He was for many years professor of philosophy in various provincial lycées and finally went to Paris.

From 1892 onwards he devoted much time to music and studied singing with Sbriglia and Pol Plançon. He organized, with Romain Rolland, a series of lectures on music given at the École des Hautes Études Sociales, and also founded a laboratory for the study of physics in relation to music, which he directed himself from 1904 to 1907. In 1918 he became music critic of 'La Victoire'. He was also a regular contributor to 'Le Temps' and to numerous reviews. In 1937 he was secretary of the Musical Section of the International Exhibition in Paris, and he lectured on music in most European countries.

Landormy was the author of several excellent works, including an 'Histoire de la musique' (1910, 2nd edition 1922), which has been translated into English, Greek, Japanese and Czech, of biographies of Brahms and Bizet in the collection 'Les Maîtres de la musique' and of 'La Vie de Schubert' (1928). He was the editor of 'Les Chefs-d'œuvre de la musique expliqués', to which he himself contributed 'Le "Faust" de Gounod' (1922), and the author of philosophical studies of Socrates and Descartes and of a 'Commentaire au discours de la méthode'. LANDOWSKA, Wanda (b. Warsaw, 5 July 1897).

Polish harpsichordist, pianist and writer on music. Her father, Marian Landowski, was a lawyer and a musical amateur; her mother, Ewa, was a linguist. Wanda Landowska began playing the pianoforte at the age of four. Her first teacher was Jan Kleczyński, author of 'Chopin's Greater Works'. She continued her studies at the Warsaw Conservatory under Aleksander Michałowski, a distinguished pianist and interpreter of Chopin. In 1896 she went to Berlin and studied composition under H. Urban. Four years later she moved to Paris and married Henry Lew, a writer and an expert on Hebrew folklore. She devoted herself to music of the past, its interpretation, its renaissance, and to the revival of the harpsichord. With the help of her husband she made researches in this direction, read books, treatises, manuscripts, and went to see all the old keyboard instruments exhibited in museums. Soon after her arrival in Paris, and thanks to her keen interest in the music of the past, she was introduced to the group of musicians of the Schola Cantorum, and she took part in the concerts organized by that school. At the time of her arrival in Paris she was well known as a pianist. Her decision to abandon the pianoforte for the harpsichord was at first thought to be due to little more than a womanly whim, but she soon established a position for herself and her instrument, and her concerts began to attract crowds of music-lovers. In 1903 she played the harpsichord in public for the first time, and subsequently she undertook concert tours introducing the instrument all over Europe.

In 1909 Wanda Landowska published a book under the title of 'Musique ancienne', written in collaboration with her husband.¹ In 1912 Pleyel built a new harpsichord² according to her specifications. She played on the new instrument for the first time at the Bach Festival at Breslau the same year. In 1913 Hermann Kretzschmar opened for her a harpsichord class at the Royal High School for Music in Berlin; but her activities there were interrupted by the outbreak of the first world war, and she and her husband were detained in Berlin as civil prisoners on parole. Towards the end of that war Henry Lew was killed in a car accident. In 1919, at the request of Hermann Suter, the director of the Basel Conservatory, Wanda Landowska went to Switzerland and played the continuo in Bach's St. Matthew Passion on the harpsichord for the first time in the 20th century. During the summer months of that year she held a series of master classes and gave several recitals at Basel, afterwards returning to Paris, where she established her home. In 1923 she visited the U.S.A. for the first time.

In 1925 she settled at Saint-Leu-la-Forêt near Paris, where she founded her own École de Musique Ancienne, intended primarily for experienced musicians desiring to improve their knowledge of the styles and to learn the technique of the old instruments. There were both private and public courses, the latter taking place during the summer months only and specializing in the aesthetics of interpretation of the 17th and 18th centuries. The students, both singers and instrumentalists, took part in the performance of the works concerned as well as in discussions, analysis and criticism. Wanda Landowska built a large concert-studio in her garden, where the public lectures were held. In addition she held private courses once a week throughout the year.

In 1940, when the Nazis were approaching Paris, Wanda Landowska had to abandon her school, her library of more than 10,000 volumes and her collection of old instruments. In 1941, after a short sojourn in the Pyrenees, and later in Switzerland, she found herself in the U.S.A. Her first recital, after an absence of fourteen years, took place in the Town Hall, New York. This event was followed by a series of recitals and concerts all over the U.S.A. She has been domiciled in America since, and lives at Lakeville, Connecticut. In 1951 she made recordings of the whole of Bach's 'Well-tempered Clavier' on the harpsichord.

The first modern works composed for the harpsichord were written especially for Wanda Landowska, such as Manuel de Falla's 'Concerto' and Francis Poulenc's 'Concert champêtre'. Her campaign for the renaissance of music of the past and the harpsichord included successive concert tours in Europe, both Americas, Africa, etc., as well as the publication of essays, articles and lectures, and her classes at Saint-Leu-la-Forêt. Her compositions include a Sercade for strings and several works for string orchestra; a chorus for women's voices with orchestra; a 'Hebrew Poem' for orchestra; 'Polish Popular Songs' for solo voice, woodwind instruments, harpsichord and strings; cadenzas for Mozart concertos and for Haydn's Concerto in D major; more than a hundred songs for voice with pianoforte accompaniment; 'Polish Popular Songs' (a cappella) for the Orfeo Catala, Barcelona; many pianoforte pieces. She also transcribed for the pianoforte a 'Chaine de Landler' by Schubert, 'Valse viennoises' by Lanner and Country Dances by Mozart.

Wanda Landowska's literary publications include the following:

- 'Sur l'interprétation des œuvres de clavecin de J. S. Bach' ('Mercure de France', 15 Nov. 1905).
- 'La Musique ancienne' (ibid., 1909).

LANDRÉ, Guillaume Louis Frédéric (usually known as Guillaume Landré, jun.) (b. The Hague, 24 Feb. 1905).

Dutch composer. He is the son of Willem Landré and first studied law, taking the degree of Master of Laws. Even in his university days at Utrecht, however, he found time to take serious lessons from Willem Pijper, whose influence has been continuing. He made his first appearance as a composer soon after this, with a 'Sinfonietta' and a violin Concerto, incidental music to an open-air play, 'Cortez', produced at the lustrum festival at Utrecht, and a light opera, 'De Snoek' ('The Pike', Amsterdam, 1938), produced under the auspices of the Wagner Vereniging. Later he composed much chamber music, including 2 string Quartets, 2 pianoforte Trios, also 2 Symphonies, a Sinfonietta for violin and orchestra, a large number of partsongs for men's and women's voices, a great work for chorus and orchestra, 'Piac Memoriae pro patria mortuorum', an important a cappella chorus, 'Egidius waer bestu bleven', and a cello Concerto. Among his other activities have been those of music critic for the Amsterdam 'Telegraaf', member of the committee of the Dutch copyright and performing society Buma, the Genootschap Nederlandse Componisten and the Stichting Nederlands Muziekbelangen. In 1947 he became president of the Dutch section of I.S.C.M. H. A.

LANDRÉ, Willem (actually Guillaume Louis Frédéric) (b. Amsterdam, 12 June 1874; d. Eindhoven, 1 Jan. 1948).

Dutch writer and composer of French descent, father of the preceding. His whole musical education he had from Bernard Zweers. His first serious work as a writer appeared when he was appointed music critic for the 'Oprechte Haarlemsche Courant' in 1901. From Haarlem he removed to The Hague as musical editor of the 'Nieuwe Courant' in 1901 and five years later to Rotterdam as musical editor of the 'Nieuwe Rotterdamsche Courant', which position he held until 1937. He was also for many years editor of 'Caecilia, Het Muziekcollege', the leading musical periodical in Holland. As a composer he wrote in practically all forms, including the operas 'De Roos van Dekama' (Haarlem, 1897) and 'Beatrix' (The Hague, 1925), a "Romantic" pianoforte Concerto and a number of orchestral works, most of which are of an elegiac character. These last comprise 'In memoriam Matris',

'Three Mood Pictures' (in memory of Frederick Delius) and a symphonic fantasy 'Le Jardin de Marguerite'. Of his choral works the principal are a 'Requiem in memoriam uxoris' and 'Fragments from the Book of Baruch', dedicated to Queen Wilhelmina. A pianoforte Trio and a number of songs and partsongs are welcome numbers in the repertoires of Dutch musicians.

As might be expected of a composer of Huguenot descent, his style is somewhat related to that of the French composers of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, but shows a strong personal note. Unfortunately many of his manuscripts were destroyed in the bombardment of Rotterdam in 1940, after which he retired to a small village (Doetinchem) in eastern Holland. H. A.

LANDSBERG, Ludwig (b. Breslau, 1807; d. Rome, 6 May 1858).

German pianist and collector. He went to Rome and remained there for twenty-four years, teaching the pianoforte and amassing a wonderful collection of music, both printed and manuscript. On his death his library was taken, part to Berlin and part to Breslau, and a catalogue of the ancient portion was printed (Berlin, 1859, "imprimé chez Ernest Kuhn"). It contains compositions by more than 150 musicians of the old Italian and Flemish schools down to Casali. G.

LANDSHOFF, Ludwig (b. Stettin, 3 June 1874; d. New York, 20 Sept. 1941).

German musicologist and conductor. He studied music at Munich and Berlin as a pupil of Ludwig Thuille, Heinrich Urban and Max Reger, and musicology under Adolf Sandberger, Max Friedländer and O. Fleischer. In 1900 he took the Ph.D. at the University of Munich with a thesis entitled 'Joh. Rudolph Zumsteeg: ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des Liedes und der Ballade'. He settled first at Ludwigshöhe near Munich and later in Italy, and devoted all his time to scientific research, which he put to practical use by being one of the first to organize concerts of old music played according to the conventions of its period on contemporary instruments. He then became a conductor, in which capacity he worked successively at Kiel, Würzburg, Breslau and Hamburg. In 1919-28 he was director of the Munich Bach Society and in 1927 he organized the Bach Festival there. In 1929-33 he was conductor of the radio in Berlin, giving a special series of concerts each season. He also gave lectures, illustrated by concerts, at the Lessing-Hochschule on baroque chamber music. With the collaboration of his wife, Philippine Landshoff, a soprano singer, he gave numerous concerts, both in Berlin and Munich, of neglected or unknown 17th-19th-century works. Political events interrupted his artistic career in 1933, and he went to live in Paris, where he devoted his time to musicological work, editing old music and writing for musical journals.

Among the works edited by Landshoff are :

J. S. Bach's '15 zweistimmige Inventionen und 15 dreistimmige Sinfonien', 'Trio-Sonaten' (2 vols.), 'Musikalisches Opfer', 'Six Suites avec leurs préludes (Suites anglaises)' and the first edition of the recently discovered Sonata in F major for violin and harpsichord. To these must be added first editions of J. C. Bach and C. P. E. Bach, of Vivaldi, Haydn and others. His collections 'Alte Meister des Belcanto' (5 vols., 1912-1927) contain among other items nearly seventy arias of the 17th and 18th centuries, here published for the first time.

Landshoff is also the author of a German adaptation of Rossini's 'Signor Bruschino', given at Wiesbaden in 1932.

Among his musicological writings are :

'Über das vielstimmige Accompannement und andere Fragen des Generalbass-Spiels' ('Festschrift zum 50. Geburtstag von Adolf Sandberger', Munich, 1918).

Introduction to the new edition of Haydn's English Canzonets.

New edition of Friedrich Schlichtegroll's 'Necrolog auf Mozart' (Munich, 1924).

'Revisionsbericht zur Urtext-Ausgabe von Johann Sebastian Bachs Inventionen und Sinfonien' (1933).

LANFRANCO, Giovanni Maria (b. Terenzio, Parma, ?; d. ?).

Italian 15th-16th-century ecclesiastical writer on music. He was, according to Fétis, maestro di cappella and canon at Brescia Cathedral. He wrote 'Scintille di musica' (published 1533), important for its information about contemporary musical instruments.

Lang, Andrew. See Elgar ('My love dwelt', part-song). Stanford (song).

LANG, Benjamin (Johnson) (b. Salem, Mass., 28 Dec. 1837; d. Boston, Mass., 4 Apr. 1909).

American pianist, conductor, organist and teacher. His father was a well-known teacher of the pianoforte at Salem, and he began his studies under him, continuing them under Francis G. Hill of Boston. By the time he was fifteen years old he held a post as organist of a Boston church. In 1855 he went to Europe to study composition in Berlin and elsewhere in Germany, and pianoforte with Alfred Jaell; he also had some intercourse with Liszt.

On his return to Boston Lang made his first public appearance as a pianist in 1858. His début as a conductor was made at Boston in May 1862, when he gave the first performance in that city of Mendelssohn's 'Walpurgisnacht'. The next year he shared with Carl Zerrahn the direction of the music at the jubilee concert in honour of President Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation, and from that time forth he figured more and more extensively at Boston as a conductor. He was appointed conductor of the Apollo Club, a men's singing society, on its formation in 1871 and remained until 1901. He was also conductor of Cæcilia, a mixed choir, from its establishment in 1874, and of the Handel and Haydn Society for two seasons, 1895-97. He gave several complete performances of Wagner's 'Parsifal' in concert form.

In the early 1860s Lang became prominent as a concert pianist at Boston, playing frequently at the concerts of the Harvard Musical Association, at chamber concerts of his own and with the Mendelssohn Quintet Club. As a composer he was less important than as an interpreter; yet he left an oratorio, 'David', symphonies, overtures, chamber music, pieces for the pianoforte, church music and many songs, mostly in manuscript. In 1903 Yale University conferred on him the degree of Master of Arts.

R. A.

LANG, Feliks Michał (b. ?; d. ?).

Polish 18th-century singer and teacher of Bohemian origin. For very many years he taught singing at the musical school founded by Canon Waclaw Sierakowski at Cracow. He also was cantor at the Cracow Cathedral School about 1790.

C. R. H.

LANG, Josephine (b. Munich, 14 Mar. 1815; d. Tübingen, 2 Dec. 1880).

German composer. She was the second of that name belonging to a musical family attached to the court of Mannheim and transferred with it to Munich. She had very remarkable musical gifts and personality, and attracted the notice of Mendelssohn when he passed through Munich in 1830 and 1831. There is an enthusiastic account of "die kleine Lang" in his letter of 6 Oct. 1831; in writing to Barmann (7 July and 27 Sept. 1834) he inquires for her, and in a letter, seven years later (15 Dec. 1841), to Professor C. R. Köstlin of Tübingen, to whom she was married in 1842, he shows how deeply her image had impressed itself on his susceptible heart. She published several books of songs (up to Op. 38), which from the reviews in the A.M.Z. appear to be full of imagination and well worthy of the warm praise bestowed on them by Mendelssohn in the letters just mentioned. Hiller tells the story of her life at length in his 'Tonleben' (II, 116) and selects her songs Opp. 12 and 14 as the best.

G.

LANG, Paul Henry (b. Budapest, 28 Aug. 1901).

American musicologist of Hungarian origin. He was educated at the Humanistic "Gymnasium" and Academy of Music in Budapest, at the University of Paris and at the Cornell University, Ithaca, N.Y., where he obtained the Ph.D. degree in 1934. He is the editor of the 'Musical Quarterly' and vice president of the International Society for Musicology. Since 1933 he has been Professor of Musicology at Columbia University. His book 'Music in Western Civilization' was published in 1941 and is a review of the growth and popularity of music throughout the West from the times of ancient Greece and Rome to the present day. He proves many suppositions concerning the music in the Gothic and Renaissance periods incorrect, adds much valuable information on 14th- and 15th-century musicians, and indicates the important effect of political, social and national affairs on music.

M. K. W.

LANG, Regina (born Hitzelberg) (b. Würzburg, 1786; d. ?).

German soprano singer. She was educated at Munich by Winter, Cannabich and Vogel, and appointed chamber singer at the Bavarian court. When Napoleon I was at Munich in 1806 she sang before him in Winter's 'Interrupted Sacrifice' and Mozart's 'Don Giovanni' and so pleased him that he is said to have urged her to go to Paris. But she remained at Munich and married Theobald Lang, a violinist in the court orchestra. In 1812 or 1813 she was in Vienna, and Beethoven wrote in her album a song, 'An die Geliebte', to Stoll's words, "O das ich dir vom stillen Auge", which was published about 1840 in a collection called 'Das singende Deutschland'. It is his second version of the song — the earlier one being dated by himself Dec. 1811 and having been published in 1814.¹

LANG, Walter (b. Basel, 19 Aug. 1896).

Swiss pianist and composer. He began his studies at Basel, but in 1913 became a pupil of Émile Jaques-Dalcroze at Hellerau near Dresden, and then at Geneva, where for a time he taught at the Institut Jaques-Dalcroze. In 1916 he went to Munich, where Friedrich Klose was among his teachers, after which he worked at Zürich under Volkmar Andreae and Walter Frey. In 1920 he became professor of harmony at the Wolff Conservatory of Basel, and in 1922 he joined the staff of the Zurich Conservatory as pianoforte teacher. Himself a concert pianist, he founded the Lang Trio with Walter Kagi and Franz Hindermann. In 1942-48 he was pianist and conductor for Radio Monte Ceneri, but in the latter year he returned to Zürich. In 1949 he was appointed pianoforte teacher at the Conservatories of Berne and Basel.

As a composer Lang has cultivated all the musical forms except opera. His style is determined mainly by rhythmic vitality and impressionist tone-colour. Deserving special attention is his pianoforte music, which often serves the purposes of teaching and ranges through all the grades of difficulty from the simplest small pieces to brilliant concert works (see titles below).

The following are Lang's principal works:

- Dance play 'Leggende del Ticino'.
- 'Bulgarische Volksweisen' for chamber orch., Op. 18 (1927).
- 'Sonata festiva' for stg. orch., Op. 25 (1935).

LANGA, Francisco Soto de. See SOTO DE LANGA.

LANGDON, Richard (b. Exeter, c. 1729; d. Exeter, 8 Sept. 1803).

English organist and composer. He was a grandson of the Rev. Tobias Langdon, priest-vicar of Exeter Cathedral, and graduated as Mus.B. at Oxford in 1761. In 1753 he received the appointments of organist and sub-chantor of Exeter Cathedral, but resigned them in 1777, when he became organist of Ely Cathedral. This post he held for only a few months, being appointed to Bristol Cathedral in 1778. He left Bristol in 1782 to become organist of Armagh Cathedral, a post he resigned in 1794.

In 1774 Langdon published 'Divine Harmony, a Collection, in score, of Psalms and Anthems'. His published compositions include 'Twelve Glee's' (1770), two books of songs and some canzonets. Two glees and a catch by him are contained in Warren's 'Vocal Harmony'.

LANGE, Aloysia. See WEBER, family.

LANGE, DE. Dutch family of musicians.

(1) Samuel de Lange, sen. (b. Rotterdam, 9 June 1811; d. Rotterdam, 15 May 1884), organist and composer. He was organist of the church of St. Lawrence at Rotterdam and wrote pieces for his instrument.

(2) Samuel de Lange, jun. (b. Rotterdam, 22 Feb. 1840; d. Stuttgart, 7 July 1911), organist, conductor, teacher and composer, son of the preceding. He learnt music from his father at first, studied further with Verhulst in Holland and then went to Vienna, where he was a pupil of A. Winterberger. After travelling as a virtuoso in Galicia in 1858-59, he settled at Lwów for four years, but in 1863 he was appointed organist at Rotterdam and given a teaching appointment in the music school of the Maatschappij tot Bevordering van Toonkunst, making occasional concert tours in Switzerland, Germany, France, etc. From 1874 to 1876 he taught at the music school at Basel, and in 1877 was called to Cologne to teach in the Conservatory. While there he directed the Kölner Männergesangsverein and the choir of the Gürzenich concerts.

In 1885 de Lange went to The Hague as rector of the Oratorio Society, remaining there until 1893, when he went to Stuttgart as substitute for Immanuel Faisst, on whose death in 1894 he became professor of the organ and counterpoint in the Conservatory. In 1900 he was appointed director of that institution.

De Lange's works include eight organ sonatas, a pianoforte Concerto, three quartets, a Trio, a Quintet, four sonatas for violin and two for cello, a 'Concertstück' for cello and many partsongs for male voices, besides three symphonies and an oratorio, 'Moses', performed while he was at The Hague.

(3) Daniel de Lange (b. Rotterdam, 11 July 1841; d. Point Loma, California, 31 Jan. 1918), violoncellist, pianist, organist, conductor and composer, brother of the preceding. He was at first a pupil of his father, then of Ganz and of Servais for the cello, and of Verhulst for composition. He taught at the music school at Lwów, where he joined his brother, in 1860-63 and then went to Paris to perfect his pianoforte and organ playing. While there he was organist of the Protestant church at Montrouge, and he remained until the outbreak of the Franco-Prussian war in 1870, when he went back to Holland, taking up his abode at Amsterdam as teacher in the music school, which afterwards became the Conservatory. He was made secretary of the Maatschappij tot Bevordering van Toonkunst. He conducted several choral societies with great distinction and formed a party of eminent solo singers with which he performed old Netherlandish music. They gave concerts in the Albert Hall, London, during the Music and Inventions Exhibition of 1885 and created a great sensation by the exquisite finish of their performances.

De Lange became director of the Amsterdam Conservatory (1895-1913). His works include an opera, 'De val van Kuilenburg'; incidental music for Victor Hugo's 'Hernani'; a Mass, a Requiem, a setting of Psalm XXII for solo voices, chorus and pianoforte, cantatas; 2 symphonies, an overture, 'Willem van Holland'; a cello Concerto, etc.

LANGE, Francisco Curt (b. Eilenburg, 12 Dec. 1903).

Uruguayan (nationalized) musicologist of German birth. He studied at Leipzig, Berlin, Munich, where he qualified as an architect in 1923, and Bonn, where he took a doctor's degree in philosophy and musical sciences in 1927. He also holds a diploma for specialized studies in acoustics and the construction of musical instruments. Among others he studied with Nikisch, Oeser, Abert, Bekker, Bücken and Sandberger.

Lange emigrated to Uruguay in 1923. In 1930 he organized the Discoteca Nacional del Uruguay at the SODRE, where he was musical adviser till 1949. He was also professor of musicology at Montevideo University from 1932 till 1940, when he founded the Instituto Interamericano de Musicología under the Uruguayan Ministry for Foreign Relations. He also founded and is president of the Editorial Cooperativa Interamericana de Compositores, which has organized some 1600 concerts of American music both in Europe and the Americas, and has published 65 works by present-day American composers. He has lectured at universities in all the South American countries as well as in the U.S.A., where he was a guest of honour of the Rockefeller Foundation and of the American Musicological Society. At the request of Dr. Cordell Hull he helped to organize the First American International Music Conference (Washington, 1939). As a guest of the State Department he became a technical adviser to Panamerican Union before being appointed the first chief of the Musicological Department of the University of Texas and lecturing at a number of other universities and colleges. During a two-year visit to Brazil he discovered thousands of forgotten colonial scores and documents besides founding the Discoteca Pública Municipal at Recife. In 1948 he was appointed by the Universidad Nacional de Cuyo, at Mendoza, to organize and direct a Department of Musicology, and he represented the University at the First National Congress of Philosophy in the U.S.A. He was also invited to the First International Congress of Sacred Music at Mexico and to the International Congress of Sacred Music in Rome.

In 1934 Lange originated the "Americanismo Musical" movement, and the next year he published the first volume, with musical supplement, of his monumental 'Boletín Latino-Americano de Música' as the official organ of the Instituto Interamericano de Musicología. Subsequent volumes have appeared at Lima, Bogotá, Rio de Janeiro and Montevideo. Besides publishing other musicological works, Lange has translated many scientific and philosophical books into Spanish. Between 1934 and 1938 he published his 'Fonografía pedagógica', a guide to the educational use of gramophone records, in 3 volumes. He has also published a quantity of Venezuelan 18th-century church music for the Venezuelan government; an album of 12 Latin-American composers in New York; a collection of 18th-century church music which he discovered in the district of Minas Gerais, Brazil; and he is publishing a large volume on the life and death (1869) of Gottschalk in Brazil. At Merloza he has inaugurated the most notable serious music magazine in South America, the 'Revista de estudios musicales'.

Lange is an honorary member of practically all Latin-America's serious musical institutes, and also of musicological societies in the U.S.A., Belgium, France, Germany, Switzerland, etc., besides being a correspondent of the International Folk Music Council (London) and the Commission Internationale des Arts et Traditions Populaires (Paris).

N. F.

LANGE (Langius), Hieronymus (Gregor) (b. Havelberg, Brandenburg, ?; d. Breslau, 1 May 1587).

German composer. He obtained in 1574 the post of school cantor at Frankfort o/O., but becoming paralysed in his hands and feet he removed to Breslau in 1583, where he was received into a charitable institution, and in spite of his infirmity continued to devote himself to musical composition till his death. There are 2 books of 'Cantiones sacrae', published 1580 and 1584 respectively, containing 35 Latin motets for 4, 5, 6, 8 and 10 voices, and 2 books of 'Deutsche Lieder' (1584, 1586), containing forty German secular songs for 3 voices. Besides these, there are only a few occasional compositions, published separately, chiefly 'Epithalamia' or wedding-songs in the form of motets.

The 'Deutsche Lieder' for 3 voices were frequently reprinted, and in 1615 Christoph Demantius rearranged them for 5 voices. Although highly thought of in their time, Eitner says, these songs are less attractive than those of Regnard, being somewhat stiff and wanting in melody. The rearrangement by Demantius is of greater merit. But Lange's Latin motets stand on a higher level. In 1899 Reinhold Starke edited for the Gesellschaft für Musikforschung a selection of 24 of these motets ('Publikationen', Year XXIX), among which are several very interesting numbers. 'Vae misero mihi', with its second part, 'O vos omnes qui transitis', is very remarkable on account of its unusual chromatic modulations. A motet, 'Media vita', composed on the occasion of the death of the General Superintendent Musculus, one of Lange's chief Frankfort patrons, the editor considers as being quite in the mood of Bach. These motets must have enjoyed considerable favour, as some of them were also transcribed for the lute. Besides the published works Starke enumerates a considerable number which have remained in manuscript, among which are 2 masses, 30 Latin motets and 20 German songs for 4 and 5 voices, partly sacred.

LANGE-MÜLLER, Peter (Erasmus) (b. Frederiksborg, 1 Dec. 1850; d. Copenhagen, 25 Feb. 1926).

Danish composer. He began by studying law, but worked at music with Mathison-Hansen in Copenhagen, and from 1871 at the Conservatory there; also at pianoforte playing with Neupert. He wrote incidental music for several Danish plays as well as operas which were produced at the Royal Opera in Copenhagen: 'Tove' (libretto by the composer), 19 Jan. 1878; 'Spanske Studenter' (William Faber), 21 Oct. 1883; 'Vikingebloed' (Einar Christiansen), 29 Apr. 1900. The second and third were also given in Stockholm and the second at Hamburg. Act II of 'Tove' was revived in Copenhagen on 10 Jan. 1912 under the new title of 'Der gaar dans i Borgegaard' ('There is Dancing at Borgegaard'). It is Lange-Müller's vocal music on a smaller scale (some 200 songs and choral pieces) which is regarded as most characteristic of him and of his country. These works are mild and pleasant, as it was the fashion for Danish and indeed for most Scandinavian music to be in his time.

Opera 'Fru Jeanna' (1891).
Incidental music for Kaaland's drama 'Fulvia'.
Incidental music for Holger Drachmann's fairy-tale play 'Det var en gang'.
'Niels Ebbeson' for baritone, men's chorus & orch.
2 Symphonies.
2 Suites for orch., 'Alhambra' and 'Weyerburg'.
Trio, F ma., for vn., cello & pf.
Pf. pieces.
5 Songs from 'Sulamith og Salomon' (Op. 1).
Russian Songs (Op. 11).
Danish Songs (Op. 14).
Norwegian Songs (Op. 16).
French Songs (Op. 28).

Also other songs, male-voice choruses, &c.

LANGFORD, Samuel (b. Manchester, 1863; d. Manchester, 8 May 1927).

English critic. He entered the business of his father as a nursery gardener, but it has been said of him that his lifelong interest in flowers was romantic rather than commercial. He turned to musical interests, and for four years (1896-1900) studied seriously with Reinecke at Leipzig. From 1905 till his death he was music critic to 'The Manchester Guardian', and during those years he wrote widely and forcibly on musical subjects, particularly taking on himself the championship of the neglected works of Mahler. A collection of his writings, edited by his successor, Neville Cardus, was published by the O.U.P. in 1939.

LANGHANS, Friedrich Wilhelm (b. Hamburg, 21 Sept. 1832; d. Berlin, 9 June 1892).

German author, composer and violinist.

His early general education was received at the Johanneum in Berlin, and in 1849 he entered the Leipzig Conservatory, where his violin teacher was David and his composition master Richter. On leaving Leipzig Langhans went to Paris to study the violin further under Alard. For five seasons, 1852-56, he played first violin in the Gewandhaus orchestra at Leipzig, in 1857-60 was Konzertmeister at Düsseldorf and then settled temporarily, as teacher and violinist, at Hamburg, Paris and Heidelberg. From 1874 to 1881 he was professor of the history of music at Kullak's Neue Akademie der Tonkunst in Berlin, when he joined Scharwenka's newly founded Conservatory there, ultimately becoming its director.

In 1871 the University of Heidelberg conferred the degree of Doctor upon Langhans, who was an honorary member of the Liceo Filarmonico of Florence and of the Accademia di Santa Cecilia in Rome. He visited Britain in 1881 and subsequently, after hearing some open-air music at Glasgow, the Worcester Festival and Sullivan's 'Patience' in London, he wrote articles on music in England for the 'Musikalisches Centralblatt'.

Langhans's compositions, which include a string Quartet that gained a prize offered by a Florentine gentleman in 1864, a violin Sonata and a Symphony, are quite unimportant; but his literary work has been more prized. It includes 'Das musikalische Urteil' (1872), 'Die Musikgeschichte in 12 Vorträgen' (1878), a 'Geschichte der Musik des 17., 18. und 19. Jahrhunderts' in continuation of Ambros, and a history of the Berlin High School for Music. In 1858 he married the pianist Luise Japha, a pupil of Robert and Clara Schumann.

LANGLAIS, Jean (b. La Fontenelle, Ille-et-Vilaine, 15 Feb. 1907).

French organist and composer. He is of Breton descent. Being blind, he was sent to Paris at the age of ten for his education at the Institution des Jeunes Aveugles, where his professors were M. Blazy for pianoforte, A. Mahaut, a Franck pupil, for harmony and A. Marchal for counterpoint, organ and composition. In 1927 Langlais entered Dupré's organ class at the Paris Conservatoire, where he won a Premier Prix for organ in 1930. He left the Conservatoire after a year in Noël Gallon's class for fugue, returning there in 1934 to attend the composition course of Paul Dukas.

Langlais, who is the present (1953) organist of Sainte-Clotilde in Paris, César Franck's church, had held previous organ appointments.

In 1927 he became assistant organist at Saint-Antoine des Quinze-Vingts and in 1932 organist of Notre-Dame de la Croix. In 1934 he succeeded his first professor, M. Blazy, at Saint-Pierre de Montrouge and in 1945 he succeeded J. Ermond-Bonnal at Sainte-Clotilde. Since 1931 Langlais has taught organ and composition at the Institution Nationale des Jeunes Aveugles.

Although he has written much other music, Langlais is best known by his organ works. Two early sets of organ pieces, the 'Trois Poèmes évangéliques' (1932) and the 'Trois Paraphrases grégoriennes' (1935), enjoy considerable popularity. The former combines plainsong with a picturesque style of organ writing and the latter is in a more severely modal frame. Increased dissonance marks the works written during the second world war, culminating in the difficult organ Symphony (1944). Later works, such as the 'Suite française' (1948), are easier of approach.

LANGLÉ, Honoré François Marie (b. Monaco, 1741; d. Villiers-le-Bel nr. Paris, 20 Sept. 1807).

French composer. He studied with Cafaro at the Conservatorio della Pietà dei Turchini, Naples, and by way of Genoa went to Paris in 1768, where in 1784 he was appointed singing-master at the École Royale de Chant. In 1794 he became professor of harmony and librarian at the newly established Conservatoire. Langlé wrote, from 1783 onwards, a number of operas, of which only one, 'Corisandre, ou Les Fous par enchantement', seems to have gained a hearing (at the Opéra, on 8 Mar. 1791); it even remained in the repertory for a few years and was published in full score. Langlé's theoretical works, 'Traité d'harmonie et de modulation' (1793), 'Traité de la basse sous le chant' (1798), 'Nouvelle Méthode pour chiffrer les accords' (1801) and 'Traité de la fugue' (1805) were severely criticized by Fétis. Mengozzi's 'Méthode de chant du Conservatoire' was edited by Langlé after the author's death.

LANGLEY, Hubert (Francis) (b. London, 30 July 1895).

English actor, baritone singer and writer on music. He was educated at Eton and made for himself a distinctive career as an actor and singer. A light baritone voice, an excellent stage presence and, above all, a fine taste in the classics of music and drama, have contributed to this. He produced Racine's 'Phèdre' and played the part of Hippolyte therein in London, at the Everyman Theatre, Hampstead, in 1931, and he produced and played the title-part in Dryden's 'Aureng-Zebe' at the Westminster Theatre in 1934. But his special predilection has been for the dramatic works of T. A. Arne, for the revival of which he founded a society in 1922. It produced 'Comus', 'The Judgment of Paris' and the 'Masque of Alfred', and under his direction has given performances of the motet 'Libera me, Domine' as well as some of the instrumental works. He has edited for modern use a chorus from the oratorio 'Judith' and explored much of Arne's forgotten work, showing discrimination between what is likely to be practical and what is of interest mainly to the historian. In 1938 he published a monograph, 'Dr. Arne'.

H. C. C.

LANGRISH, Vivian (b. Bristol, 8 Mar. 1894).

English pianist and teacher. He became a pupil of Tobias Matthay in London and gained the Ada Lewis Scholarship at the R.A.M. at the early age of twelve. There he continued under the same teacher and studied harmony with Corder. Four years later he gained the Liszt Scholarship. His first London recital in 1914 created a strong impression of his abilities, but his career was checked by the war 1914-18. He served for a time in the R.A.F. On his return to civil life he was appointed to the pianoforte teaching-staff of the R.A.M. and became a leading professor there. He was created F.R.A.M. in 1924.

LANIER(E).¹ English family of musicians of French descent.²

(1) John (Jean) Lanier(e) (or Lanière) (b. Rouen, ?; d. London, 1579). He is the head of the English branch of the family. He settled in London some time in the 16th century and had property in Crutched Friars.

(2) John Lanier(e) (b. ?; d. ?), sackbut player, son of the preceding. He is mentioned as playing from 1565 to 1605 and is probably the John Lannyer who, on 12 Oct. 1585, married, at Holy Trinity, Minorities, the daughter of Mark Antony Galliardello, another court musician. He had property at East Greenwich, and the registers of Greenwich mention several of the family.

The register of St. Olave, Hart Street, London, also supplies some subsidiary dates of family history.

(3) Nicholas Lanier(e)¹ (b. ?; d. ? Greenwich, 1612), ? brother of the preceding. He owned property at East Greenwich and was musician to Queen Elizabeth in 1581. He died leaving six sons and four daughters. The sons were all court musicians, and one of them, Jerome, had two sons, Jeremy and William, who were musicians in 1634–35.

(4) Nicholas Lanier(e) (b. ? Greenwich, [bapt. 10 Sept.] 1588; d. London, Feb. 1666), singer, composer and painter, (?) nephew of the preceding, son of (2). It is probable that he, rather than either of his namesakes, was the musician for the flutes in 1604; he was attached to the household of Henry, Prince of Wales, and it is assumed that he is the "Laniere" alluded to by Herrick in a poem to Henry Lawes. In 1619 he joined Coperario and others in the composition of Campian's masque for the marriage of Robert Carr, Earl of Somerset, and Lady Frances Howard, performed at Whitehall on St. Stephen's Night 1614. The first song, "Bring away the sacred tree", is reprinted in Stafford Smith's 'Musica antiqua'.

Lanier composed the music for Ben Jonson's masque 'Lovers made Men' given at Lord Haye's house on 22 Feb. 1617, and he is described as introducing the "stylo recitativo", apparently for the first time in England. He sang in the piece and painted the scenery. He also wrote the music for the same poet's masque 'The Vision of Delight' in 1617.

His skill in the art of painting was turned to account in 1625, when he was sent to Italy by Charles I and the Duke of Buckingham to buy pictures.² He remained in Italy about three years and assisted Daniel Nys, the agent through whom the king acquired the Mantuan collection, in the despatch of the pictures to London. He also acquired for Charles a 'St. Peter' by Guido Reni and exchanged pictures with him.³

The patent of his appointment as Master of the King's Musick at a salary of £200 a year is dated 11 July 1626. In 1630 he set Herrick's poem on the birth of Prince Charles. He was appointed keeper of the king's miniatures, and in 1636 the king granted to Lanier and others a charter, incorporating them as "The Marshal, Wardens, and Cominalty of the Arte and Science of Musicke in Westminster" and appointed Lanier the first Marshal.

At the outbreak of the civil war Lanier lost his appointments and seems to have spent much of his time abroad. There are passes among the State Papers for him to journey with pictures and musical instruments between Flanders and England in 1655, 1657 and 1658. In Jonckbloet and Land's 'Musique et musiciens au XVII^e siècle' (p. xxi) is a letter from Lanier, dated 1 Mar. 1645, and in 1646 he begs Huygens to get him a passport to go to Holland. In 1655 the Earl of Newcastle gave a ball at The Hague at which a song set to music by Lanier was sung.

At the Restoration he was reinstated in his posts as Master of the King's Music and Marshal of the corporation of music. He composed New Year's Songs in 1663 and 1665. The entry of his death in the Greenwich registers is dated 24 Feb. 1666, "Mr. Nicholas Laniere buried away" (i.e. elsewhere). Songs and other pieces by him are contained in 'Select Musically Ayres and Dialogues' (1653 and 1659), 'The Musical Companion' (1667), 'The Treasury of Musick' (1669) and 'Choice Ayres and Songs', book iv (1685). Several songs and dialogues by him are in the B.M. (Add. MSS 11,608, 29,396; Eg. MS 2013). A cantata, 'Hero and Leander', is in B.M. (Add. MSS 14,399, 33,236). Other music is in manuscript in the Bodl. Mus. Sch. and Ch. Ch., Oxford.

Charles I owned a 'Holy Family' and the Duke of Buckingham a set of six portraits of French ladies by Lanier. A portrait of him by van Dyck is in the Vienna Gallery and a preparatory chalk study for this in the National Gallery of Scotland at Edinburgh. This was painted for Charles I and at the dispersal of the royal collection it was bought by Lanier himself. Another portrait is in the Bodl. Mus. Sch., both painted and presented by Lanier.⁴

LANNER, Josef (Franz Karl) (b. Vienna, 12 Apr. 1801; d. Oberdöbling nr. Vienna, 14 Apr. 1843).

Austrian violinist and dance composer. The son of a glove-maker, he was more or less self-taught. At the age of twelve he became a violinist in Pamer's famous dance orchestra, which was later joined by the elder Johann Strauss. Michael Pamer (1782–1827) was himself a renowned composer of Ländler and waltzes ('Linzerische Tänze') and thus became the immediate forerunner of Lanner and Strauss. At the age of seventeen Lanner, with the two brothers Drahanek, founded a small band of two violins and a guitar, which in 1819 was augmented by the viola of Strauss, and soon after by a cello. In 1824 the quintet was again enlarged, first to a string team and subsequently to a full classical orchestra. Under Lanner's direction it played in well-known city taverns, coffee houses, and in the Prater, Vienna's large amusement park, and is supposed to have been Vienna's first open-air orchestra. Its popularity became such that Lanner had to divide it, putting Strauss in charge of the other half. Quarrels of a professional nature — Lanner was said often to introduce new compositions by Strauss under his own name — led to a separation in 1825, and Strauss formed his own orchestra, which event is commemorated in Lanner's amusingly programmatic 'Trennungs Walzer', Op. 19. Vienna now had two famous dance orchestras, each with its own followers and partisans. The eminent critic Eduard Hanslick, describing the idolatry of the Viennese for Lanner and Strauss, says that one cannot imagine the wild enthusiasm which the two created . . . over each new waltz the journals used to fly into raptures, there appeared innumerable articles about Lanner and Strauss, enthusiastic, frivolous and serious ones, and longer, to be sure, than those devoted to Beethoven and Mozart. That the sweetly intoxicating three-four rhythm, which took hold of hand and foot, necessarily eclipsed great and serious music, and made the audience increasingly unfit for any intellectual effort, goes without saying.

Yet Hanslick was fair enough to add that Lanner and Strauss filled the waltz form with unexpected musical charm and a truly poetic life reflecting the happy, light-hearted spirit of the Viennese.

Lanner was by nature modest, shy and naively devout — many of his waltzes bearing the inscription "With God" — and was thus the very opposite of his rival. And unlike Strauss, he hardly ever left his own country, his tours taking him to some of Austria's provincial capitals (Graz, Pressburg, Brunn) and once to Milan, on the occasion of the coronation of the Emperor Ferdinand II. In 1829 he was made director of the imperial court balls, and a few years later bandmaster of the second Wiener Bürgerregiment.

With Johann Strauss, sen., Lanner shares the merit of laying the foundation of the Viennese waltz. In the early examples there is little difference in their styles, except that Lanner clung to the older type of Ländler-waltzes longer than Strauss did. This is seen in the fact that while Strauss's Op. 1 already bears the title 'Täuberlwalzer', Lanner still called his first opus 'Neue Wiener Ländler'. Even Lanner's later sets still show a mixture of Ländler and waltzes, such as the 'Zauberhornländler', Op. 31, the 'Steyrische Tänze', Op. 165, etc.

Lanner was unquestionably more gifted than Strauss in that there is more poetry and a greater wealth of melodic invention in his music. Notably his late waltzes — some of which are true masterpieces of the species ('Die Pesther', Op. 93, 'Die Werber', Op. 103, 'Hofballtänze', Op. 161, 'Die Romantiker', Op. 167, 'Abendsterne', Op. 180, 'Die Schönbrunner', Op. 200) combine a wide sweep and shapeliness of melody with harmonic taste and rhythmic élan. Yet it is above all Lanner's coaxing, almost Schubertian lyricism, breathing the air of a light-hearted romanticism, which, in contrast to Strauss's, has kept his music alive. The difference between Lanner's lyrical vein and Strauss's rhythmic fire was expressed by the Viennese in the saying "With Lanner it's 'Pray dance! I beg you'; with Strauss 'You must dance, I command you'."

Lanner's complete works number 207, including 112 waltzes, 10 quadrilles, 3 polkas, 28 galops and 6 marches. A complete edition in pianoforte arrangement (ed. Kremser) was published by Breitkopf & Hartel (1889) and 9 Ländler and waltzes in full score appeared in D.T.Ö., XXIII, 2 (Orel, 1926).

Of Lanner's three children, August (b. Vienna, 23 Jan. 1834; d. Vienna, 27 Sept. 1855) made a promising start as a conductor and dance composer (Opp. 1 to 33), but died prematurely of consumption. Katti (b. Vienna, 1829; d. Vienna, 1904), achieved fame as a ballet dancer and choreographer. She made her début at the Vienna Opera in 1845 and appeared in a number of theatres, including the Empire Theatre, Drury Lane and Crystal Palace in London, and was referred to as "the Taglioni of the North". LANTINS (Lanctins), Arnold de (b. ?; d. ?).

Netherlands 15th-century singer and composer. The first fact concerning him that appears is that he was a singer in the Papal Chapel in Rome from Nov. 1431 to July 1432. But he is said to have been in Italy, for some time before that, especially at Venice, where he wrote some chansons in Mar. 1428. He also composed church music. Manuscripts of sacred and secular works are in the library of the Liceo Musicale at Bologna.

E. v. d. s., adds.

LANTINS (Lanctins), Hugo de (b. ?; d. ?).

Netherlands 15th-century singer and composer. Nothing is known of his early life. He was in Italy in 1420, when he wrote chansons for the marriage of Cleofanta Malatesta of Rimini with Theodore, son of the Byzantine Emperor Manuel II, which was also celebrated in music by Dufay. He appears to have lived at Venice for some time and also to have been a singer at the church of St. Nicholas at Bari. A 'Christus vincit' for 3 voices was written in honour of Francesco Foscari, doge of Venice from 1423. He wrote both church music and secular songs for several voices. A considerable number of his works are preserved at Bologna (Univ. Lib.), Oxford (Bodleian Lib.) and Vienna (Cod. Trient). Some have been republished by Stainer (see Bibl.), in the 'Hausmusik' by Riemann, who considers him almost equal to Binchois, in van den Borren's 'Polyphonia sacra' and an 'Et in terra' in D.T.Ö., LXI, 7.

LANZETTI, Salvatore (b. Naples, c. 1710; d. Turin, c. 1780).

Italian violoncellist and composer. He studied at Naples, went to London about 1739 and is mentioned by Burney as one of those who brought the cello into favour in England, where he still was in 1754, after a visit to Germany, where he gave concerts at Frankfurt o/M. on 29 and 31 May 1751. From London he went to Turin as member of the royal chapel. He composed a number of sonatas for one and two cellos with bass and a tutor for his instrument. Several of his sonatas were republished by Piatti and by Schröder.

LAO CHI-CHENG. See CHINESE MUSIC (MODERN).

LAPARRA, Raoul (b. Bordeaux, 13 May 1876; d. nr. Paris, 4 Apr. 1943).

French composer. He was a pupil of Gédalge, Massenet and Fauré in Paris. He wrote mainly operas, of which the best-known are 'La Habanera', in 3 acts (Paris, Opéra-Comique, 26 Feb. 1908, and still in the repertory); 'La Jota', lyric drama in 2 acts (Opéra-Comique, 26 Apr. 1911); 'Le Joueur de viole', lyric tale in 4 acts (Opéra-Comique, 24 Dec. 1925); 'Las Toreras' (Lille, Feb. 1929); and a zarzuela entitled 'L'Illustre Fregona', based on a story by Cervantes (Paris, Opéra, 16 Feb. 1931), the new revolving stage at the Opéra being inaugurated with this work. This was also given in Stockholm and Buenos Aires, but the only other work by Laparra which had a success abroad was 'La Habanera', which was heard in Germany, London (Covent Garden, 18 July 1910), Belgium, U.S.A. and Italy.

Laparra's music is characterized by an effective use of Spanish and Basque rhythms, and he was always his own librettist. He was killed in an air-raid on Paris.

R. H. M.

LAPICIDA, Erasmus (b. ?; d. ?).

Flemish (?) or Italian 15th–16th-century theorist and composer. He was nearly contemporary with Josquin des Prés, is mentioned by Ornithoparcus as one of the approved composers of his time and is also referred to as an authority in musical theory in certain correspondence between Spataro and Giovanni del Lago. Petrucci printed some Lamentations by him with the plainsong melody in the tenor, also three motets. In Forster's 'Liederbuch' (1539) seven German songs bear his name, which Ambros thought to be adaptations of other compositions by Lapidida to German words; but Eitner claims to have proved them to be original settings of the German texts since the cantus firmus is in each case the original melody to the text.

J. R. M.

LAPIS, Santo (b. ?; d. ?).

Italian 18th-century composer. Little is known of his life beyond what can be deduced from his works. In 1729 he wrote, together with Cordans, the opera 'La generosità di Tiberio' for Venice, and the year after contributed some airs to Gasparini's 'La fede in cimento' there. In 1738 he was in Prague (opera 'Tigrane'), and from that period his printed Op. 1, consisting of trio sonatas (Augsburg, n.d.), may date. He lived in Holland for some years, about 1752–56, and several works for harpsichord, flute, etc., were published in Amsterdam; the score of the opera 'L'infelice avventurato' (? Amsterdam, 1754) was once in Breitkopf's possession. Lapis was probably in London in 1758–59, when his Opp. 15 (cello solos) and 16 (a book of songs and duets, dedicated to Miss Mayer), were printed "for the author". He is last heard of in Edinburgh, as harpsichordist of a visiting Italian intermezzo company, who performed Pergolesi's 'La serva padrona' there in June 1763, and he may have gone with the same company to York (Oct. 1763) and Dublin (spring 1764).

LAPORTE, Joseph de (b. Belfort, 1719; d. Paris, 19 Dec. 1779).

French author. He entered the Jesuit Order, where he finished his studies. He became an abbé and settled in Paris and devoted himself chiefly to literature on the theatre, including the operatic stage. His works include 'Anecdotes dramatiques', with others, 3 vols., 1775 (a dictionary of plays and their authors and operas and their composers); 'Dictionnaire dramatique', a similar work compiled with Chamfort, 3 vols., 1776; 'Almanach historique et chronologique de tous les spectacles de Paris', founded by him in 1752 and continued under various titles until 1815.

LA POUPELINIÈRE (La Popelinière), Alexandre Jean Joseph Le Riche de (b. Chinon, 26 July 1693; d. Paris, 5 Dec. 1762).

French statesman and musical amateur. He belonged to a noble family and amassed enormous wealth in his capacity of general farmer of taxes. He was an enthusiastic supporter of musicians, especially of Rameau, whose pupil he was and who lived in his house for several years. He was also a patron of the elder Stamitz. At his residence musical performances were frequently given, and he kept his own private orchestra, into which were introduced, for the first time in France, clarinets, horns and the harp. LA PRESLE, Jacques (Paul Gabriel Sauville) de (b. Versailles, 5 July 1888).

French composer. He entered the Paris Conservatoire in 1908, was awarded first prize for harmony in 1909, served in the infantry during the 1914-18 war, during which time he won the Military Medal, and was twice mentioned in despatches. He returned to the Conservatoire in 1919. In 1920 he was awarded the prize for fugue and in 1921 the Prix de Rome. In 1930 he was appointed musical director of the wireless station Radio-Paris and in 1938 professor of harmony at the Conservatoire.

As a composer he is as successful in works conceived on a vast scale as in the most delicate sketches. The depth and richness of his work is equally well expressed in nobly flowing melody as in the subtlety of atmosphere impregnated with poetry.

His principal works are:

'Hermione', cantata (1921).

'L'Apocalypse de Saint Jean', oratorio in three parts (1929).

'Deux Chœurs de printemps' for orch. & chorus.

'Album d'images', ten pieces for orch. (1938).

Concert Piece for cello & orch.

'Le Vent', poem for voice & orch.

'Impressions', 3 poems for voice & orch.

Suite in G ma. for stg. 4tet.

Sonata for vn. & pf.

'Parade fantasque' for pf.

Twenty-two songs for voice & pf.

LARCHET, John (b. Dublin, 1885).

Irish organist and composer. He graduated Mus.B. (1915) and Mus.D. (1917) of Dublin University. He was for some years organist of the Jesuit Church, Dublin, and conductor of the Abbey Theatre orchestra, and in 1920 was appointed Professor of Music at the National University, in succession to Kitson. He has composed many tone poems, song cycles and single songs, and arranged some Irish folk tunes in an unconventional way.

LARGE (Lat. maxima), the note of greatest time-value in the early system of measured music. It could be triple or duple (i.e. equaling three or two longs), according to the mood:

(The black form is the earlier. In some very early examples the tail is omitted, but this is rare.)

With the increasing articulation of polyphonic music the large became a somewhat fossilized form and was seldom called for except in the plainsong canti fermi when a note was prolonged through several measures as a pedal-point.

The final note of a composition was usually written as a large; here the large was used without mensural significance, indicating an indefinite prolongation of tone, as does the fermata or pause-mark. In such cases the large often appears in this form:

The breaking-up of the note into two is merely a convention of ornament and has no vocal significance.

LARGO (Ital., broad). A term indicating a slow, broad, dignified style.

The term largamente (which is the adverb of

In the B.M. (Add. MSS 31, 424, fol. 46, 53b) are two gigues marked largo, the others in the same set being marked vivace or allegro.

LAROCHE, Herman Augustovich (b. St. Petersburg, 25 May 1845; d. St. Petersburg, 18 Oct. 1904).

Russian critic. He received his musical education at the St. Petersburg Conservatory, where he was a contemporary of Tchaikovsky (1862-66). In 1867 he was appointed to a professorship at the Moscow Conservatory. He returned to St. Petersburg in 1871, where most of his life was spent.

Laroche was a voluminous contributor to many of the leading Russian newspapers and periodicals, and was regarded as the chief representative of conservative principles in music. His writing was distinguished for its excellence of style, erudition and flashes of original thought; but his work as a whole lacks system and shows more personal bias than reasoned conviction. He translated Hanslick's 'Vom Musikalisch-Schönen' into Russian. He was one of the first to appreciate the genius of Tchaikovsky and devoted many articles to his personality and his works.

R. N.

LAROCHE, James (known as Jemmy) (b. ?; d. ?).

English 17th-18th-century singer. As a boy he was a member of Congreve's and Betterton's company in London at the new theatre in Lincoln's Inn Fields, and there sang in Dec. 1695 a song by Eccles introduced into Lord Lansdowne's comedy 'The She-Gallants'.¹ On 14 Nov. 1696 he sang the part of Cupid in 'The Loves of Mars and Venus' (music by Eccles and Finger) and in Nov. 1697 that of a Savoyard boy in 'Europe's Revels for the Peace' (music by Eccles and others).² In the latter interlude he had a song, 'The Rarce-Show', which was very popular and was frequently reprinted, in collections and as single sheets, until about 1720. The portrait of Laroche, representing his show to a group of children, appears on some of the later sheets and it was also used by Marcellus Laroon in his 'Cryes of the City of London' (1688 and 1711). There is however no record of Laroche as a singer after 1697.

² Performed in celebration of the peace of Ryswyck in 1697, not for that of the peace of Utrecht in 1713 (as stated in previous editions of this Dictionary).

LARSÉN-TODSEN, Nanny (Isidora) (b. Hagby, Kalmar län, 2 Aug. 1884).

Swedish soprano singer. She was the daughter of J. V. Larsén and became the wife of H. Todsén in 1916. After studying at the Stockholm Conservatory and in Germany and Italy in 1900-6 she made her début at the Royal Theatre, Stockholm, as Agatha in 'Freischütz', Ava in Hallén's 'Waldemars-skatten' and the Countess in 'Nozze di Figaro'. She was engaged at the Royal Theatre in 1907-22, during which period her voice changed from lyric to dramatic soprano and she specialized in Wagnerian parts. In 1922 she was appointed court singer and retired from the Royal Theatre in order to tour abroad. She sang at La Scala, Milan, under Toscanini in 1923-24; at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, in 1925-27, and at Bayreuth in 1927-31, where she was one of the few singers who have played the parts of Isolde, Brünnhilde and Kundry. She sang as a guest at almost every opera-house in Europe and was considered the finest of all Swedish Wagnerian singers. Her other parts include Donna Anna in 'Don Giovanni', Aida, Tosca and the Marschallin in 'Rosenkavalier'. She was elected a member of the Academy of Music in 1924 and now teaches in Stockholm.

LARSON, (Lars) Einar (b. Harbo, Västmanland, 11 Sept. 1897).

Swedish baritone singer. He was educated at Harbo, and while pursuing a business career at Uppsala he studied singing with John Forsell, 1923-26, and at the Royal Opera School, Stockholm, in 1925-26. He first appeared as Orpheus (Gluck) at the Academy of Music in 1925 and made his début as Valentine in 'Faust' at the Royal Theatre in 1926, since when he has been engaged there. In 1933 he undertook further studies in Berlin, and in 1935 in Milan. He sang at Barcelona during the Swedish Week in 1929; in Copenhagen, 1930; Finland, 1931; Norway, 1932; and Estonia in 1934. His voice is lyrical in quality and is at its best in Verdi's music. Among his other parts are Eugene Onegin, Agamemnon in Gluck's 'Iphigenia in Aulis', Prince Igor, Arnljot (Peterson-Berger) and Kapten Kristian in 'Kavaljererna på Ekeby' (Zandonai). He created the title-part in the world-première of Natanael Berg's 'Engelbrekt'.

LARSSON, Lars-Erik (Vilner) (b. Åkarp, 15 May 1908).

Swedish composer. He studied pianoforte and violin during his schooldays at Åkarp, and after taking organ lessons with H. Åkerberg at Malmö and qualifying as an organist he entered the Stockholm Conservatory to study counterpoint and composition with E. Ellberg. He subsequently continued his studies at Leipzig and in Vienna, where he was a pupil of Alban Berg. He was coach at the Royal Theatre, Stockholm, in 1933-37 and music correspondent of 'Lunds Dagbladet' during the same period. Since 1937 he has been a conductor in the Swedish Radio Service. In 1934 and 1936 his Sinfonietta and second Symphony were performed at the I.S.C.M. Festival at Florence and Barcelona respectively. He was elected a member of the Academy of Music in 1943 and appointed professor of instrumentation and form at the High School of Music, Stockholm, in 1947.

LA RUE, Pierre de (b. Tournai, ?; d. Courtrai, 20 Nov. 1518).

Netherlands composer. His father, Jean de La Rue, was attached to the chapel of Philippe le Beau in 1496-1501. He may have been a pupil of Okeghem's, but this is uncertain. His name first appears in the accounts of the court of Burgundy in 1477, and on 2 Apr. 1485 he is mentioned as a member of the chapel of the Archduke Maximilian of Austria, though doubtless with residence in the Netherlands, and for the period from 1490 to June 1491 he received 36 Rhenish guilders for service in the chapel of Our Lady at 's Hertogenbosch, where he again appeared in 1496 with visiting singers from the Burgundian court. He was at that time a chaplain, and on 8 Feb. 1501 he was made a canon of Mechlin. But this benefice, which was only one of several, may not have been residential. In 1502 he visited Spain with Philippe le Bel, and during a second visit the following year he was attached to the chapel at Valladolid. He was a canon of Courtrai from 1503, but did not live there until the end of his days, being at Mechlin about 1510-14 and at Termonde for some two years after that. Margaret of Austria, governess of the Netherlands, was his patroness from 1512.

Writers on music have accorded La Rue a position as a contrapuntal composer scarcely second to that of Josquin, and the magnificent copies of his masses made by order of Margaret of Austria, and now in the libraries of Vienna and Brussels, testify to the value set upon his works by those he served. Indeed, considering his great reputation, it is somewhat surprising that so little of his music was printed. Of the thirty-six masses now existing Petrucci published five in the composer's lifetime ('Missae Petri de la Rue'; Venice, 1503), and a few more in later collections. Twenty-three remain in manuscript. Of motets only twenty-five (though thirty-eight have been identified), and of secular pieces no more than ten, are to be found in the publications of the 16th century—a small result compared with the long catalogue of Josquin's printed works. Burney, Forkel and Kiesewetter give short examples from Pierre de La Rue's compositions.

LARUETTE. A type of French vocal stage part associated in the 18th century and later with a singer of that name (see below).

LARUETTE, Jean Louis (b. Toulouse, 27 Mar. 1731; d. Toulouse, Jan. 1792).

French composer and singer. He went to Paris at an early age, joined the Opéra-Comique as actor and tenor singer in 1752 and soon began to contribute single airs to vaudeville comedies performed at the fairs of Saint-Germain and Saint-Laurent. His name as a composer of such airs first appears in 1753 (in 'Le Boulevard' and 'Le Plaisir et l'innocence') and, along with the general development of French comic opera, proceeded to full-length comédies mêlées d'ariettes, of which he is, together with Blaise and Duni, one of the earliest representatives. His chief works were 'Les Amans trompés' (1756), 'La Fausse Aventurière' (1757), 'Le Docteur Sangrado' (with Duni, 1758), 'Cendrillon' (1759), 'L'Yvrogne corrigé'¹ (1759) and 'Le Guy de Chesne, ou La Feste des Druides' (1763). The last-named was performed at the Comédie-Italienne, with which the Opéra-Comique had amalgamated in 1762, and Laruette continued as a member of the new company until 1779, when he retired and went to live in his native Toulouse. His last comic opera, 'Les Deux Compères' (3 Sept. 1772), had been a failure and he had then given up composing.

Madame Laruette, formerly Mlle Villette (c. 1740–after 1793), whom he married in 1763, was a favourite singer and actress at the Opéra-Comique and Comédie-Italienne from her début on 9 Sept. 1758 until her retirement in 1779, who excelled in the parts of "jeunes Dugazon". Laruette, who, in spite of his tenor voice, mostly acted and sang elderly tutors, fathers, etc., became so closely associated with those parts that his name was used for a long time to indicate the type.

LAS INFANTAS, Fernando de (b. Córdoba, 1534; d. ? Paris, ?).

Spanish composer and theologian. He came of a noble family. One of his ancestors, Don Juan Fernández de Córdoba, was appointed guardian to the three daughters of Peter the Cruel after his death at the battle of Montiel (1369). He conveyed two of the Infantas to Bayonne, then in English occupation, and both were married to English barons, Doña Constanza to John of Gaunt and Doña Isabel to Edmund Langley, his brother. Don Juan seems afterwards to have accompanied the Infantas to England; and in reward for these services his descendants were permitted to bear the name "de las Infantas".

Don Fernando de las Infantas grew up at a time when music was greatly encouraged at Córdoba, through the bishop, the Archduke Charles of Austria, who was himself a keen musician. His earliest known work is a motet for 5 voices, 'Parce mihi Domine', on the death of the Emperor Charles V (1558). In 1565 he composed a motet, 'Congregati sunt', to celebrate a victory over the Turks at Melilla. It is set for 7 voices, one of which sings independently, after the manner so much favoured by Morales. In the same way he celebrated the battle of Lepanto (1571) by a motet, 'Cantemus Domino', for 5 voices, one being independent. By this time he had migrated to Rome, where, in 1575, he composed a setting of Psalm XCIX for the "Anno Jubilei"; it is a monumental work for 6 voices, one of which (independent of the others) sings the theme treated in the same way by Morales in his cantata on the peace of Nice. Owing to his position Fernando de las Infantas was able to take a step which had some influence on the history of church music. Through his intervention the reform of the 'Graduale Romanum' was suspended. He wrote personally to Philip II on the matter, and definite instructions were sent to the Spanish ambassador.

In 1578–79 Infantas published three books of motets, 'Sacrarum varii styli cantionum', at Venice, and a treatise on counterpoint entitled 'Plura modulationum genera'. Then, in 1584, he took orders — a step caused, he said, through his buying and reading the Psalms of David. With this episode his artistic career ended. He left Rome "after 25 years continuous residence", and in 1601 a 'Tractatus de praedestinatione' from his pen was published in Paris. As a member of the church he no longer found favour with the ecclesiastical authorities. In 1607, and again in 1609, he addressed memorials to Philip III, stating that he was in poor circumstances and desired some modest retreat in which he could end his long life. His musical works are as follows:

'Don Ferdinandi de las Infantas Patritij Cordubensis sacrarum varii styli cantionum tituli Spiritus Sancti':

Lib. I (4 voices). Venice, Gardano, 1578. (Madrid, Real Conservatorio, 3 part-books; cantus in Bibl. Nac., M. 1163.)

Lib. II (5 v.). Venice, H. Scotus, 1578. (Augsburg.)

LASERNA, Blas (b. Corella, Navarre, 4 Feb. 1751; d. Madrid, 8 Aug. 1816).

Spanish composer. In 1779 he was appointed official composer to several of the Madrid theatres. He wrote music for a comedy by Ramón de la Cruz, 'El café de Barcelona', which was produced at Barcelona on 4 Nov. 1788. In 1790 he succeeded Esteve. His comic opera 'La gitanilla por amor' was produced at the Teatro de la Cruz in Madrid in 1791 with notable success, and it long retained its popularity, being revived in Madrid as late as 1843. On 9 Dec. 1792 he produced in Madrid the lyric scene 'Idomeneo', libretto by Comella. He composed an immense number of tonadillas, of which the Bibl. Nacional in Madrid possesses 13 vols. and the Bibl. Municipal many more in unbound manuscripts. He also wrote incidental music for several of the great Spanish plays of the 17th century, by Calderón, Lope de Vega, Móroto and others. In 1801 he was conducting at the Cruz and Principe theatres in Madrid. 'El trueque de los amantes' (c. 1785) was reprinted in Subirá's 'Tonadillas teatrales inéditas' (1932). J. B. T., adds.

LASSALLE, Jean (b. Lyons, 17 Dec. 1847; d. Paris, 7 Sept. 1909).

French baritone singer. He was the son of a silk merchant at Lyons, intended for the same business, and studied industrial design at the Beaux-Arts, Lyons, and later in Paris. There he abandoned the idea of a mercantile career and for a time studied painting. He also studied singing at the Conservatoire, but, making little progress, he left the school and studied privately under Novelli (Lavessière). He made his début at Liège as Saint-Bris in Meyerbeer's 'Huguenots' (19 Nov. 1868). He sang next at Lille, Toulouse, The Hague and Brussels (5 Sept. 1871). On 7 June 1872 he made a successful début at the Paris Opéra. With the exception of visits, on leave of absence, to London, Russia, Madrid, Milan, Vienna, Prague, Warsaw, the U.S.A., etc., Lassalle remained at the Opéra for twenty-three years, and became principal baritone there on the retirement of Faure in 1872.

On 14 June 1879 he made his début in London, at Covent Garden Theatre, as Nelusko in Meyerbeer's 'L'Africaine', and played there for three seasons with great success. From 1888 to 1893 he appeared at the same theatre in a great variety of parts with unvarying success, notably on 13 July 1889 as Hans Sachs on the production of 'The Mastersingers' in Italian. In 1896 and 1897 he played in Germany.

After 1901 Lassalle devoted himself to teaching in Paris, and in Nov. 1903 he was appointed a professor at the Conservatoire. Excellent alike as a singer and an actor, the possessor of a beautiful voice, an indefatigable worker, Lassalle was one of the finest artists of his time. A. C., abr.

LASSEN, Eduard (b. Copenhagen, 13 Apr. 1830; d. Weimar, 15 Jan. 1904).

Danish (naturalized Belgian) conductor and composer. He was taken to Brussels when only two and entered the Conservatoire there at twelve. In 1844 he took the first prize as pianist, in 1847 the same for harmony, and soon afterwards the second prize for composition. His successes, which were many, were crowned by the Belgian Prix de Rome in 1851, after which he started on a lengthy tour through Germany and Italy. Disappointed in his hopes of getting a five-act opera performed in Brussels, he left for Weimar, where in 1857 it was produced as 'Landgraf Ludwig's Brautfahrt', under the care of Liszt and with great success. In the following year he was appointed court music director, and on the retirement of Liszt in 1860 succeeded him as conductor of the Opera. A second opera, 'Frauenlob', was given in 1860, and a third, 'Le Captif', was brought out in Brussels in 1865. At Weimar Lassen had the satisfaction of producing Wagner's 'Tristan und Isolde' in 1874, at a time when no other theatre but Munich had dared to do so.

Lassen wrote a Symphony in D major, a 'Beethoven' overture and a Festival overture, music to Sophocles' 'Oedipus' (1874), to Hebbel's 'Nibelungen', Goethe's 'Faust', Parts 1 and 2 (1876), to Scheffel's festival play 'Die Linde am Ettersberg' (1878), to Devrient's version of Calderón's 'Circe' (1881) and to Goethe's 'Pandora' (1886). His works also include a second Symphony, in C major (Op. 78), a 'Fest-Cantate', a 'Te Deum', a set of 'Bibliche Bilder' for voices and orchestra, a large number of songs and other pieces. In 1881 he was decorated with the order of Leopold. His 'Faust' music long kept the stage all over Germany. G.

LASSER, Johann Baptist (b. Steinbrücken, Lower Austria, 12 Aug. 1751; d. Munich, 21 Oct. 1805).

Austrian singer and composer. He was tenor and musical director successively at Brno (1781-86), Linz (1786-88) and Graz (1788-91), until he settled at Munich in that last year. Of about ten Singspiele he wrote for those towns, 'Die unruhige Nacht' (lib. after Goldoni's 'La notte critica') is the only one which is still extant (score in Berlin). It was produced at Munich in 1792. His printed Op. 1, three masses, came out at Augsburg in 1795; Lasser also published a 'Vollständige Anleitung zur Singkunst' (Munich, 1798; copy in B.M.). A. L.

LASSERRE, Jules Bernard (b. Tarbes, 29 July 1838; d. Tarbes, 19 Feb. 1906).

French violoncellist. He entered the Paris Conservatoire in 1852, where he gained the second prize in 1853 and the first prize in 1855. When Pasdeloup's popular concerts were first started he was appointed solo cellist; he also played with great success in the principal towns of France. During 1859 he was solo cellist at the court of Madrid and travelled through Spain. In 1869 he took up his residence in England, where he played principal cello under Costa and at the Musical Union.

Lasserre wrote various compositions, both for his own instrument and for the violin: Études, Fantasies, Romances, Tarantelles, transcriptions, a cello method, etc. T. P. P.

LASSUS, Roland de (Lat. Orlandus Lassus; Ital. Orlando di Lasso)¹ (b. Mons, 1532²; d. Munich, 14 June 1594).

Netherlands composer. From his ninth year he made great progress in his knowledge of music, and the beauty of his voice attracted so much attention at the church of Saint-Nicolas at Mons, where he was a choir-boy, that he was thrice abducted; but on the third occasion his parents permitted him to be taken into the service of Ferdinando Gonzaga, Viceroy of Sicily, who was then commander of the emperor's forces at Saint-Dizier. This brings us to the year 1544, since it is known that the siege of Saint-Dizier took place in July and Aug. of that year. Lassus accompanied Gonzaga first to Palermo, then for a longer period to Milan. After six years, Quickelberg says, his voice broke, and when he was eighteen Constantin Castriotto took him to Naples, where he lived for three years with Giovanni Battista d'Azia, Marchese della Terza. Here Quickelberg confirms the composer's birth year; for if Lassus was six years with Gonzaga before his voice broke at the age of eighteen, then he can only have been born in 1532. Quickelberg goes on to relate that about the autumn of 1552 Lassus went on to Rome, where he was the guest of the Archbishop of Florence, Antonio Altoviti, for six months, and was then appointed choirmaster to the celebrated church of St. John Lateran (Apr. 1553).³ According to Quickelberg he was two years altogether in Rome, and was then recalled to Flanders on hearing of the illness of his parents; but arriving too late and finding them dead he accepted the invitation to accompany Cesare Braccaccio, a Neapolitan nobleman and musical amateur, on a first visit to England and then to France.⁴ Afterwards he settled for two years at Antwerp, where he enjoyed the society of men of rank and culture, rousing their interest in his music, and gaining their esteem and affection.

By his twenty-second or twenty-third year he had already obtained a very extensive and varied experience of life in the society of distinguished patrons, and besides his musical talents he must have had remarkably engaging social qualities to have secured the favour of so many in high positions. It also says much for his strength of character in his youthful years that in spite of the dissipations of court life he found time for the serious study of musical composition. Who were his actual masters we have no means of knowing, but both at Milan and Naples, the two places where he made the longest stay of his adolescent years, there were musicians of distinction from whom he may have learned to pay less attention to the scholastic formalities of canon and cantus firmus than was customary at Rome, and rather to concentrate his efforts on the art of expression by a freer system of counterpoint and chordal harmony.

³ This latter statement was previously open to doubt, for apart from Baini's reference to it with the mistaken date of 1541, there was no further evidence; but all doubt may now be considered as set at rest, according to Casimiri (see Bibl.), by the discovery of some documents which indirectly appear to show that Lassus did actually occupy this post from at least Apr. 1553 to Dec. 1554.

ANTWERP PUBLICATIONS.—From his settlement at Antwerp by the end of 1554 or the beginning of 1555 there is no longer any uncertainty with regard to the details of Lassus's career. He emerges to the light of day as the fully equipped musician with an already strongly marked individuality of style. His two first publications appeared in 1555, one printed at Venice, which may have been left or sent there shortly before his arrival at Antwerp. This was his first book of Italian madrigals for 5 voices, containing 22, not reckoning second parts separately, mostly on verses by Petrarch. His other publication of 1555 is even more interesting, as showing from the first the remarkably versatile and cosmopolitan character of his musical activity. It is a miscellaneous collection of Italian madrigals and villanellas, French chansons and Latin motets, all for 4 voices. This was published by Tylman Susato of Antwerp in two editions, one with an Italian title and dedication by Lassus, the other with a longer French title and without dedication; and then again in the same year there was another edition printed by Waelrant and Laet, rivals of Susato in the Antwerp publishing trade, all which seems to show that Lassus's works were already being much sought after. His dedication is addressed to a Signor Stefano, an Antwerp musical dilettante, who expected from the composer music easily understood and generally pleasing. The book may be said to satisfy these requirements. The 7 madrigals, one of which is a sestina, are written in a more spontaneous and less artificial style than those of the first book. There are followed by 6 villanellas, the fruits no doubt of his earlier stay at Naples, which differ from the madrigals in being of a humorous character and written in a lighter and more popular style with the simplest homophonic harmony and repetition in several verses. But by his use of four-part harmony he gave greater refinement to this class of work, though it also appears that in some of these pieces his tenor part is simply adopted from an earlier composer of such trifles. The 6 French chansons which come next are of a sentimental cast, exquisite miniatures in the madrigal style with perhaps some influence from the villanella, though this latter influence is more apparent afterwards in the chansons of a comic or satirical character. Then come 4 Latin motets, which are remarkable as showing from the first the composer's marked predilection in church music for the composition of texts of a deeply penitential or meditative prayerful character, in which, generally speaking, he was more successful than in the composition of texts of a joyous, festive character. As van den Borren says, the sentiment of penitence is expressed with a singular intensity in the two motets on texts from the Office of the Dead, 'Peccantem me quotidie' and 'Domine quando veneris'. The appearance of such works so early in his career seems to show that in spite of the dissipations of the brilliant court life to which he had been accustomed, and with the keen appreciation of the humorous aspects of life which find expression in so much of his secular work, there was still a vein of deep religion in his nature which found sincere expression in his church music. At the end of this miscellaneous work of 1555 there are two secular pieces with Latin words, one 'Alma Nemes', by Lassus, the other 'Calami sonum ferentes', by Cyprien de Rore, which are remarkable as being very bold experiments for the time in chromatic writing, showing the desire to illustrate particular words and phrases by unusual chromatic progressions and harmonies, as for instance in 'Alma Nemes', especially on the words "Simul dulce novumque melos".

In 1556 Lassus published another important work at Antwerp, his first book of motets, 12 a 5 and 6 a 6. This book is dedicated to Antoine Perrenot, Bishop of Arras, afterwards more generally known as the statesman Cardinal Granvelle, who had recently, in 1555, become chief minister to Philip II of Spain for the government of the Netherlands. In the dedication Lassus expresses his gratitude for benefits already received, describing Perrenot as being at that time his only patron and benefactor, and calls his special attention to the first motet of the book, 'Delitiae Phoebe', on verses written in his praise. Evidently Lassus was just then anxious to obtain some permanent church position in the Netherlands through the patronage of this powerful statesman-bishop. Another motet, a 5, 'Te spectant, Reginalde, poli', is addressed to Cardinal Pole, with a flattering pun upon his name. Lassus may have come in contact with Pole through Bishop Perrenot on some occasion of Pole's passage through Antwerp. The verses were also probably written by the composer himself and suggest that his political and religious sympathies were all on the Roman side in the great controversies of the day. Two motets a 6, 'Heroum Soboles' and 'Si qua tibi obtulerint', are addressed to the Emperor Charles V, indirectly soliciting his patronage by lauding his merits as a musical connoisseur and a generous patron of musicians. 'Heroum Soboles' is written in a very jubilant style with mostly homophonic harmony. It is also noticeable for its combination of texts, the second alto having only the line "acquabit laudes nulla camena tuas" with its musical phrase as cantus firmus throughout. Of the church motets in this publication the penitential pieces are again remarkable for a peculiar intensity of expression. 'Gustate et videte', a 5, has a story attached to it which will be referred to later on. 'Fremuit spiritus Jesus', a 6, the story of the resurrection of Lazarus, is written in a very dramatic style, the second soprano having only in long-sustained notes the words "Lazare veni foras", which the other voices take up after the word "exclamavit" and repeat with greater emphasis. Lassus does not often use the strict canon form, but we may just note his impressive setting of 'Creator omnium Deus', with its canon in subdiapente post unum tempus between second soprano and second tenor.

RESIDENCE AT MUNICH.—It was probably through his patron, the Bishop of Arras, who had relations with the Bavarian court, that Lassus was recommended to the notice of Albert V, Duke of Bavaria, who was just then anxious to increase and reorganize the musical resources of his chapel at Munich by recruiting new members from the Netherlands.¹ Ludwig Daser still remained Kapellmeister, and Lassus was at first engaged simply as one of the singers or chamber musicians; but he occupied an exceptional position, having a higher salary than the others, and even than Daser himself, apart from what Daser received for the maintenance and instruction of the choir-boys. From Dec. 1557 he received 200 florins per annum. In 1558 he married Regina Weckinger, daughter of a lady of the Munich court. A very expressive motet a 5, 'Sponsa, quid agis, mea lux', first published in the 'Magnum Opus' of 1604, is thought to have been written and composed by him to celebrate the occasion of his own marriage.

In 1559 appeared his second book of madrigals for 5 voices, containing 10 numbers beginning with a sestina, but also including 3 contributions by other composers. But most of these pieces had previously appeared in 'Secondo Libro delle Muse a 5', published at Rome in 1557, with a dedicatory preface by a Roman admirer of Lassus's work, which he describes as "full of sweetness and art". He was unwilling that these "fruits of a most rare genius", which he had already obtained from the composer himself in Rome, should be withheld from the public. The madrigals of the second book of 1559 might thus appear to be earlier than those which Lassus had selected for his first book of 1555, and they are less chromatic with more use of homophonic harmony after the manner of the villanellas. In 1560 two different editions of what is described as the first book of madrigals for 4 voices appeared, one at Rome, the other at Venice, containing the seven madrigals of the miscellaneous collection of 1555, with two new ones different in each case. Publishers seem to have had a free hand in these matters. These parallel publications were afterwards combined in 1569 as together constituting Lassus's first book of 4-part madrigals, containing 11 numbers, which was then frequently reprinted. 1560 was also the year of publication of a large number of chansons in the collections of Le Roy and Ballard in Paris, and of Peter Phalèse in Louvain. Among them may be specially mentioned 'Mon cœur se recommande à vous', a 5, and 'Le Rossignol' and 'Susanne un jour', both a 5, which reappear in Yonge's 'Musica Transalpina' of 1588, where also are independent settings of the same texts by Alfonso Ferrabosco. In Ferrabosco's setting of 'Susanne un jour' we may just notice a slight resemblance in the soprano part to some of Lassus's phrases. As Ferrabosco is known to have been intimate with Byrd, it may have been he who called Byrd's attention to Lassus's settings and incited him to provide his independent settings of the English words, 'Susanna fair', a 5, in his 'Psalms and Sonnets' of 1588, and in 1589, 'Susanna fair' and 'The Nightingale', a 3.² But what is also worth mentioning and apparently has not been noticed before, is that Giles Farnaby in his setting of 'Susanna fair' a 4, in his book of 1598, simply took Lassus's soprano part into his own soprano as a cantus firmus in longer notes for his independent counterpoint in shorter notes in the other voices. Included with the chansons of 1560 there is an interesting setting a 6 of the first ten lines of dialogue from Virgil's first Eclogue, 'Tityre tu patulae', almost entirely with homophonic harmony and with a fairly close observance of Latin quantities. In 1561 Lassus's only publications are three madrigals of an elegiac character contributed to the 'Terzo Libro delle Muse a 5', published by Gardano at Venice, one of which, 'Oh d' amarissime onde', is reprinted in Hawkins's 'History'. It is also perhaps of some interest to note that in this collection Lassus appears in company with Palestrina, who contributes 8 numbers, one of which, very popular, 'Io son ferito', Lassus afterwards takes as the title and basis of one of his masses. In the 'Terzo Libro delle Muse a

4', published by Barré at Rome in 1562, are three more madrigals by Lassus, simpler and more homophonic, but graceful and expressive.

In June 1562 a more important work saw the light. Lassus published at Nuremberg his 'Sacrae cantiones 5 vocum', dedicated to Duke Albert, containing 25 numbers. This work shows the master in the full possession of all the resources of his art for the devout expression of the various phases of personal religious feeling, from penitential sorrow and prayerful meditation to joyous praise and thanksgiving. Without specifying particular masterpieces, we may just note as characteristic of his style his fondness for the picturesque illustration of prominent words and phrases, as in 'Videntes stellam Magi' and 'Jerusalem plantabis'; in 'O Domine salvum fac', on the words "non moriar, sed vivam", and in the very expressive 'Quam benignus' the words "in silentio". The strangest instance is perhaps on the word "laborem" in 'Deus qui sedes'. 'Clare sanctorum', an old sequence of the 9th century for the Feasts of Apostles, may be referred to as showing how Lassus got over the difficulty of setting a list of names, by using the old melody of Notker Balbulus as a cantus firmus in one or other of the voices.

From 1563, if not somewhat earlier, Lassus became full Kapellmeister at Munich, Daser retiring on a handsome pension. The circumstances of Daser's retirement are somewhat obscure. He was not much older than Lassus and was a composer of talent. It has been thought that through prolonged ill-health he may have been no longer equal to the duties of his position, especially in view of the increase of the staff of musicians; but religion also may have had something to do with the matter. Daser would appear to have had Lutheran sympathies, and though in 1556 and before the final sessions of the Council of Trent Albert V, like Ferdinand of Austria, had been obliged to make concessions to Protestant feeling by allowing the communion of the cup to the laity in the mass, and by a relaxation of strict rules of fasting, from 1563 onwards these privileges were being gradually withdrawn, under the influence of the Jesuit mission in Bavaria, until in 1569 they were absolutely revoked, and the old form of religion was definitely re-established.

THE PENITENTIAL PSALMS.—To Lassus and his compositions special honour was now shown by Duke Albert. At his instance Lassus had undertaken the composition of the 'Seven Penitential Psalms', and the task was evidently very congenial to the composer's mind. The duke admired these works so highly that he had them beautifully transcribed on parchment and adorned with miniatures by his court painter, Hans Mülch, and then handsomely bound in two folio volumes in red morocco with silver clasps. The carrying out of the duke's wishes occupied several years, from 1563 to 1570. In the first volume, completed in 1565, is a portrait¹ of the composer without any indication of age, but with this inscription round the outside of the oval: "In corde prudentis requiescit sapientia et indoctos quosque erudiet. Prov. xiii." In the second volume, which was not completed till 1570, is another portrait, full length, with the inscription: "Imago excellentissimi musici Orlandi de Lassus suae aetatis 40 anno". With these volumes are associated two others, smaller, one containing Quickelberg's commendatory notice of Lassus's music and an explanation of the first set of miniatures; the other has a continuation of this explanation written by some one else after Quickelberg's death in 1567. Quickelberg describes the music as being of the style known as "musica reservata", which he explains as that which aims at the dramatic expression of the words. Ambros observes that if any music ever merited a splendid outward adornment as a symbol of its intrinsic value, it is that of these Psalms. Besides their masterly construction they have a quite peculiar colouring of spiritual nobility, and a magical fragrance of beauty hovers over them.

Van den Borren writes:

The celebrity of this work is justified by its exceptional merit. It is marvellous that, having to treat a subject relatively monotonous, Lassus has remained throughout equal to his task. Without any failure of inspiration he makes to pass before us all the states of soul which the Psalmist describes, ranging from the profoundest grief to the brightest hope. . . . All this he has depicted in a musical language ideally concise, in which the madrigalesque element intervenes largely, but with the utmost discretion and with a most exquisite sense of proportion.

These Psalms are written mainly for 5 voices, but always with several verses interspersed as duos, trios and quartets, and the last verse "Sicut erat" always more elaborately set in 6 parts. The duos and trios are specially masterly in construction. The 'De profundis' has in one or other of the voices the 6th psalm-tone as cantus firmus, which in two of the verses is treated in canon form. To the Psalms of Penitence² are appended the two Laudate Psalms CXLVIII and CL, treated as one psalm in four divisions.

VARIOUS PUBLICATIONS.—The only publication in 1563 was the third book of madrigals for 5 voices, not, however, issued by Lassus himself, but consisting of 13 older and newer pieces collected and edited by the publisher Antonio Barré in Rome. In 1564 appeared two books of chansons, one published by Jacob Susato at Antwerp containing 27 numbers a 4, short pieces mostly of a humorous or satirical character, the other published by Phalèse at Louvain, with similar pieces a 4 and 5, including three with Latin words. Some numbers a 4 are common to both publications.¹ It is interesting to notice in so many of Lassus's publications the strange mixture of sacred and secular work. So in Susato's publication we find 'Du fond de ma pensée', Marot's translation of Psalm 130, with the Huguenot psalm-tune in the tenor. In Phalèse there appears for the first time the medieval drinking-song, 'Fertur in conviviis', set a 4 in a striking fashion, which in the 'Magnum Opus' of 1604 has the words slightly altered to express quite opposite sentiments. It had been previously adapted in 1576 to new words, 'Tristis ut Eurydicen', as an elegy on the death of the older master Jacques Clément (Clemens non Papa). This transformation may have been suggested by the use which Lassus makes of the plainsong "Requiem" at the conclusion. Whether he had anything to do with these alterations of text must remain uncertain. In Phalèse we have again the curious mixture of the sacred with the outrageously secular. With 'Fertur in conviviis' there are two motets a 5, 'Pater peccavi', and 'Quid prodest stulto', the latter noticeable for its peculiar cantus firmus in the tenor with the words "Vanitas vanitatum, omnia est vanitas". To the great collection in 5 volumes entitled 'Thesaurus musicus', published at Nuremberg in 1564 by Montanus and Neuber and dedicated by them to Duke Albert of Bavaria, Lassus contributed a considerable number of new motets.

In 1565 Lassus published, with a dedication to Duke Albert, 'Sacrae lectiones novem ex propheta Job' for 4 voices, the lessons from the Vigil Office of the Dead. This is one of the master's more important works. A second book of 'Sacrae cantiones' a 5 and 6 was published at Venice in 1565, consisting of motets which had come into the hands of Guelio Bonagiunta of St. Mark's, Venice, an industrious collector of good compositions, who had received Lassus's permission to publish them. This was followed in 1566 by a third book published by Gardano, containing the motets of 1556 with some additions, and a fourth book containing new motets a 6 and 8; but these editions were afterwards superseded by more comprehensive collections which we shall have occasion to mention later on. To Bonagiunta's collection of madrigals by various composers, entitled 'Il Desiderio', Lassus contributed a sestina, which is interesting for some strange experiments in chromatic harmony with a view to greater expressiveness.

THE MUNICH CHAPEL.—In 1567 Lassus travelled to Venice to engage new singers and instrumentalists for the Bavarian court. Here, anticipating a little, it may be mentioned that among those engaged about this time whose names appear on the pay-rolls of the Munich court from 1568 onwards were some distinguished musicians who were also composers of merit, such as Antonio Morari, who became leader of the instrumentalists (capo della musica istrumentale); Gioseffo Guami and Ivo de Vento, who were appointed organists, Francesco Guami, Simone Gatti and Fileno Cornazzano, trumpet or trombone players; Anton Gosswin, a pupil of Lassus, who was one of the alto singers, and had charge of some of the choir-boys, and Massimo Troiano, an alto singer and comedian, who has left us some interesting accounts of the Munich court and its affairs. With them may be mentioned Johann von Lockenburg, a musician of older date in the ducal service, one of whose masses, 'Orsus à coup' a 4, has been mistakenly attributed to Lassus. At its maximum the musical staff of the Bavarian court, employed in church and chamber service, consisted of about 90 members—60 vocalists (including the boys) and 30 instrumentalists.²

Returning from this digression, we may follow Lassus on his journey from Venice to Ferrara to present in person his fourth book of madrigals for 5 voices, just recently printed at Venice, to Alfonso II, Duke of Ferrara. He had previously come into contact with Alfonso, on occasion of a visit paid by the duke to Munich to his relative Duke Albert. Alfonso had then expressed himself greatly pleased with a sestina of Lassus's sung in his presence, and had handsomely rewarded the composer. In his dedication Lassus tactfully recalls this incident and expresses the hope that his book of madrigals would be equally pleasing to the duke. But on this occasion he was coldly received and would have been dismissed without reward, had not the Florentine ambassador at Ferrara intervened on the composer's behalf to avoid diplomatic difficulties and save the duke's credit. The book itself, containing 12 numbers including two lengthy pieces, sestinas, deserved a better reception. It shows a great advance on the composer's previous work of the kind, a greater refinement of workmanship and expression, with a more restrained use of chromatic modulation. Another publication of 1567 is a book of Magnificats on the eight tones, printed at Nuremberg, with 24 numbers, 8 a 4, 8 a 5, 8 a 6, the alternate verses only being composed, the others being sung in unison to the proper tone in each case. A third publication of the year, printed at Munich, is even more important as testimony to the versatility of Lassus's genius, his first book of compositions to German words. Its full title is 'Neue teutsche Liedlein mit fünff

Stimmen welche ganz lieblich zu singen und auf allerley Instrumenten zu gebrauchen'. It was dedicated to Duke William, the eldest son of Duke Albert, and has 15 numbers, including three religious pieces, two being settings of Lutheran hymns, 'Vater unser' and 'Ich ruf zu dir, Herr Jesu Christ', with their proper tunes used as a free cantus firmus; the other, 'Wie lang, O Gott, in meiner Not', is throughout Lassus's own composition. The other numbers are German songs of a popular humorous character. With Duke William Lassus stood on a more confidential footing than with his father, on terms, indeed, of an intimate personal friendship, as is shown by a large number of letters which have been preserved. Through the intervention of Duke William he was enabled to obtain a grant from the ducal treasury of 1000 florins, for the purchase of a convenient house in the Gragenau, near the court. His salary in 1567 was raised to 280 florins. In 1568 took place the marriage of Duke William to Renata or Renée, daughter of Duke Francis of Lorraine. Massimo Troiano in his books entitled 'Discorsi' and 'Dialoghi', published 1568 and 1569, has left a detailed account of the musical and dramatic festivities on this occasion, in which Lassus took a prominent part, not only as director of the music, but to the great delight of the illustrious guests, as a comic actor in an improvised Italian commedia dell' arte. A 'Te Deum' a 6 and some masses were specially composed by him for the occasion; also two motets, 'Quid trepidas' a 6, and 'Gratia sola Dei' a 5-6. The 'Te Deum' is composed very elaborately, but only the even verses and the "Sanctus", the other odd verses being sung antiphonally in plainsong. Some verses are set as duets, trios, quartets, sung no doubt by select solo voices. The motet 'Gratia sola Dei' is a setting of hexameter lines, the first letters of which form the acrostic "Guilhelmus-Renca".

MOTETS AND CHANSONS.—In 1568 two comprehensive collections of motets by Lassus were published at Nuremberg, in which these works were included, one 'Selectissimae cantiones' a 6 to 10, comprising, with considerable additions, all that had previously appeared a 6 to 8 in the Venetian publications of 1565, 1566, making altogether 38 numbers a 6, 3 a 7, 4 a 8, 1 a 10; the other, similarly including what had appeared a 5 and 4, making 39 numbers a 5, and 11 a 4. These new collections would seem to have been intended to oust the Italian editions from the German market. Among the motets a 6 we may notice the effective epic-dramatic settings of the liturgical Gospels for Christmas and Epiphany: 'In principio erat verbum', 'Cum natus esset Jesus', 'Nuptiae factae sunt', also some splendid settings of church hymns, 'Jesu nostra redemptio', 'Vexilla regis', etc., without any reference to their plainsong tunes, but with beautiful duets and trios for solo voices interspersed. A beautiful Passion piece is 'Huc me sidereo', with a fine trio in the middle. Nor can we pass by those pieces in which Lassus gives us his solemn meditations on the mystery of death, such as 'O mors, quam amara' (Eccles. xli. 1-3).¹

In 1569 appeared another book of motets, 'Cantiones aliquot', 13 numbers a 5, 1 a 6, published at Munich and dedicated to the custos of Augsburg cathedral, in which the most interesting numbers are three Christmas pieces, 'Quem vidistis pastores', 'Resonet in laudibus' (which makes use of the old German tune to these words) and 'Sidus ex claro', also the concluding number of the book, 'Quemadmodum desiderat cervus', a 6, with its canon ad septimam. One madrigal a 7 appeared in a Venetian collection of this year. It is a sonnet by Petrarch, 'Che fai, alma', a dialogue of the poet with his own soul, which is also treated dialogue-wise in the music by the alternation of the three higher voices with the four lower, all uniting on the last line of the poem.

In Jan. 1570 Lassus published at Munich and dedicated as a new-year gift to the abbot of Weingarten in Württemberg another book of 'Cantiones sacrae', containing 10 numbers a 6 and 3 dialogues a 8. One of Lassus's pupils, Jacob Reiner, had come from the abbey school of Weingarten, and was afterwards choirmaster there. In this book there are three complete psalms in several divisions with verses a 3 and 4, and we may just note the greater liveliness of manner in the setting of the psalm 'Cum invocarem', which shows the extraordinary variety in the composer's style. Of greater importance for Lassus's growing reputation was the publication in Paris that year by Le Roy and Ballard of a book of 'Mellanges cont. plusieurs chansons tant en vers latin qu'en ryme françoys à 4, 5, 6, 8, 10 parties'. This publication was ushered into the world with a portrait of the composer, "Aet. suae 39", accompanied with a series of lengthy laudatory verses by Gohory and Jodelle, concluding with a sonnet by Jodelle to a female singer of the day, which shows that Lassus's works were often sung by a single voice, while instruments played the other vocal parts. The Latin pieces include Dido's lament in Virgil's 'Æneid'. Of the chansons, along with some of earlier date, 13 appear for the first time, among them the nonsense verses "un jour vis un foulon", which, as afterwards provided with English words beginning "Monsieur Mingo", J. F. R. Stainer has shown to be the song partly quoted as sung by Silence in Shakespeare's 'Henry IV', II, v. 3, and in the usual editions with the unintelligible word "Samingo", which he rightly suggests should be read "Sir Mingo".¹ In 1570 Phalèse of Louvain published a collective work comprising four books of chansons by Lassus, Cyprien de Rore and Philip de Monte, which, so far as the first is concerned, mostly includes work which had appeared elsewhere, but also a set of six new madrigals a 4 and one a 5, two of which, 'Vien' dolc' Imeneo' and 'Quando fia mia', were written to celebrate the marriage in 1565 of Alessandro Farnese, son of Margaret of Parma, with Maria of Portugal.

A further honour was done to Lassus at this time on 7 Dec. 1570, at the Diet of Spire. The Emperor Maximilian conferred on him and his posterity a patent of nobility with the grant of a coat of arms², on the shield of which, in recognition of his musical genius, the sharp, natural and flat signs were displayed with heraldic emblems. This honour might also be regarded as a return compliment for Lassus's greeting to Maximilian in an excellent motet, 'Pacis amans' a 6, on the occasion of his first coronation at Frankfort o/M. in 1562 as King of Bohemia and King of the Romans.

VISIT TO THE FRENCH COURT.—Encouraged by the success of his works in Paris, Lassus in 1571 was induced to pay a visit there, provided with recommendations to the French court from the Bavarian dukes, and with his travelling expenses paid from the Bavarian treasury. He was entertained in the house of Adrien Le Roy, his Parisian publisher, and was well received and rewarded by Charles IX, who had himself some knowledge and skill in music. He had not come empty-handed. In anticipation of his visit he had ready for presentation to the king a new book of chansons a 5, with a flattering dedication in verses of his own. The first two pieces in this book are on poems by Ronsard, the first originally addressed to Henry II of France, but by Lassus transferred to Charles IX; the other, a longer poem in praise of the queen-mother, Catherine de' Medici, set in a more brilliant and varied style, as if indeed it were more important to secure her favour than that of the weak Charles.

Lassus's visit was taken by Le Roy as a good opportunity for the publication and dedication to Charles IX of two books of motets, consisting of works which had already appeared elsewhere, but Lassus himself had also ready for publication by Le Roy a new book of motets a 5, which from Paris he dedicated to Duke William at Munich. Accompanying the dedication are some French verses of his own addressed to the duke and duchess, testifying his devotion, at the same time showing that in spite of the attractions of the French court he had then no idea of leaving the Bavarian service.

FURTHER PUBLICATIONS FROM MUNICH.—On his return to Munich Lassus soon had ready for publication in 1572, by Adam Berg, a second book of 'Teutsche Liedlein', 15 numbers a 5, which he dedicated to Duke Ferdinand, Count Palatine of the Rhine, the second son of Duke Albert. In this book there are 5 settings of Lutheran hymns with their proper tunes as cantus firmus in the tenor, among them 'Es sind doch selig alle die', with Matthäus Greiter's Strasbourg tune, better known afterwards as adapted to the later hymn, 'O Mensch bewein dein' Sünde gross'. Another piece, 'Der Meye', is the spiritual version of a popular song, also with its tune in the tenor. The other pieces are free settings of humorous and sentimental folk-songs, in this respect differing from the French chansons, the verses of which are usually by witty court poets like Marot, de Magny and others.

From 1572-79 we have a series of intimate confidential letters³ addressed by Lassus to Duke William in a curious medley of languages, French, Italian, bad Latin, with occasional German, showing his exuberant love of fun and merriment of all sorts, with an occasional tendency to melancholy, especially when temporarily in disfavour with Duke Albert. The year 1573 is distinguished by two important publications. One is a composite work dedicated to four members of the Fugger family of Augsburg, then greatly esteemed as munificent patrons of music, containing 28 numbers, 6 Latin motets, 6 Italian madrigals, 6 French chansons, 6 "teutsche Lieder", all a 4, but with a dialogue a 8 to each set of 6. The other publication of 1573 is the first volume of a series entitled 'Patrocinium musicus', undertaken on the responsibility of Duke William, for which Adam Berg, the music-printer of Munich, had provided specially large and entirely new type. A portrait of Duke William appears as a frontispiece to the first volume, and the music is not in separate partbooks as usual, but the separate parts are together on opposite pages. The first volume has 21 motets, 7 a 4, 7 a 5 and 7 a 6, works all remarkably interesting from the great variety both of technique and expression displayed in them. Here in passing we may just notice, as indeed we might have done before, the great range in the choice of texts for musical setting. Lassus did not confine himself, as most musicians of the time did, to the liturgical texts of the breviary and missal, but ranged freely over the books of Scripture to find texts which made some sort of personal appeal to him as the expression of his own sentiments. He thus often chose texts of a sententious moralizing nature which might seem quite intractable for musical setting, but which, by his great mastery as a sculptor of musical motives, he is able to endow with appropriately picturesque or otherwise solemnly expressive musical phrases. In the course of this year, 1573, he received a commission from the court of France to compose some music in connection with a mythological ballet and other festivities got up by Catherine de' Medici to celebrate the election of her younger son Henry as king of Poland. For this purpose he composed the introductory piece, consisting of a Latin dialogue sung between one character representing the kingdom of France and two others, allegorical figures of Peace and Prosperity. Brantôme speaks of the music as the most melodious that one had ever heard. Sandberger and van den Borren suppose this music to have been lost, but a comparison of the text as given by the former¹, with the text of the Latin dialogue a 8 in the publication of 1573 dedicated to the brothers Fugger shows that the music has not been lost, but is preserved in the latter piece, only that the text originally intended for the glorification of the French court has been ingeniously transformed into a glorification of Duke Albert and the Bavarian house.

A letter of Adrien Le Roy informs us that Charles IX was so delighted with various pieces by Lassus performed before him that he offered to engage him as chamber musician with an annual salary of 120 livres, beginning 1 Jan. 1574, even paying at once half of this sum for the previous half year. This proposal may have been a very tempting one to Lassus, and one account says that he had already set out with his family on the journey to Paris, and had come as far as Frankfort, when he was met with tidings of the French king's death on 20 May 1574, and at once returned to Munich. This account, however, is difficult to reconcile with what we learn from his letters: that he had gone to Italy in Feb. 1574 to engage new musicians for Munich and was back again at Munich some time in May. Sandberger concludes that already in Jan. or Feb. Lassus had definitely decided to remain at Munich. His good relations with Le Roy and the French court continued unimpaired. Henry III allowed him a pension and a special privilege for the publication of his works.

THE 'PATROCINIUM MUSICES'.—In 1574 appeared the second and third volumes of the 'Patrocinium musices'. The second contains five of his masses a 5, bearing the titles 'Ite rime dolenti', 'Scarco di doglia', 'Sidus ex claro', 'Credidi propter' and 'Le Berger et la bergère'. This volume was dedicated to Pope Gregory XIII, and Lassus travelled to Rome to present it in person, the expenses of his journey and stay being met by Duke Albert. He was well received in Rome and solemnly invested as Knight of the Golden Spur in the Papal Chapel. These are not the first published masses by Lassus: already in 1566 Gardano of Venice had published in a collection one, 'In te Domine speravi' a 6, and Phalèse of Louvain in 1570 had similarly published 3 a 5. The third volume of the 'Patrocinium', dedicated to the Bishop of Augsburg, contains settings of the "Vidi aquam" and "Asperges" with the offices for Christmas, Easter, Pentecost and Corpus Christi. By the "offices" are meant the introits and other variable parts of the mass, based on the plainsong. These are not reckoned among his best compositions, the plainsong in this case being somewhat of a drag on the composer's inspiration. The fourth volume of the 'Patrocinium' appeared in 1575 and contains an interesting setting of the Passion according to St. Matthew, the 9 lessons from the Book of Job a 4, which had already appeared in 1565, and the 3 lessons of Christmas matins a 4. In the Passion the parts of an Evangelist and of Christ are understood to be recited in plainsong while the other utterances are set a 3 to 5. There are 3 other settings of the Passion from the other Gospels, a 5 and 4.² In 1575 Cosimo Bottegari, a Florentine lutenist, very much in favour with Duke Albert, published a second book of madrigals a 5, in continuation of Troiano's book of 1569, with contributions by the various Bavarian musicians, including two by Lassus, one a 10 or for two choirs each a 5 being a very delightful spring song. Bottegari, however, shortly afterwards used his great influence with Duke Albert to injure Lassus in the duke's opinion, and it was with some difficulty that a reconciliation was brought about through the mediation of Duke William.

The year 1576 was an important one for publication. There was first the fifth volume of the 'Patrocinium', containing five Magnificats — 2 a 4, 1 a 5 and 2 a 8. In that a 5 Lassus departs from the usual way of setting according to the church tone and takes his themes from a madrigal of Cyprien de Rore. In the 2 a 8 all the verses are set by means of answering chorus a 4. A third book of 'Teutsche Lieder', 11 nos. a 5, was dedicated to Duke Ernst, third son of Duke Albert. It opens with a fine setting of 'Susannen frumm', the German version of 'Susanne un jour', with what seems to be its proper popular tune in the tenor. Some numbers are moralizing pieces, others drastically humorous. Under the title of 'Meslanges d'Orlande de Lassus' Le Roy republished nearly all his previous chansons, with the exception of the book dedicated to Charles IX in 1571. It contains 93 chansons, with 26 Latin secular pieces and 6 Italian madrigals, only a very few of which were really new. About the same time two other editions of the chansons appeared with the texts altered in a religious sense, to make several of them less offensive to Christian ears and also to satisfy the growing taste for psalm-singing in the Huguenot circles of France. One was published at La Rochelle, the headquarters of French Protestantism, another, more complete and more thoroughgoing in its alterations, was entitled 'Thrésor de musique', etc., and appears to have been published at Lyons. 1577 brings a small work of interest, a set of 24 cantiones a 2, twelve being vocal duets, and the other twelve for instruments, or it may be also for vocal practice. In later editions these latter are described as 'Fantasiae' or 'Ricercari'. The first twelve show Lassus's wonderful skill in the picturesque setting of meditative texts. This work was dedicated to Duke William alone, but was followed by a book of motets a 3, introduced with an exquisite musical dedication to all three brothers, Dukes William, Ferdinand and Ernst. There are 18 numbers, mostly on verses of the Psalms, and written in the older imitative style with many beautiful melismatic passages. To these there are appended in the 'Magnum Opus' six other numbers, including two very expressive settings of 'Adoramus te Christe'. That year, too, Le Roy brought out at Paris a splendid edition of 18 masses by Lassus, including with several additions all those previously published. Of these the finest is one entitled 'Puisque j'ay perdu' a 4, written in a very noble style.

Generally speaking, his masses, with some exceptions, are not on the same high level as his motets. Some are very short and, especially in the "Gloria" and "Credo", written in a rapid homophonic syllabic style which leaves no room for much expression. No new publications of Lassus appeared in 1578. In 1579 Leonhard Lechner, who had been a choir-boy under Lassus in the Bavarian chapel, brought out at Nuremberg new enlarged editions of the two sets of 'Selectissimae Cantiones' of 1568, in a few cases altering the original words.

WORKS IN MANY STYLES. — On 24 Oct. 1579 Duke Albert died. He had done a last act of kindness to Lassus the previous Apr. by guaranteeing his yearly salary of 400 florins for life. From 1575 Lassus had been receiving this amount as salary, with 150 florins extra described in the Munich accounts as "Gnaden-geld". This addition to his regular salary was also continued by Duke William. Early in 1580 he was offered, but declined, the post of Kapellmeister to the court of Dresden, then vacant by the death of Antonio Scandelli. But with the death of Duke Albert the more splendid days of the Bavarian chapel came to an end. The court finances were in an embarrassed condition, and Duke William was obliged to reduce the number of his musicians from 44 to 17, although in the course of the years following it was gradually raised again to a maximum of 38 in 1591. These circumstances may have induced Lassus to entertain some scruples of conscience about receiving the interest of his capital invested in the state funds; but the duke magnanimously reimbursed to him as a personal gift what he offered to renounce. Early in 1581 there appeared at Nuremberg a book of five masses a 4-5 which, however, was not published by himself, but by Lechner, and consists of early works.

With the accession of Duke William a more serious religious spirit had begun to pervade the court of Munich. Through the influence of his Jesuit advisers Duke William became more attentive to religious duties, earning for himself afterwards the surname of William the Pious. Lassus followed suit with his master, and also entered into relations with the Jesuit seminary at Munich. Yet he had shown himself somewhat recalcitrant to the enforced introduction of the Roman rite into the Bavarian chapel in place of the old Germanic usages, as a good deal of laxity had previously been tolerated in Munich; but conformity with Rome had become the watchword of the counter-Reformation movement under the auspices of the Jesuit order. In 1582 Lassus published three important books of church music. One dedicated to the Bishop of Würzburg contains a new setting of the nine lessons from the Book of Job, along with 11 new motets a 4. The new set of lessons is composed quite differently from the earlier set of 1565. The text is simply declaimed syllable by syllable in homophonic harmony, the melody being chiefly in the upper part, but with abrupt chromatic changes.

The next important publication of this year is 'Sacrae cantiones 5 voc.' dedicated to the senators of Nuremberg, 21 numbers, almost all of the highest value. Among them are the two which gained first prize at the Puy de Musique of Evreux in 1575 and 1583, 'Domine qui cognoscis', a deeply penitential piece, and 'Cantantibus organis' for St. Cecilia's Day, also 'Justorum animae', which has always been greatly admired, and which it is interesting to compare with Byrd's setting of the same words, and 'Christus resurgens', a very brilliant Easter motet.

The third publication of 1582 is 'Motetta sex vocum', dedicated to Jacob Fugger, Baron of Kirchberg, and described as only recently composed, "singulari authoris industria". There are 20 numbers, among them fine settings of the Marian antiphons and the 'Ave, verum corpus', and other distinguished pieces are 'O altitudo divitiarum' and 'Benedictio et claritas'. It may be said generally that in the decade 1580 to 1590 Lassus's genius had reached its full maturity in his masterly freedom and boldness of technique combined with a rare subtlety and depth of expression. All these works are described as equally available for instruments and for voices.

In 1583 appeared a new book of 'Teutsche Lieder' a 4, dedicated, strangely enough, to Maximilian, the ten-year-old son of Duke William. There are 11 numbers, but as some of them are lengthy pieces broken up into several divisions, they are often reckoned as making up 33 separate pieces. They are written in simple four-part counterpoint, but are beautiful and expressive in the master's most refined style. There was also a reprint about the same time of the three earlier sets of 'Teutsche Lieder' a 5 in one complete edition. Mention may here be made of a collection entitled 'Harmoniae miscellae' a 5 and 6, edited by Leonhard Lechner and published at Nuremberg in 1583, containing three-excellent motets never published by Lassus himself.

LAST DECADE OF COMPOSITION.—The year 1584 is distinguished by the first appearance in print of the 'Seven Penitential Psalms', originally composed for Duke Albert, but now in their printed form dedicated to the Count Palatine Philip, Bishop of Ratisbon. The only other publication of 1584 is the 'Continuation de mellange' (Paris, Le Roy and Ballard). This contains 19 chansons a 3 to 6, along with four new Italian madrigals a 5 to 10, the last of which, 'Passan vostri trionfi' a 10 on a text from Petrarch, is specially noticeable as a magnificent example of contrapuntal art, written partly in alternating choirs, but with powerful outbursts of ten-part harmony.

On the feast of Corpus Christi in 1584 preparations were made for the customary procession with the Sacrament through the streets of Munich, but a severe thunderstorm with heavy downpour of rain intervened, and it seemed that the procession would have to be confined to the interior of St. Peter's church. But no sooner had the Sacrament been borne to the porch of the church, and the choir under Lassus's direction had begun to sing his motet, 'Gustate et videte', than there was a sudden lull in the storm. The rain ceased, the sun shone out brilliantly and the procession was able to continue as usual. This was regarded as a special instance of divine favour accorded on account of Lassus's music, and on future occasions of outdoor church procession this motet continued to be sung as if it were a sure talisman for the securing of fair weather.

The year 1585 was a great one for new and important publications by Lassus. The increasingly religious and moralizing bent of his mind is manifested in his fifth book of madrigals for 5 voices, which though not so named, are in reality madrigali spirituali. Of the 12 numbers 7 are on texts from the 'Rime spirituali' by Gabriele Fiamma, Bishop of Chioggia, the others are from verses by Petrarch which specially dwell on the transitoriness of earthly things and the need of penitence for the errors of youth. The music is on a higher level than in any of the preceding books. The intense seriousness of the poetry is even more powerfully reflected in the music. All chromaticism foreign to the diatonic system is carefully avoided, except for very occasional use on words to which, as van den Borren observes, some idea of blame attaches. He seems to pass censure on his own excessive indulgence in chromaticism in his earlier days as a musical fault. This book of madrigals was dedicated to Count Mario Bevilacqua of Verona, a distinguished musical amateur of the time and a munificent patron of musicians. He maintained in his palace a regular concert called a ridotto, and the best musicians of the day, such as Luca Marenzio, Philip de Monte, Orazio Vecchi and others dedicated their compositions to him. Lassus was about to make a journey to Italy at this time, and it is probable that he passed by Verona to present his book personally to Bevilacqua. Of this journey we shall speak presently, but first have to mention the other publications of the year. On 1 Mar. 1585 he dedicates to the abbot of Benedictbeuern a book of lamentations with 11 new motets a 5. Of the lamentations it is sufficient to say that for expressiveness they are worthy to rank with the lessons from the Book of Job and the 'Penitential Psalms'. A book of motets, 17 nos. a 6 and 8, is dedicated to Count Eytel Fritz of Hohenzollern, at whose court at Hechingen his son Ferdinand was now engaged as Kapellmeister. Another book of motets, 31 numbers a 4, with a 'Stabat Mater' a 8, was dedicated to Alexander Fugger, Provost of Freysing Cathedral. This book has a character of its own, as not being so miscellaneous in its contents as many of the others.

In the autumn of this year 1585 Lassus set out on his journey to Italy, its first object being to make a pilgrimage to the Holy House of Loreto. He afterwards proceeded to Ferrara, where he was better received by Alfonso d'Este than on the occasion of his first visit eighteen years before. Before we leave this busy year we cannot pass over without mention two fine settings of some lines by Tasso, 'Ardo si, ma non t' amo', contributed to a collection entitled 'Sdgenosi ardori', which consists of nothing else but settings of the same lines by about 30 other composers, many of them in the Bavarian service, but also including Philip de Monte, Costanzo Porta and others. The lines are meant to express the disdain of a disappointed and deceived lover, and Lassus set them in a very dramatic fashion.

The numerous publications from 1580 we have had occasion to mention bear testimony to the composer's wonderful industry during this period. 1586 brings the first warning of declining strength. It is a blank so far as publications are concerned, and the opening of 1587 brings with it the gift from Duke William of a country house at Geising on the Ammer, probably as a place of occasional retirement. Then he came back to work and in gratitude, no doubt, for better health, on 15 Apr. dedicated a new book of Italian madrigals to the court physician, Dr. Thomas Mermann, a man of great culture and a lover of music, who became one of his best friends. This book has 23 numbers, 7 a 4, 7 a 5 and 9 a 6, and is regarded as the crown of Lassus's achievements in madrigal writing. The pieces are almost entirely of a religious character, nine taken from the 'Rime spirituali' of Gabriele Fiamma, one an Italian verse translation of Psalm vi, others from various sources known and unknown. The mood of love complaint characteristic of the ordinary madrigal is here spiritualized into that of penitential lament and heavenly aspiration, and the music gains thereby in artistic elevation and expressive power. In Aug. a new volume of the 'Patrocinium musices' appeared, containing 13 magnificats a 4 to 6. Here Lassus manifests an opposite tendency to that of his later madrigal writing. Into the madrigal he had infused greater seriousness and solemnity, but in the Magnificat he shows his desire to impart to his spiritual work something of the lightness and grace of his earlier secular work. He borrows the themes on which these magnificats are composed largely from secular songs, his own or those of other composers, in a few cases from motets.

In consequence of his failing health Lassus's mind began to be much occupied with concern for the future of his wife and family, and on 6 Nov. 1587 he obtained the assurance of an annuity of 100 florins for his wife in case she should survive him. A month later Duke William granted him at his own request a dispensation from further service in the chapel, but with a reduction of 200 florins from his salary, and on the other hand offered his son Ferdinand a salary of 200 florins to take part of his father's duties, and also appointed his second son Rudolf as organist with a salary of 200 florins, and the further obligation of giving musical instruction to the younger members of the choir. The master does not seem to have been satisfied with this arrangement, for he remained at his post with his full salary, but probably with some alleviation of his duties and help from his son Rudolf. Ferdinand does not appear to have left the service of Count Eytel Fritz of Hohenzollern or to have entered again the Bavarian service until 1589 or 1590.

In 1588 Lassus brought out, in conjunction with his son Rudolf, a book of 'Teutsche geistliche Psalmen' a 3. It contains 50 numbers, the texts and melodies taken from Caspar Ulenberg's metrical version of the Psalter of 1582, the best that had been produced on the Catholic side. Roland composed the 25 psalms with the odd numbers up to the fiftieth, Rudolf the alternate 25 with the even numbers. The book was dedicated to the abbot Gallus of Ottobeuern, and seems to show that in German Catholic circles and even in monastic houses some interest was taken in German psalm-singing. Roland's settings are very beautiful and interesting: he treats Ulenberg's tunes with great freedom, not with a cantus firmus in any one part. We have no means of judging the merit of Rudolf's settings, as only Roland's are reproduced in modern editions.

In 1589 a new volume of the 'Patrocinium musices' appeared, the last to which Lassus contributed, containing 6 masses a 5, with the titles 'Dites maîtresse', 'Amar donne', 'Qual donna attende', 'In die tribulationis', 'Io son ferito', 'Pro defunctis'. Their composition, however, is of older date, for they are found in manuscripts of 1578-80. 'Io son ferito' takes its themes from a then well-known madrigal by Palestrina. 'Qual donna attende' and 'In die tribulationis' would seem to take their themes from a madrigal and motet by Cyprien de Rore. We know that Rore's works were highly esteemed at Munich and that Lassus was personally acquainted with him in earlier days and influenced by him in certain directions.¹ The 'Pro defunctis' is composed with the plainsong intonations sung in unison at the beginning of each movement and with the cantus firmus mostly in the tenor, but sometimes also in the bass, and used with considerable freedom.

In 1590 Lassus dedicated to the Bishop of Bamberg his 'Neue teutsche und etliche frantzösische Gesäng' a 6. The dedication is dated on the feast of St. Henry, 15 July, this date being appropriately chosen as recalling both to the composer himself and to the Bishop the fact that it was Henry II, Duke of Bavaria and Holy Roman Emperor, who at the beginning of the 11th century founded and endowed the bishopric of Bamberg. The book contains 12 numbers, 9 German and 3 French. The French pieces, however, are merely corrected editions of some which had appeared in 1584. With one exception the German pieces are all of a religious character, showing the increasing preoccupation of Lassus's mind with religious subjects. To these he adds one amusing secular piece from Hans Sachs, 'Der Körbelmacher', describing a dispute between a basket-maker and his wife.

On 6 Nov. of this year Lassus's third son, Ernst, was admitted as a singer of the chapel with a salary of 60 florins. Meantime the master's mental faculties became more and more disturbed; it seems as if the fresh effort to work had completely prostrated him. His wife Regina, on one occasion returning from Geising, found him gloomy and morose, failing to recognize her and unwilling to speak to any one. At her request Princess Maximiliana at once sent Dr. Mermann, and there was a temporary recovery, but the mind was still at fault. A spirit of melancholy settled on him. "Cheerful and happy no longer", says Regina, "he has become gloomy and speaks only of death." In an access of melancholy he wrote to the duke complaining that he had never carried out his father Albert's intentions towards him, and it needed all that Regina and Maximiliana could do to soften the effect of this act. In 1592 his material position was improved by the duke's increasing his salary to 800 florins. Ferdinand and Rudolf were also benefited by increase of salary. In 1593, under the sympathetic care of Mermann, there came about a great improvement in his state of health, so that he was able to return to work and fulfil his duties as choir-master on the festival of Corpus Christi. He also resumed the labours of composition, and on Michaelmas Day (29 Sept.) dedicated to Johann Otto, Bishop of Augsburg, his book of 'Cantiones sacrae' a 6. In the very interesting and touching dedication he alludes to this work as being probably his swan-song ("cygneum forte melos"), and expresses the hope that as the light of the setting sun is more pleasing to the eye, so these graver songs of his closing days may perhaps delight the mind and ear better than the gayer and more festive songs of his youth. The book contains 30 numbers a 6 and 2 a 12, which show no diminution of the composer's technical skill or power of expression. We may notice that 'Prolongati sunt dies mei' is a pathetic nunc dimittis, which the composer, with a presentiment of his approaching end, addresses to Duke William.

In 1593 Lassus was able to accompany Duke William to the Diet of Ratisbon, where he came into contact with Philip de Monte and other musicians of note. The earlier part of 1594 must have been occupied with the preparation for publication of his last work, 'Lagrimae di San Pietro', which on 24 May he dedicated to Pope Clement VIII. This work consists of 20 spiritual madrigals on verses by the Italian religious poet Tansillo and one Latin motet a 7, 'Vide quae pro te patior'.

Before his last work appeared in print, Lassus died on 14 June 1594. By his last will, besides bequeathing alms to the poor and to a Munich hospital, he provided that two low masses and a sung Requiem should be celebrated for him annually on St. John Baptist's Day in the church of Geising. He was buried in the cemetery of the Franciscans at Munich. When the Franciscan property was secularized the monument which had been erected over his grave was removed; it remained for some time in private possession, but was later set up in the gardens of the National Museum at Munich. It is of reddish marble, 3½ ft. high and 7 ft. wide, with a carving of the burial of Christ in the upper part, and below this his arms, on one side of which are ten kneeling male figures, Lassus himself, his sons and grandsons, and on the other side eight kneeling female figures, Regina with her daughters and granddaughters. The epitaph consists of twelve lines of elegiac verse, of which we may quote the first two and last two lines:

Orlando cineres cheu! modo dulce loquentes
Nunc mutos cheu! flebilis urna premit

Nunc quia complevit totum concentibus orbem,
Victor cum superis certat apud superos.

Regina survived her husband to 5 June 1600. Of the marriage there were four sons, Ferdinand, Rudolf, Johann and Ernst, and two daughters, Anna and Regina, the latter married to the court artist Hans von Ach, who probably painted the oil portrait of Lassus, dating from 1580, which went to the Jesuit seminary at Munich.¹ Of the sons, Johann appears to have died early; we hear no more of Ernst after 1594. Ferdinand had returned to the Bavarian chapel in 1590, and succeeded Fossa as Kapellmeister in 1602, dying in 1609. Rudolf also remained in the Bavarian service as composer and organist till his death in 1625. Both, besides being composers themselves, were active in the further publication of their father's works.²

DESCENDANTS.—It would seem from the Munich accounts that Ferdinand and Rudolf continued to use only the adopted name of de Lasso, in place of the original de Lassus. From the list of his works in 'Q.-L.' Rudolf would appear to have been a fairly prolific composer, and in later years to have also adopted the new style of composition with basso ad organum. Two of his motets are given by Proske in 'Musica divina', II, one showing something of an inclination to the new monodic style of Italy. A son of Ferdinand, also called Ferdinand, was sent by Duke Maximilian to study music at Rome under Crivelli, and afterwards became Kapellmeister at Munich; but later on, at the instance of the duke himself, he gave up his musical calling to accept some office in the civil service. Descendants of Lassus would appear to have been still living in 1895.

The collected modern edition of Lassus's works published by Breitkopf & Härtel of Leipzig, edited by Hubert and Sandberger, was still in progress when war broke out in 1939. J. R. M., abr. & rev.

CATALOGUE OF WORKS

List of works by Lassus in the 'Sämtliche Werke', edited by Haberl and Sandberger (Leipzig, 1894-1919). Each work is registered by a number, title, date of publication or other date, and its location by volume and page in the S.W. The numbering has no connection with that used in the S.W. or elsewhere. A title without a number indicates that it is a part or section of a numbered work. The original spelling is used in the titles except in the case of 'u' and 'j' for 'v' and 'i', where necessary.

LATES, John (James) (b. ?; d. at or nr. Oxford, 1777).

English violinist and composer. He studied under the best Italian masters of that day and became leader of the concerts at Oxford. His patron, the Duke of Marlborough, gave him a professional post at Blenheim. His published works include violin solos, duets and trios.

His son, Charles Lates (d. c. 1810), studied church music under Philip Hayes of Oxford, in which city both father and son lived, and had some degree of fame as a performer on the organ and the pianoforte. He published some sonatas for the pianoforte and other works.

F. K.

LATHAM, Peter (Morton Sturges) (b. London, 17 Nov. 1894).

English musical scholar and lecturer. He was educated at Rugby School in 1908–13 and took a classical scholarship there. In 1913 he went to Balliol College, Oxford, where his studies were interrupted by war service in 1914 (lieutenant in the Hants Regiment in India and Palestine), but resumed in 1919. He left Oxford with the M.A. degree and later (1934) took the B.Mus. there. In 1919–20 he was at the R.A.M. in London, where he gained the Charles Lucas Prize for orchestral composition.

In 1921 Latham became a University Extension Lecturer for Oxford and Cambridge, also a few years later for London University. He was appointed professor of harmony and counterpoint at the R.A.M. in 1938 and lecturer in musical history and appreciation at the G.S.M. in 1948. In 1946 he became Gresham Professor of Music in succession to Walford Davies. During the second world war he rendered home service as a lieutenant in the R.A. in 1941–43, part of it under the Committee of Official Histories.

Apart from essays and reviews contributed to various journals, notably 'The Gramophone' (1920s–30s), Latham wrote a book on Brahms, published in the 'Master Musicians' series in 1948. E. B.

LATILLA, Gaetano (b. Bari, 12 Jan. 1711; d. Naples, 1791).

Italian composer. He was a choir-boy in the cathedral at Bari and was later educated at the Conservatorio di Sant' Onofrio at Naples. In 1732 his first opera, 'Li mariti a forza', had a great success at the Fiorentini theatre, Naples, and he had about eight other operas to his credit when in 1738 he was appointed second maestro di cappella, under the elderly Pompeo Cannicciari (1670–1744) at Santa Maria Maggiore, Rome. Illness compelled him to resign this post in 1741, and he returned to Naples, continuing to write for the stage all the time. In 1756 he went north once more, to become chorus master at the Conservatorio della Pietà, Venice, and on 16 Mar. 1762 he was appointed second maestro at St. Mark's in succession to Galuppi, who had been promoted to first maestro. Burney met him at Venice in 1770 and found him a "plain and sensible man", with a great knowledge of music of the ancient, and understanding of what were then the modern, trends.

Dissatisfied with his salary, Latilla returned in 1772 to Naples, where he wrote a few more operas ('I sposi incogniti', 1779, being the last) and devoted the rest of his life chiefly to teaching, charging, it is said, the very moderate fee of one carlino per lesson to Neapolitans, two carlini to foreigners and three to Englishmen. Latilla's sister Silvia was the mother of Niccolò Piccinni.

The number of works Latilla wrote for the stage is very large, amounting to about fifty operas, serious and comic, intermezzi, scenic cantatas, etc. He was a favourite with travelling buffo companies in the middle of the 18th century, and on their wanderings his works underwent so many changes that it is very difficult now to establish a correct chronology. Several of his works were given by the bouffons at the Paris Opéra in 1752 and 1753 (when his name was consistently misspelt "Atilla"). The three comic operas which under Latilla's name and in various disguises made the round of the whole of Europe were, according to older authorities, all first produced at the Teatro Valle, Rome, in 1738; recent research has shown this statement (adopted by the present writer in 'Annals of Opera', 1943) to be incorrect. Thus, 'Orazio' was probably never set in its entirety by Latilla at all¹; 'Madama Ciana' (given at the King's Theatre, London, in 1750 and at the Paris Opéra, as 'Gli artigiani arricchiti', in 1753), had been given first at the Teatro della Pallacorda, Rome, in Feb. 1738²; 'La finta giardiniera', the last of the three, was originally called 'Gismondo'³ and had been given first at Naples in 1737; it reached London in 1749 disguised as 'Don Colascione'.

Of Latilla's serious operas, which on the whole were much less successful than his comic ones, a few are preserved at Naples and Vienna; 'Angelica ed Orlando', the score of which is in B.M., belongs to the comic species, in spite of his Ariostesque title; it was first performed at Naples in 1735 and is one of the composer's earliest works. Besides his operas Latilla wrote an oratorio, 'L'onnipotenza e la misericordia divina', church music, symphonies, etc., also 6 string quartets, which were published in London.

One Giuseppe Latilla, three comic operas by whom made their appearance at the Fiorentini theatre at Naples in 1808-11, was perhaps Gaetano's son. A. L.

LA TOMBELLE, Antoine (Louis Joseph Gueyrand Fernand Fouant) de (b. Paris, 3 Aug. 1854; d. Château de Fayrac, Dordogne, 13 Aug. 1928).

French organist and composer. He began his musical studies with his mother, herself a pupil of Liszt and Thalberg, later entered the Paris Conservatoire, where he gained the Lauréat d'Harmonie in 1880, and finally studied with Saint-Saëns. In 1878, on the founding of the organ concerts at the Trocadéro, he became an active associate of Guilmant and soon made a name for himself as an organist, both there and on tour. From 1896 to 1904 he was professor of harmony at the Schola Cantorum. His secular compositions brought him the prize of the Institut de France (Prix Chartier) and the Prix Pleyel. He edited for the use of choral societies a collection of songs entitled 'La Légende de la glèbe' and published many songs, an operetta, 'Un Rêve au pays du bleu' (1892), a Sonata for violin and pianoforte, a Trio, Op. 35 (1894), a Quartet in E major and a Suite for orchestra ('Impressions matinales'), etc.

The greater part of his time, however, was devoted to furthering the reforms introduced by Bordes, d'Indy and Guilmant, and realizing the aims of the revised programme of the Schola Cantorum—that is to say, the improvement and enlarging of the organist's repertory and the foundation of a modern school of church music. With these ends in view he wrote a number of organ works dedicated to César Franck, and among his other sacred compositions the following may be mentioned: a charming motet entitled 'O gloriosa virginum', an 'Ave, verum corpus', an 'Adoro te', a 'Benedicta es tu', a Mass in honour of St. John the Baptist, 'Les Sept Paroles de notre Seigneur en croix', an oratorio 'Crux', numerous canticles, settings of Gregorian chants, pieces for the harmonium, etc. He wrote also a Method for the harmonium and a critical study entitled 'L'Oratorio et la cantate'. LATOSZEWSKI, Zygmunt (b. Poznań, 1902).

Polish conductor. He studied at the Poznań Conservatory, which he left in 1933. He also pursued an academic course at Poznań University, where he obtained the doctor's degree in music. During the years preceding the outbreak of the second world war he acted as director of the Poznań Opera. In 1945 he resumed his duties there, but he remained only until 1948, when he began his career as teacher of conducting at the State Music School of Poznań. He is now (1953) conductor of the State Philharmonia at Gdańsk (Danzig) and director of operatic studies there. C. R. H.

LATROBE, Christian (Ignatius) (b. Fulneck, Leeds, 12 Feb. 1757; d. Fairfield nr. Manchester, 6 May 1836).

English musical editor and amateur composer. He was the eldest son of the Rev. Benjamin Latrobe, superintendent of the congregations of the United (Moravian) Brethren in England. In 1771 he went to the college of the United Brethren at Niesky, Upper Lusatia, returned to England in 1784, took orders in the same church, became in 1787 secretary to the Society for the Furtherance of the Gospel and in 1795 was appointed secretary to the Unity of the Brethren in England.

Although Latrobe never followed music as a profession he cultivated it assiduously from an early age. His earlier compositions were chiefly instrumental; three of his sonatas, having met with the approval of Haydn¹, were published and dedicated to him. His other published compositions include Lord Roscommon's translation of the 'Dies irae' (1799), 'The Dawn of Glory' (1803), anthem for the Jubilee of George III (1809), anthems, by various composers (1811), original anthems (1823), 'Te Deum, performed in York Cathedral', 'Miserere, Ps. LI' and 'Six Aires on Serious Subjects, words by Cowper and Hannah More'. He edited the first English edition of the Moravian hymn-tunes. But his most important publication was his 'Selection of Sacred Music from the Works of the most Eminent Composers of Germany and Italy', 6 vols. (1806-25)², through the medium of which many fine compositions, including much of Graun, Hasse, Haydn and Mozart, were first introduced to the notice of the British public.

LATROBE, John (Antes) (b. London, 1799; d. Gloucester, 19 Nov. 1878).

English writer on music and amateur composer, son of the preceding. He was educated at St. Edmund Hall, Oxford, was B.D. in 1826 and M.A. in 1829, took holy orders in the Church of England and was incumbent of St. Thomas's, Kendal, from 1840 to 1865 and honorary canon of Carlisle Cathedral from 1858. He was the author of 'The Music of the Church considered in its Various Branches, Congregational and Choral' (London, 1831) and 'Instructions of Chenaniah', a book of directions for accompanying chants and psalm tunes (1832).

LATTUADA, Felice (b. Caselle di Morimondo, Milan, 5 Feb. 1882).

Italian composer. He studied under V. Ferroni at the Milan Conservatory, where he obtained a diploma in 1911. He has written choral, orchestral and chamber music, among which the following works may be mentioned as outstanding: 'Canto augurale per la Nazione Eletta' for tenor, chorus and orchestra, 'La consecrazione del bardo', 'Cimitero di guerra', 'Il mistero della Passione di Cristo', 'Incanti della notte', 'Divertimento rustico' and Prelude and Fugue in B \flat major for orchestra, etc. He is also the composer of several scores for important Italian films.

Lattuada's chief contribution to music, however, are his operas, in which he shows considerable dramatic gifts. They are the following:

'La tempesta' (libretto by Arturo Rossato, based on Shakespeare's play), produced Milan, Teatro dal Verme, 23 Nov. 1922.

'Sandha' (lib. by Ferdinando Fontana), prod. Genoa, 21 Feb. 1924.

'Le preziose ridicole' (lib. by Rossato, based on Molière's comedy), prod. Milan, Teatro alla Scala, 9 Feb. 1929.

'Don Giovanni' (lib. by Rossato, based on José Zorrilla's drama), prod. Naples, Teatro San Carlo, 18 May 1929.

'La caverna di Salamanca' (lib. by Valentino Piccoli, after Cervantes), prod. Genoa, 1 Mar. 1938.

LAUB, Ferdinand (b. Prague, 19 Jan. 1832; d. Gries nr. Bozen, Tyrol, 18 Mar. 1875).

Austrian violinist. His father was a musician in Prague. At the age of six he mastered variations by Bériot and at nine performed regularly in public. He was a pupil of Mildner at the Prague Conservatory, and when eleven years old he attracted the notice of Berlioz and Ernst, and shortly after was taken up by the Grand Duke Stephen, who sent him to Vienna in 1847. After this he visited Paris and, in 1851, London, where he played at the Musical Union. In 1853 he succeeded Joachim at Weimar. Two years later we find him in Berlin as Kammervirtuos and leader of the court orchestra, teacher in the Stern Conservatory and leader of quartet concerts of his own. At length, after considerable wandering, he settled in Moscow in 1866 as head professor of the violin in the Conservatory and first violin of the Musical Society, with great liberty of action.

Laub was one of the greatest violin virtuosos of his time. He had a fine and very powerful tone and a brilliant technique, and played with much feeling and passion. His repertory was very large, comprising all the important classical works and a great many modern compositions. He had also much success as a quartet player, but his style, especially in latter years, was not unjustly reproached with mannerism and a tendency to exaggeration.

Swiss composer. Having studied under Hegar, Gustav Weber, Blumer and Freund at the Music School of Zürich and with Rheinberger at Munich, he became music teacher and choral conductor at Neuchâtel as well as organist at Le Locle. In 1892 he went to Paris to finish his musical training under Massenet and Diémer. Back in Switzerland, he became at first a teacher at the Zürich Conservatory, then conductor at the Geneva theatre (1905-7) and finally teacher at the Conservatory there, where he has given composition and pianoforte lessons ever since 1907.

Lauber's creative output is enormously large: his catalogue contains over 200 works ranging through every category from opera to a double-bass Concerto and flute pieces. His style comes nearest to that of the French composers of the later 19th century: it is fluent and extraordinarily accomplished. He was a great master of instrumentation, knowing how to display every instrument to its best advantage. Only a few of his major works can be named here:

LAUDA SION (1). The name of a sequence, sung at Mass on the Feast of Corpus Christi.¹ The text, written about 1264 by St. Thomas Aquinas, has always been regarded as a masterpiece of medieval scholarship. The plainsong to which the sequence is adopted belongs originally to the sequence 'Laudes Crucis attolamus'; it is written in modes VII and VIII combined. The following is the opening:

Lau-da Si-on sal-va-to-rem, Lau-da du-cem et pas-to-rem, In hy-m-nis et can-ti-cis;
Quan-tum po-tes tan-tum au-de, Qui-a-ma-jor om-ni lau-de, Neo lau-da-ro suf-fi-ci-a.

The sequence has been many times subjected to polyphonic treatment of a very high order. Palestrina left two settings of it for eight voices, arranged in a double choir, and a shorter one for four. The first, and best-known, was printed, in 1575, by Alessandro Gardano, in the third book of motets for five, six and eight voices, and is one of the earliest examples of that peculiar combination of two choirs, consisting of unequally balanced voices, which Palestrina made so justly famous — the voices selected being, in this case, cantus I and II, altus and bassus in the first choir, and altus, tenor I and II and bassus in the second.

Lauder, (Sir) Harry. See Skinner (unveiling of monument).

LAUDI SPIRITUALI.² A name given to certain collections of devotional music, compiled for the use of the "Laudisti", a religious confraternity instituted at Florence in 1310 and afterwards held in great estimation by St. Charles Borromeo and St. Philip Neri.

The poetry of the laudi, some ancient specimens of which are attributed, by Crescentini, to St. Francis of Assisi (d. 1226), was originally written entirely in Italian and bears no trace of classical derivation. The music to which it is adapted, inclining rather to the character of the sacred canzonet than to that of the regular hymn, was at first unisonous and extremely simple, though, after a time, the "Laudisti" cultivated part-singing with extraordinary success.³

A highly interesting manuscript volume, once belonging to a company of "Laudisti" enrolled in 1336 at the Chiesa d' Ogni Santi at Florence, is now preserved in the Magliabecchi Library. From this Burney⁴ quotes a very beautiful example — 'Alta Trinità beata'.

The earliest printed collection is dated 1485. This, however, would seem to have been either unknown to or unrecognized by the disciples of St. Philip Neri, for in 1565 Giovanni Animuccia, who acted as his maestro di cappella, published a volume entitled 'Il primo libro delle Laudi', followed by a 'Secondo libro' of more advanced character in 1570. These sacred songs, which formed the germ of the performances afterwards called oratorio, became so popular among the youths who flocked to St. Philip for instruction that in 1588 — seventeen years after the death of the saintly

¹ This is the plural usually adopted by Italian writers, although, the singular being lauda, it should normally be laude (feminine plural). The reason for this anomaly is that laude also appears as a singular form.

Animuccia — P. Soto thought it desirable to edit a third volume, containing unacknowledged works, for three and four voices, by some of the greatest composers of the age. In 1589 the same zealous editor published an amended reprint of the three volumes, consolidated into one. This was succeeded in 1591 by a fourth volume, dedicated to the Duchessa d' Aquasparta. Serafino Razzi published a large collection in 1563, and many others followed; for at this period almost every large town, and even many an important parish, had its own company of "Laudisti", who sang the poetry of Lorenzo de' Medici, Poliziano, Pulci, Bembo, Ludovico Martelli, Giambellari, Filicaia and other celebrated writers, with undiminished interest, though, as time progressed, the character of the music sensibly deteriorated.

In 1770 Burney heard the company of "Laudisti" attached to the Church of Santa Maria Maddalena de' Pazzi at Florence sing, with excellent effect, in some street processions, as well as in some of the churches, from a book then just published for their use. W. S. R.

"LAUDON" SYMPHONY. The distinguishing name of Haydn's Symphony No. 69, in C major, composed about 1778 in honour of the Austrian Field Marshal Baron Gideon Ernst von Laudon.

LAUDS (Lat. laudes). The name given by the Roman Catholic Church to that division of the Canonical Hours which immediately follows Matins. The Office of Lauds opens, according to the ritual of that Church, with the series of Versicles and Responses beginning 'Deus in adiutorium meum intende', followed by select Psalms with Antiphons. These are succeeded by the "Capitulum" (or "Little Chapter"), the Hymn for the Day, with its proper Versicle and Response and the "Benedictus". The service then concludes with the Collect for the Day and the Commemorations (as at Vespers). The plainsong music proper to it will be found in the Antiphonal.

LAUFENBERG (Loufenberg), Heinrich (b. ?; d. Strasbourg, 31 Mar. 1460).

Swiss (?) ecclesiastic and poet. He was dean at Zofingen in Switzerland in 1434, later at Freiburg i/B., and in 1445 he entered the Johannite monastery at Strasbourg. He was one of the first to adapt German sacred words to old secular tunes, so as to save the beautiful melodies while rejecting the objectionable words with which they were at first associated, a practice which was afterwards so much in vogue at the time of the Reformation. His poems may be found in Wackernagel, 'Das deutsche Kirchenlied', Vol. II, Nos. 701-98. Ambros¹ quotes his German paraphrase of the 'Salve Regina', words and music, but mistakenly attributes the melody to Laufenberg, though he afterwards so far corrects himself as to describe it as "eine volkstümliche Umbildung der kirchlichen Melodie". R. von Liliencron² has shown that the melody is nothing else but that of the plainsong 'Salve Regina', the text of which Laufenberg so paraphrased in German verses that every note of the plainsong melisma is sung to a separate syllable. The whole piece is an interesting example of the practice by which the originally textless melismata on the final syllable of the gradual Alleluia were developed into the proses and hymns called sequences.

For the use of his choir at Leipzig, Carl Riedel edited several 'Altdeutsche geistliche Lieder' by Laufenberg, arranged for four voices. J. R. M.

LAUKO, Dezider (b. Szarvas nr. Békés, Hungary, 8 Nov. 1872; d. Bratislava, 2 Dec. 1942).

Slovak pianist and composer. In his boyhood and during his education at the "Gymnasium" in his birthplace he grew up in a musical atmosphere, his father being a Slovak schoolmaster and a versatile musician. Afterwards he read law in Budapest (LL.D.), at the same time studying the pianoforte under A. Szendy at the Academy of Music. His official career brought him to Bratislava (then called Pozsony or Pressburg), where he finally became Concillor of the Government and Finance Director. He was a well-accredited pianist and also proved himself to be a prolific composer of unpretentious but pleasant pianoforte pieces (rhapsodies, humoresques, etc.), based chiefly on Slovak folk tunes. His best work of this kind are the 'Slovenské tance' ('Slovak Dances') for pianoforte duet (publ. at Turčianský Svätý Martin). Besides these he composed songs and partsongs and wrote several booklets on music. G. Č.

took a course in musical history at Helsingfors University under Ilmari Krohn and obtained the Ph.D. degree with a dissertation on the old Finnish Runo melodies. From 1918 to 1922 he was lecturer in folk music at the University, and he published several collections of folk tunes. In 1930 he settled at Nice, where he has been occupied mainly with the composition of operas, among which the following are outstanding:

- 'The Seven Brothers' (libretto based on the book by Aleksis Kivi), 1913.
- 'Kullervo' (lib. based on the 'Kalevala' and Kivi), 1917.
- 'Aslak Hetta', prod. Nice, 1938.
- 'The Song of the Magician', 1934.
- 'Le Foulard enchanté', 1938.
- 'Jehudith', 1940.

Launis also wrote stage and film music, 2 cantatas, chamber music, pianoforte pieces, songs, etc.

LAURENCE, Frederick (b. London, 25 May 1884).

English composer. He at first followed a commercial career, but studied music privately under Josef Holbrooke. Afterwards he travelled in Germany, France and Austria, gaining musical experience in various ways. On his return to England he became librarian to one or two of the most important orchestral organizations in London, doing much useful work in the way of arranging and scoring. He was also for a time a partner in a London firm of music librarians and publishers, but in 1924 transferred his activities elsewhere.

Between 1910 and 1912 he composed an opera, 'The Pariah', which he afterwards destroyed, a fate shared by several early and immature works. An orchestral Legend, 'The Spirit's Wayfaring', was produced by Sir Henry Wood at the Queen's Hall Promenade Concerts on 2 Oct. 1918, and another work for orchestra, 'The Dance of the Witch Girl', on 12 Oct. 1920. A lighter piece for string orchestra, 'Tristis', had a certain vogue. In 1922 and 1923 Laurence visited Vienna, where he conducted some of his works.

The music of Frederick Laurence was, for its time, daring as regards harmony, exceedingly complex in texture and richly scored. In spite of its nonconformity with established usages, it does not reveal indiscriminate sympathy with all the tendencies of its period. It is absolute music in so far as it seeks to express only such conceptions as lie outside the scope of any other art. Most frequently it deals with occult matters and aims at arousing a mystical emotion rather than at making its appeal to the senses or the intellect.

Other works by Laurence are 'A Miracle', 'Enchantment', 'Fire Earth', 'Milandor', 'Night', 'The Dream of Harlequin', 'The Passionate Quest', all for orchestra; Sextet for strings, Trio for violin, cello and pianoforte; Sonata for violin and pianoforte; various pianoforte pieces, etc.

LAURENTIUS VON SCHNÜFFIS (actually Johann Martin) (b. Schniffis, Vorarlberg, 24 Aug. 1633; d. Constance, 7 Jan. 1702).

Austrian singer and composer. As an itinerant scholar he earned his living by singing and rhyming until he received an engagement at the Innsbruck court theatre in 1660. In 1665 he entered a religious order and some time after was made a poet laureate by the Emperor Leopold I. He is one of the few monodic song writers of the 17th century, but of the nine books of his songs the melodies are at least partly by Father Romanus Vötter.

LAURI-VOLPI, Giacomo (b. Rome, 11 Dec. 1894).

Italian tenor singer. He was destined for a legal career and studied law at Rome University, but decided to devote himself to singing and entered the Accademia di Santa Cecilia in his native city. Later he took private lessons under Rosati. He made his début in Massenet's 'Manon' at the Teatro Costanzi in Rome in 1920, but after some successes in other Italian cities became attached chiefly to the Metropolitan Opera in New York, where he first appeared as the Duke in 'Rigoletto' on 27 Jan. 1923. Before he left that opera-house in 1934 he made guest appearances at the Teatro alla Scala of Milan, at the Covent Garden Opera in London, where he did not greatly please, and at the Teatro

Colón in Buenos Aires. His later career was confined almost wholly to Italy. E. B.

LAUTERBACH, Johann Christoph (b. Culmbach, Bavaria, 24 July 1832; d. Dresden, 28 Mar. 1918).

German violinist. His education he received at the school and "Gymnasium" of Würzburg, where he also learnt music from Bratsch and Fröhlich. In 1850 he entered the Brussels Conservatoire as a pupil of Bériot and Fétis, in 1851 received the gold medal and during Léonard's absence took his place as professor of the violin. In 1853 he became Konzertmeister and professor of the violin at the Munich Conservatory; in 1861, on the death of Lipinski, he was appointed second Konzertmeister of the royal orchestra at Dresden and in 1873 succeeded to the first place. From 1861 to 1877 he also held the post of principal teacher of the violin in the Conservatory of Dresden, with great and increasing renown.

Lauterbach travelled much and always with success. He spent the seasons of 1864 and 1865 in England, appearing in London at the Philharmonic on 2 May of the former and 15 May of the latter year. In Paris he played at the last concert at the Tuileries before the Franco-Prussian war and received from Napoleon III a gold snuff-box set with diamonds. He was decorated with many German orders. In the summer of 1876 he met with a serious mountain accident in Switzerland, by which several of his companions were killed and he himself severely injured; but he completely recovered. Lauterbach's style united the best peculiarities of the Belgian school, great polish and elegance, with the breadth of the German.

LAVALEE, Calixa (b. Verchères, Quebec, 28 Dec. 1842; d. Boston, Mass., 21 Jan. 1891).

Canadian pianist and composer. He was the son of a musician, showed talent as a pianist and was sent to the Paris Conservatoire, where he made his début as a soloist in 1860. Returning shortly afterwards to Montreal, he made many tours of Canada and the U.S.A. as concert pianist during the next two decades. In 1881 he was a member of the concert company of the German singer Etelka Gerster. Subsequent years were spent in an endeavour to establish a great French-Canadian Conservatory at Quebec, and in 1887 he became president of the National Music Teachers' Association (U.S.A.). By this time he had settled at Boston, Mass., where the four remaining years of his life were spent.

Throughout his life he was prolific both as an orchestral and ecclesiastical composer. In 1887 a French-Canadian organization offered a prize for an air suitable to be used as a national anthem by French-Canadians. With no words in mind he submitted a melody of singular beauty and dignity which won the award. Subsequently a hymn, 'O Canada', was written to it by Judge Routhier. It captured the imagination of the people of Quebec, but did not attract the attention of English-speaking Canadians until 1908. In that year was celebrated the three hundredth anniversary of the founding of the city of Quebec by Champlain. It was attended by King George V (then Prince of Wales), who expressed his profound admiration for Lavalee's air. Within a short time several English versions of the text were written, and 'O Canada' is now heard at public functions throughout Canada and in all the schools of the country, irrespective of racial origins. His comic opera, 'The Widow' (libretto by Frank H. Nelson), was produced at Boston in 1881.

(1) Lewis Lavenu (b. ?; d. ?), flautist and music publisher. He was in business in 1796 at 23 Duke Street, St. James's, London. About Nov. 1798 he had removed to 29 New Bond Street, about 1805–11 the firm (which had become Lavenu & Mitchell in 1802) was at 26 New Bond Street and in 1811–19 at 28 New Bond Street, the partnership with Mitchell having ceased in 1808.

(2) Elizabeth Lavenu (b. ?; d. ?), widow of the preceding. She succeeded to the business at 28 New Bond Street in 1819, with premises at 24 Edwards Street, Manchester Square, from about 1821 to 1827. She was succeeded about 1828 by Mori & Lavenu at 28 New Bond Street, having married the violinist Nicholas Mori as her second husband.

The Lavenu family issued great quantities of sheet music, vocal and instrumental, almost always printed on coarse, blue-tinged paper.

He was a student at the R.A.M. in London, where he studied composition under Bochs and Potter. Before leaving the Academy he was engaged as cellist at the Opera and the Westminster Abbey Festival of 1834. He was also in business as a music seller at 28 New Bond Street, in succession to Mori & Lavenu, after the death of his stepfather, Nicholas Mori, in 1839, until 1844. During that time he published a few songs and short pianoforte pieces composed by himself. His operetta, 'Loretta, a Tale of Seville', with a libretto by Alfred Bunn, was produced at Drury Lane Theatre on 9 Nov. 1846, with success. Dissatisfied with his position, Lavenu emigrated to Australia and obtained the post of director of the music at the theatre of Sydney.

LAVERGNE, ? (b. ?; d. ?).

French 17th–18th-century composer. He is known only by the printed score of an opera, 'La Princesse d'Élide' (lib. by P. C. Roy, after Molière), of which the only known copy is in the B.M. It was published by Ballard in 1706 and is probably the only instance among the very many operas issued by that firm of which no production can be traced. Nor is the composer (whose Christian name is not given) known by any other work. According to Quérard, Roy's libretto was published in the same year as the score, but no copy of it is known.

LAVIGNAC, (Alexandre Jean) Albert (b. Paris, 21 Jan. 1846; d. Paris, 28 May 1916).

French musicologist and educationist. He was a student at the Paris Conservatoire, carrying off the first prize for solfège in 1857, the first for pianoforte in 1861, the first for harmony and accompaniment in 1863, the first for counterpoint and fugue in 1864 and the second for organ in 1865. He was appointed assistant professor of solfège in 1871, professor in 1875 and professor of harmony in 1891. In 1915 he became honorary professor. His 'Cours complet théorique et pratique de dictée musicale' (1881) suggested to most French conservatories and schools the practical value of musical dictation.

In 1902 Lavignac formed the scheme for his great work, 'Encyclopédie de la musique et Dictionnaire du Conservatoire', which started publication on 30 May 1913 and which he edited until his death. He was succeeded by Lionel de La Laurencie.

Further literary works by Lavignac are the following:

LAVIN, Carlos (b. Santiago de Chile, 10 Aug. 1883).

Chilean composer and musicologist. After taking a general degree at the Instituto Nacional in Santiago, the Chilean government sent him, in 1922, to Europe to study composition and musicology. This he did first in Paris with André Caplet and Roger Pénau, and at the Sorbonne with Octave Maus, and later at the Berlin University with Erich von Hornbostel. He then (1931) set out to travel all over Europe and the Mediterranean countries making musicological investigations and corresponding for several papers including 'El Mercurio' of Santiago and the 'Revue

Musicale' of Paris. In 1939, after the Spanish civil war, he contributed in Barcelona to the 'Enciclopedia Espasa', the Spanish edition of Riemann's Dictionary, and the 'Diccionario Hispánico'. In 1942 he returned to Santiago, where he became engaged on musicological investigations at the Facultad de Ciencias y Artes Musicales of the University of Chile. As a composer he had orchestral and chamber-music works performed in Spain, France, Rumania and other countries. Among his compositions are 'Lamentaciones huilliches', 'Fiesta araucana' and two ballets, 'Quiray' and 'Otonales' for orchestra; 'Albada y cantar' for string sextet; many shorter works for various combinations of instruments and voices besides pianoforte pieces and songs.

LAVOTTA, János de Izsépfalva et Kevelháza (b. Pusztafödemes, 5 July 1764; d. Tállya, 11 Aug. 1820).

Hungarian violinist and composer. His family belonged to the nobility and his father, a senior civil servant in the Council of the Governors-General at Pozsony (Pressburg), was himself a keen amateur of music and violinist. There are few reliable details of his life, except references in the diaries of his contemporaries, but many anecdotes of romantic colouring and doubtful authenticity have survived concerning his personality. By his tenth year he already played the violin: it is likely that he received some instruction from his father, who, aware of his son's ability for and fondness of music, entrusted him to Bonaventura Sabodi, a musician at Pozsony. He is said to have studied also with a regimental bandmaster stationed at Pozsony for a time and finally with Joseph Zistler, a violinist in Cardinal Josef Batthyány's orchestra. On the death of his mother his father remarried, but his relations with his stepmother became so unsatisfactory that he deserted home in 1784 and enlisted in the army. His father obtained his release with much difficulty and sent him to Vienna to continue his musical studies. His progress there was rapid: in about a year he is said to have become extremely popular in the Viennese fashionable circles. He left the city early in 1786, visited Fraknó (an Esterházy estate, now Forchtenau, Austria) and arrived at Pest probably towards the end of 1786. There he began to study law, but did not neglect his violin. He gave a number of recitals, playing his own compositions, and his reputation grew quickly. To support himself he became a clerk in the Chancellery, where he remained until 1791. He then became tutor to the sons of Count Károly Zichy before he devoted himself entirely to music.

In 1792-93 Lavotta was musical director to the Pest-Buda Hungarian Theatre. On 22 Mar. 1793 he gave a benefit concert to mark his farewell to the company. Nearly all the remainder of his life was spent in restless wanderings. He took to drink, which undermined his health and caused his death. Thus between 1797 and 1799 he lived at Miskolc (eastern Hungary). In 1802-4 he was musical director of the Kolozsvár theatre company, but apparently could not resign himself to theatrical routine. He turned up in Pest again and supported himself with violin lessons; András Fáy, writer and patron of music, studied with him there in 1805. He went from one squire's residence to another; at the house of the Ábrányis he spent a longer period. His wanderings seemed to come to an end in 1816, when he opened a music-shop and gave music lessons at Debrecen, but the progress of his illness forced him to give up any settled existence, and from 1817 he was again on his rounds, though he spent most of his time in bed. He was seriously ill when he visited a close friend of his at Tállya, a doctor under whose care he seemed to make satisfactory progress. One day when he went to fetch his prescription he succumbed to a sudden heart attack in the chemist's shop.

The romantic episodes of Lavotta's life inspired two stage works: Jenő Hubay's opera 'Lavotta szerelme' ('Lavotta's Love') and an operetta with the same title, by Izsó Barna, first performed at the Budapest Popular Opera on 13 Apr. 1917. As one of the three violinist-composers known as the "virtuoso triumvirate", Lavotta was an outstanding exponent of verbunkos music, which flourished particularly from the last decades of the 18th to the first of the 19th century.² Although Bihari's instinctive musicianship surpassed his abilities in some respects, his compositions reveal a mind of considerable originality: in his programme suites — of which he is said to be the first Hungarian composer — he successfully attempted to reconcile the larger designs of European music to the national idiom. His polonaises, Ländler, etc., show his interest also in non-Hungarian melodies. His compositions were widely appreciated, especially by contemporary Hungarian writers: the poet Mihály Csokonai planned to publish his melodies with verses of his own and András Fáy wrote poems inspired by his music. Outside Hungary, too, his works were fairly well known, as may be inferred from the Abbé Gelinek's arrangements of some of his pieces.

His works are said to number well over a hundred, but the absence of a thematic catalogue and the scarcity of reliable documentary evidence make identification difficult at present. The extremely popular and widely known piece 'The First Love of Lavotta' ('Lavotta első szerelme') is however a misattribution: it was written by a contemporary of his, József Kossovits, a musician of Kassa. Most of his compositions remain in manuscript in various libraries (mainly the Music Department of the Hungarian National Museum) and his published works appeared partly in transcriptions by other hands and partly in collections. Only the works published separately can be mentioned here:

- 'Ungarische Werbungs Tänze für zwey Violinen und Bass' (by 'Lavotte und Czermack' [sic]) (Vienna, ? 1810).
- 'Verbunkós Nóták oder Acht ungarische National-Tänze von Herrn Lavotta für die Piano Forte eingerichtet von Herrn Abbé Gelinek' (Vienna, ? 1815).

LAVRANGA, Denis (b. Argostoli, Cephalonia, 17 Oct. 1864; d. Razata, Cephalonia, 18 July 1941).

Greek conductor and composer. He had his first lessons in music in his native town from N. Serao (violin) and N. Tzanis (harmony). In 1882 he went to Naples and studied at the Conservatory of San Pietro a Maiella for three years. He continued (1885) his studies at the Paris Conservatoire, first in the class of Delibes for three months and later with Massenet for four years; he also had some lessons in harmony from Dubois.

Lavranga began his career as conductor of a French operatic company touring in France (1889). After a short stay in Greece and Malta, he returned to Naples, where he produced his first opera, 'Elda di Vorn' (1890). A second opera, in four acts, 'La vita è un sogno', composed soon after, was never performed; its fourth act was later arranged as a new one-act opera, 'The Sorceress', given in Athens (Oct. 1901). After conducting in various theatres in Italy (Turin, Venice, etc.) he settled in Greece (1894) first as artistic director of the Philharmonic Society of Athens.

In 1898 he established with a group of amateurs the National Hellenic Opera, for which he worked all his life; his untiring efforts in this direction were his chief contribution to the evolution of music in Greece. The company gave its first performance ('Bohème') on 26 Apr. 1900, under Lavranga's collaborator L. Spinelli (1872-1904). Among other works presented by the N.H.O. were Lavranga's operas, 'The Two Brothers' (Athens, May 1900) and 'Dido' (19 Apr. 1909), this last considered his best work. The company continued its work with many difficulties and periodical suspensions, appearing in the principal Greek towns and the neighbouring countries, Egypt, Turkey, Rumania and Russia. In his 'Memoirs' (1939) he relates the story of these efforts, which had for their outcome the establishment by the State in 1940 of the National Lyric Theatre (National Opera House).

Lavranga worked for a short period as harmony teacher at the Athens Conservatory (1900-4) and published certain educational booklets, 'Handbook of Harmony' (1904), 'Theory of Music' (1905) and others. He received, together with S. Samara and N. Lambelet, the Greek National Medal of Letters and Arts.

The 2-act comic opera 'Facanapas' (libretto by the composer, after Scribe), was first performed in memory of Lavranga at the National Lyric Theatre in Athens on 2 Dec. 1950.

Lavranga's style, greatly influenced at first by the Italian school, evolved later into a personal style imbued with strong national colour. His principal works are:

OPERAS

- 'Elda di Vorn' (Naples, 1890).
- 'La vita è un sogno' (comp. 1890-91).

LAVROVSKA, Elisaveta Andreyevna (Lavrovskaya) (b. Kashin, Tver, 12 Oct. 1845; d. ?).

Russian mezzo-soprano singer, known mainly by the Polish form of her name, Lawrowska. She was taught singing by Fenzi at the Elizabeth Institute and by Mme Nissen-Saloman at the Conservatory of St. Petersburg. In 1867 she made her début as Orpheus at three performances of Gluck's opera, given by the Conservatory students under Rubinstein at the Palace of the Grand Duchess Helena, thanks to whose kindness she was enabled to study abroad. From 1868 to 1872 she was engaged at the Maryinsky Theatre in St. Petersburg and on 31 July 1871 she married Prince Zereteyev at Odessa. In 1868 she was announced to sing in Italian opera in London at Covent Garden, but did not appear. She left opera for a time and sang at concerts all over Europe, having received further instruction from Pauline Viardot-Garcia. She visited England in 1873 and made her first appearance on 24 Feb. at the Monday Popular Concerts and on 1 Mar. at the Crystal Palace. During her stay she made a great impression by her voice and fine declamatory powers of singing in operatic airs by Handel and Glinka, and in the songs by Schubert, Schumann, etc. In 1881 she reappeared in England at concerts, but for a very short period. In 1878 she returned to the St. Petersburg Opera.

A. C.

LAVRY, Mare (b. Riga, 22 Dec. 1903).
Israeli conductor and composer. He studied conducting and composition at Leipzig and obtained his first post as conductor at Saarbrücken in 1927-28. After serving as conductor at various theatres he returned to Riga in 1932, and in 1935 went to live in Palestine. Much attracted already in his earlier works by folklore and popular media, he developed a new folkloristic style in his new homeland. His works include compositions for the stage, ballets, choruses, light orchestral works and symphonic music, and several concertos. In 1949 Lavry was appointed head of the Music Department of Kol Zion Lagolah, the broadcasting station in Jerusalem for Jewish communities throughout the world. Lavry is a prolific composer, and his best works are the folk opera 'Dan the Guard' (libretto by S. Shalom and Max Brod), produced at Tel-Aviv in 1945, an oratorio, 'Song of Songs', and a popular symphonic poem, 'Emek' (1937). P. G.

LAWES. English family of musicians.

(1) Thomas Lawes (b. ? Dinder nr. Wells¹; ?; d. ? Salisbury, 7 Nov. 1640). His identification with the vicar-choral of Salisbury of the same name has not been ascertained with certainty.² The latter died on 7 Nov. 1640 and was buried in the north transept of Salisbury Cathedral. He was the father of three sons, two of whom, Henry (2) and William (4), are of historical importance.

In the registers of Dinton in Wiltshire there are two entries which establish Thomas of Dinder as the father of Henry; the marriage (1594) on 3 Feb. of "Thomas Lawes of Dynder in the countie of Somerset and Lucris Shepharde, the daughter of Junne Shepharde of Dinton", and (1596), "In this yeare ye fift day of January Thomas Lawes had a sonne christened named Henry".³

(2) Henry Lawes (b. Dinton, Wilts, 5 Jan.

² Mrs. Dora H. Robertson, in her book 'Sarum Close' (London, 1938), records from the minute books of the Dean and Chapter of Salisbury that there was a William Lawes "alias Coldbeck", who came to Salisbury from Winchester in 1594 as a deacon on probation. It is uncertain what connection, if any, he had with the famous Lawes family. After a year he applied for a permanent appointment as vicar-choral. His appointment was opposed by the vicars, who brought certain charges against him, from which, however, he was able to clear himself. He received the appointment, but held it only until 1597. He may therefore have been the William Lawes who appeared later in the choir at Chichester but left it to be sworn a Gentleman of the Chapel Royal on 1 Jan. 1603.

The evidence that it was Thomas (1) who became a vicar-choral at Salisbury and died in that post in 1640 is strengthened by a letter from the Earl of Pembroke (preserved in the muniment room at Salisbury), requesting the post for him as a personal favour. Mrs. Robertson says: "It was doubtless Henry Lawes, with his influence at Court, who induced the Earl of Pembroke to take an interest in his father Thomas" (op. cit., p. 170).

³ This agrees with the evidence of the portrait in the bishop's palace at Salisbury inscribed "H Lawes aetat 26, 1622".

1596; d. London, 21 Oct. 1662), composer, singer and player, son of the preceding. He received his musical education from Coperario in London. On 1 Jan. 1626 he was sworn in as epistler of the Chapel Royal, and on 3 Nov. following one of the gentlemen, and afterwards became clerk of the cheque. In 1633 he furnished music for Thomas Carew's masque 'Coelum Britannicum', performed at court on 18 Feb. 1634. In this masque the Earl of Bridgewater's two sons took part, and this very probably led to his being employed as music teacher in the family, and so to the production of Milton's masque 'Comus', written at his request and produced at Ludlow Castle on Michaelmas night, 29 Sept. 1634, Lawes performing the part of the Attendant Spirit. Both Hawkins and Burney printed "Sweet Echo", one of the songs in 'Comus'.² In 1637 appeared:

A Paraphrase vpon the Psalmes of David. By [George] S[andys]. Set to new Tunes for private Devotion. And a thorow Base, for Voice or Instrument. By Henry Lawes; and in 1648:

Choice Psalmes put into Musick for Three Voices. . . . Composed by Henry and William Lawes, Brothers and Servants to His Majestie. With divers Elegies set in Musick by several friends, upon the death of William Lawes. And at the end of the Thorough Base³ are added nine⁴ Canons of Three and Four Voices made by William Lawes.

A copper-plate portrait of Charles I, believed to be the last published in his lifetime, accompanies each part, and among the commendatory verses prefixed to the work is the sonnet, addressed by Milton to Henry Lawes in Feb. 1646⁵, beginning "Harry, whose tuneful and well-measured song". Lawes composed the Christmas songs in Herrick's 'Hesperides' and the songs in the plays and poems of William Cartwright:

Comedies, and tragi-Comedies, with other poems by Mr. William Cartwright. . . . The Ayres and Songs set by Mr. Henry Lawes . . . London, 1651.

It contains no music, however. In 1652 some of his songs appeared in Playford's 'Select Musical Ayres', and in 1653 Lawes published 'Ayres and Dialogues for One, Two and Three Voyces', with his portrait⁶ finely engraved by Faithorne on the title. This was received with such favour as to induce him to issue two other books with the same title in 1655 and 1658. In 1656 he was engaged with Capt. Henry Cooke, Dr. Charles Colman, Matthew Locke and George Hudson in providing the music for Davenant's 'First Day's Entertainment ment of Musick at Rutland House' ('The Siege of Rhodes').

On the Restoration in 1660 Lawes was reinstated in his court appointments. He composed the anthem 'Zadok the Priest' for the coronation of Charles II. He was buried on 25 Oct. 1662 in the cloisters of Westminster Abbey.

Many of Henry Lawes's songs are to be found in 'Select Musical Ayres and Dialogues', 1652, 1653 and 1659, and 'The Treasury of Musick', 1669. He was highly esteemed by his contemporaries, both as composer and performer. Milton praises him in both capacities and Herrick in an epigram places him on a level with some of the most renowned singers and players of his time; but later writers formed a lower estimate of his abilities as a composer. Burney, judging from his "modern" 18th-century point of view, declares his productions to be "languid and insipid, and equally devoid of learning and genius"; and Hawkins speaks of his music as deficient in melody and "neither recitative nor air, but in so precise a medium between both that a name is wanting for it". But it was not Lawes's object to produce melody in the popular sense of the word; he set "words with just note and accent" and made the prosody of his text his principal care; and it was doubtless that quality which induced all the best poetical writers of his day, from Milton and Waller downwards, to desire that their verses should be set by him. To effect his object he employed a kind of aria parlante, a style of composition which, if expressively sung, would cause as much gratification to the cultivated hearer as the most ear-catching melody would to the untrained listener. His work of this kind is historically important apart from its intrinsic merits, since it marks a stage in the setting of the English language to music in a way which reached its consummation in Purcell.⁷ Lawes was careful in the choice of words, and the words of his songs would form a pleasing volume of lyric poetry. Hawkins says that although Lawes "was a servant of the church, he contributed nothing to the increase of its stores"; but, besides the coronation anthem before mentioned, there are (or were) in an old choir book of the Chapel Royal fragments of eight or ten anthems by him, and the words of several of his anthems are given in Clifford's 'Divine Services and Anthems' (1664). In 1901 Dr. Cooper Smith, Rector of Basingstoke, owned a manuscript volume (formerly belonging to Gostling, R. Smith and Hayes), dated in the binding 1634, containing many compositions by H. Lawes. These include 'Dispairs Banquet, sung in The Pasons written by Mr. Wm. Strood, presented by ye scollers of Ch.

(3) John Lawes (b. ? Salisbury, c. 1599; d. London, Jan. 1655), brother of the preceding. He was a lay-vicar of Westminster Abbey and was buried in the Abbey cloisters.

(4) William Lawes (b. Salisbury, [bapt. 1 May] 1602; d. Chester, 1645), composer, brother of the preceding. He received musical instruction from Coperario at the expense of the Earl of Hertford.² He became one of the musicians in ordinary to Charles I. In 1633 he joined Simon Ives in the composition of the music for Shirley's 'Triumph of Peace'. In 1635 he wrote the music for Davenant's masque 'The Triumph of the Prince d'Amour'.³ An anthem by him is printed in Boyce's 'Cathedral Music'; songs and other vocal compositions in 'Select Musically Ayres and Dialogues', 1653 and 1659, 'Catch that catch can', 1652, 'The Treasury of Musick', 1669, 'Choice Psalms', 1648; and some of his instrumental music in 'Courtly Masquing Ayres', 1662. On the breaking out of the Civil War he joined the Royalist army and was made a commissary by Lord Gerrard, to exempt him from danger, but his active spirit disdaining that security, he was killed by a stray shot during the siege of Chester in 1645. His portrait is in the Music School, Oxford. 'The Royal Consort' for viols, consisting of sixty-six short pieces, and some 'Airs' for violin and bass are in the B.M. (Add. MSS 10,445, 31,431-32); the latter manuscript contains also a canon, 'Tis joy to hear', and fifty-five vocal compositions. The B.M. (Add. MSS 29,410-14, and 17,798) has more of his pieces, and in the Christ Church Library, Oxford, are his 'Great Consorte' (I. 5, 1-6) and other works (I. 4, 79-82, 91-93, K. 3, 32, and H. I. 12 and 18). Canons and manuscript songs are contained in B.M. (Eg. MS 2013, Add. MSS 29,396-97, 30,273, 31,423, 31,433, 31,462). His best-known vocal work is the part-song 'Gather ye rosebuds while ye may'.

William Lawes certainly equalled his brother Henry in the estimation of his contemporaries, and he may be judged a decidedly greater composer by the present generation. Some of his scoring for unusual combinations of chamber instruments is strikingly successful, and his music for various forms of "broken consort" is of the greatest interest. His most remarkable work, however, is for the consort of viols, including three very arresting pavans for four viols, an experimental set of five-part fantasies of uneven merit but extraordinary boldness, and a magnificently mature six-part set in which the experimentation is much more consistently successful. His harmony is of a greater discordance and warmth of feeling than that of any of his English contemporaries, and he was not approached in these respects by any of his successors in the 17th century until the school of Purcell. Some of Purcell's greatness as a harmonist may be attributed to his probable familiarity with William Lawes's celebrated fantasies, to which his own early fantasies (1680) bear at times a more than coincidental resemblance. William Lawes is mentioned by name in Thomas Mace's list of eminent composers of fantasies ('Musick's Monument', 1776, p. 234), and received an extremely favourable notice in Fuller's 'Worthies of England' (1662).⁴

LAWRENCE, Marjorie (b. Dean's March nr. Melbourne, 17 Feb. 1909).

Australian soprano singer. She first had music lessons at Melbourne and then went to Paris in 1929 and studied singing with Cécile Gilly. In 1932 she made her début at Monte Carlo with such success that she was immediately engaged by the Paris Opéra for a period of three years. There she sang principally Wagnerian parts, also Strauss's Salome, and created the principal woman's part in Cante-loube de Malaret's 'Vercingétorix'. In 1935 she appeared at the Metropolitan Opera-House, New York, and in 1936 she sang also at Chicago and Buenos Aires. She then divided her time between France and the U.S.A., where in Jan. 1939 she sang at the White House before President Roosevelt. In the same year she went back to Australia for the first time and gave numerous concerts there.

In the 1940s Marjorie Lawrence was stricken with infantile paralysis, but although unable to walk she continued to act some of her operatic parts in special arrangements made for her, and she toured extensively, giving highly successful recitals. A. H. (ii), adds.

LAWRENCE, Martin (b. London, 26 Sept. 1909).

English bass singer. He received his musical education privately. He made his début in 1934, since when he has sung in concerts, concert party, musical comedy and opera. His first appearance in opera was in 1945 when he sang in 'Faust' and 'Rigoletto' with the Carl Rosa Opera Company. In 1946–48 he sang with the New London Opera Company at the Cambridge Theatre, taking such parts as Don Pasquale, Colline in 'La Bohème' and Bartolo and Basilio in 'The Barber of Seville', Leporello, Sparafucile and Pistol. He has sung in many broadcast operas including Gerhard's 'The Duenna', Cimarosa's 'The Secret Marriage', Rimsky-Korsakov's 'Golden Cockerel', Vaughan Williams's 'Hugh the Drover' and Weber's 'Abu Hassan'. His appearance in Arthur Benjamin's 'Prima Donna' showed him to be an admirable acquisition for English opera, but, as an exceptionally adaptable artist, he is also capable of both singing and acting in Italian in a manner that is surprisingly authentic. In 1953 he had a great success in Budapest. M. K. W.

LAWRENCE, T. B. (Thomas Bertie) (b. Liverpool, 10 Feb. 1880; d. London, 25 Mar. 1953).

English choral conductor. He was educated at the Blue Coat Hospital, Liverpool, where he gained considerable musical experience as solo boy for four years in the chapel choir and as pupil-conductor of the school's military band. Incidentally he learnt to play on all the instruments of the band. He won the first musical scholarship offered by the Liverpool Corporation and spent three years at the Liverpool School of Music, studying the violin with Courvoisier; but a business career claimed him, and although he had formed the Fleet Street Choir for madrigal and other a cappella work in 1929, it was not until 1934 that he gave up his business in order to devote himself to his new métier of choral conductor.

It was largely due to his realization, through the editorial work of E. H. Fellowes and others, of the vast resources of choral music left by the Tudor composers that he founded first his choir, and in the following year (1930) the London Madrigal Group, a sextet of singers with which he has visited the U.S.A. The performances of both organizations were stamped with his clear conception of the meaning of interpretation in the vocal consort. His fine taste refused triviality alike in his choice of music and in his manner of performance. H. C. C., adds.

LAWTON, Dorothy (b. Sheffield, 31 July 1881).

English music librarian. She went to the U.S.A. at the age of nine and studied the pianoforte with several masters, including Sigimund Stojowski, in New York, also harmony with Eduard Hermann. She taught and lectured in New York until 1920, when she organized the music circulating library, then a new department of the New York Public Library, of which she remained in charge for many years and which she directed with great ability, making a special feature of the catalogue and doing much to assist musicians in their research work. In 1930 she went to Paris to organize a similar department at the American Library, without interrupting her New York appointment. She was a member of the Beethoven Association of America, the MacDowell Club and the National Institute of Social Sciences, and also served as hon. Secretary of the U.S.A. Section of the I.S.C.M.

Dorothy Lawton retained her British nationality and after the second world war returned to England, assisting Mrs. Winifred Christie-Moor in establishing the Central Music Library in London, for which she began to compile an elaborate catalogue. This had at first to be set aside for a simplified interim catalogue suitable for immediate use, but her services and her long experience of librarianship were of inestimable benefit to the Library, and remained so after her retirement in 1950.

French 16th-century organist and composer. He settled as organist at Florence about 1540 and was Benvenuto Cellini's teacher in music. He edited, for the Lyons music-printer Jacques Moderne, a book of ten masses ('Liber decem missarum', 1532-40), among which are three masses and three motets by himself. His Mass 'Adieu, mes amours' Ambros describes as a remarkable work. His other works are canzoni a 5 and a 4, published by Moderne in 1540 and later, and other madrigals and motets in various collections.

From a rare work entitled 'Contrapunctus seu figurata musica super plano cantu' (Lyons, 1528) Kade in his 'Beilagen zu Ambros' reprinted two motets by Layolle, 'Salve Virgo singularis' and 'Media vita', both a 4, which, as the title of the work indicates, are contrapuntal studies on a plain-song tenor. From Layolle's connection with works printed at Lyons it would seem as if that had been his birthplace, and it appears that Aleman Layolle, his son, was for a while organist at Lyons, but afterwards returned to Florence and was music teacher to a daughter of Benvenuto Cellini.

LAYS (actually Lay or Lai), François (b. La Barthe de Nesthes, Old Gascony, 14 Feb. 1758; d. Ingrande nr. Angers, 30 Mar. 1831).

French singer. He learned music in the monastery of Guaraison, but before he was twenty his fame as a singer had spread, and in Apr. 1779 he found himself in Paris to be tried for the Opéra. His name first appears in Lajarte's catalogue of first performances as Petrarch in a pastoral héroïque by Candeille, called 'Laure et Pétrarque', 2 July 1780, and is spelt Laïs. His next mention is in Piccinni's 'Iphigénie en Tauride', 23 Jan. 1781, where he has the part of a coryphée.¹ After that he appears frequently in company with the famous Antoinette Saint-Huberti. He was also attached to the concerts of Marie-Antoinette and to the Concert Spirituel. He was a poor actor, unless in parts specially written for him; but the splendour of his voice made up for everything, and he preserved it so well as to remain in the company of the Opéra till Oct. 1823.

Lays was a violent politician on the popular side, which did not please his colleagues, and some quarrels arose in consequence, but with no further result than to cause him to write a pamphlet and to force him, after 9 Thermidor, to appear in parts distasteful to him and to sing before the Bourbons after the Restoration. He was professor of singing at the Conservatoire from 1795 until 1799, when he retired from the post; and in 1819-26 he held the same office in the École Royale de Chant et de

Déclamation. He had been principal singer in the chapel of Napoleon from 1801 till the fall of the emperor, but was cashiered by Louis XVIII. After leaving the École he retired to Ingrande. That he was not a good actor has already been told, but Fétis pronounces him not even a good singer, saying that his taste was poor and that he had several bad tricks; but he had warmth and animation, and the beauty of his voice so far atoned for everything that for a long time no opera could be successful in which he had not a part. G.

LAZARI, Alberto (b. ?; d. ?).

Italian 17th-century organist and composer. He was a Carmelite monk and maestro di cappella and organist at the parochial college of Massa Lombarda in 1635. In 1637 he was an academician at Cesena and afterwards he lived at Perugia. He composed 2 books of church music. E. v. d. s.

LAZARINI, Scipione (b. ?; d. ?).

Italian 17th-century composer. He was an Augustinian monk. His earliest known composition is a 3-part song in a collective volume (1646), and this was followed by two books of motets, Opp. 1 and 2 (1674) and a book of psalms (1675). In manuscript in the Bologna Library are 3 masses and 4 motets for 4-8 voices. E. v. d. s.

LAZARO VALVASENSI (b. Valvasone nr. Udine, ?; d. ?).

Italian 16th-17th-century organist and composer. His original surname is unknown: "Valvasensi" derives from his birthplace. He was successively organist at Murano (1622), Tolmezo, Friuli (1626) and Valvasone (c. 1634). He is sometimes known as "Accademico occulto detto Il Stravagante". Most of his music has been lost, and what survives is very scarce; it consists mainly of concertato church music, psalms, motets, etc., published between 1620 and 1640. His 'Secondo giardino d' amorosi fiori' (Venice, 1634; only surviving copy at Ch. Ch., Oxford), contains several attractive secular songs, including some early examples of the strophic-bass cantata. N. F. (ii).

LAZARUS, Henry (b. London, 1 Jan. 1815; d. London, 6 Mar. 1895).

English clarinetist. He began the study of the clarinet under Blizard, bandmaster of the Royal Military Asylum, Chelsea, and continued it under Charles Godfrey, sen., bandmaster of the Coldstream Guards. After fulfilling engagements in various theatrical and other orchestras he was, in 1838, appointed as second to Willman at the Sacred Harmonic Society. On the death of Willman in 1840 Lazarus succeeded him as principal clarinet at the Opera and all the important concerts, festivals, etc., in London and the provinces, a position he retained for many years with great and ever-increasing reputation. He was a professor of his instrument at the R.A.M. from 1854, at Kneller Hall from 1858 and at the R.C.M. till 1894.

Although conversant with the Boehm system and possessing a basset horn of this construction, Lazarus was faithful to the Müller type of clarinet. Beginning his career with 12-key boxwood instruments by a London maker, he finally adopted a 16-key model by E. Albert of Brussels.

LAZNOWSKI, Józef (b. ?; d. ?).

Polish 18th-century composer. He was a monk in the monastery of Cistercians at Odra, where his 8-part 'Vesperae in D' for S.A.T.B., 2 violins, 2 horns and organ, dated 20 June 1772, was recently discovered. Another work of his was found at Przemą: an 'Aria in D' for soprano, 2 violins, 2 horns and organ.

LAZZARI, Sylvio (b. Bozen, 31 Dec. 1857; d. Paris, 18 June 1944).

Austro-Italian, later French composer. After studying law at Innsbruck and Munich he entered the Paris Conservatoire in 1883, but his chief studies were carried on under César Franck. The following works have been publicly performed: The pantomime, 'Lulu', brought out in 1887; the musical drama, 'Armor', at the Landestheater in Prague, 7 Nov. 1898; 'La Lépreuse' (libretto by Henri Bataille, Ger. 'Die Ausgestossene', translated by Emma Klinglefeld and the composer), performed Paris, Opéra-Comique, 7 Feb. 1912; 'Le Sautériot', performed Chicago, 19 Jan. 1918; 'Melaenis' (Mulhouse, 1927) and 'La Tour de feu' (Opéra, Paris, 16 Jan. 1928).¹ For orchestra he wrote a 'Rapsodie espagnole', 'Ophélie', a symphonic poem after Shakespeare, 'Impressions d'Adriatique', 'Effet de nuit' (1904), Fantasy for violin and orchestra, a 'Concertstück' for pianoforte and orchestra, and another for violin and orchestra.

LAZZARINI, Gustavo (b. Padua or Verona², c. 1765; d. ?).

Italian tenor singer. He made his début at Lucca in 1789, in Zingarelli's 'Ifigenia in Aulide', with great success. In the two following years he appeared in London, singing both in serious and comic operas, such as Bertoni's 'Quinto Fabio' and Paisiello's 'Locanda', in the former with Pacchierotti, but taking the principal part in the latter. Lord Mount-Edgumbe thought him "a very pleasing singer with a sweet tenor voice". During the Carnival of 1794 he sang at Milan, with Grassini and Marchesi, in Zingarelli's 'Artaserse' and Portugal's 'Demofonte', and bore the comparison inevitably made between him and those great singers. He sang there again in 1795, and once more in 1798, appearing on the latter occasion in Cimarosa's 'Orazi' and Zingarelli's 'Meleagro', with Riccardi and Crescentini. In 1801 he was one of the opera buffa company in Paris, where he was again heard to advantage by Lord Mount-Edgumbe (1802). But his voice had then lost much of its freshness, though the great style remained.

Lazzarini published two volumes of Italian airs and a pastoral, both in Paris. His portrait was engraved there by Nitôt Dufrêne, an operatic singer.

LEACH, James (b. Wardle nr. Rochdale, 1762; d. Blackley nr. Manchester, 8 Feb. 1798).

English tenor singer and composer. He was at first a handloom weaver. From 1789 he was a tenor singer and teacher at Rochdale, and at Salford a few years later. He published a 'New Sett of Hymn and Psalm Tunes . . .' (Preston, London, 1789) and a 'Second Sett . . .' of the same, probably about 1794. His tunes are found in several of the American collections, such as the 'Easy Instructor' (Albany, New York, 1798) and the 'Bridge-water Collection' (Boston, 1802). 'The David Companion, or Methodist Standard' (Baltimore, 1810) contains forty-eight of his pieces.³ In the Rev. H. Parr's 'Church of LEADER. (1) The chief of the first violins is in England called the leader of the orchestra, the Konzertmeister of the Germans and chef d'attaque of the French. He is close to the conductor's left hand. The position is a most important one, as the animation and "attack" of the orchestra depend in great measure on the leader.

It is the leader's duty to play any passages for solo violin that may occur in works other than violin concertos; and in orchestras that are not organized institutions the leader often makes the engagement with the individual members. He may also be called upon in emergencies to conduct rehearsals or even concerts.

H. C. C.

LEADING-NOTE. The seventh note of the major and ascending minor scale, a semitone below the tonic. It "leads" the ear to expect a progression to the tonic even in unaccompanied music, but most irresistibly when the leading-note is the uppermost note of a chord of the dominant seventh. It is the most characteristic tonal degree of the modern scales, for it does not occur in the medieval modes except in the Lydian, where however it was not reinforced by harmonization. The Ionian mode, which is identical with modern major, was unknown in the middle ages, and its contemporary, the Aeolian, the nearest mode to modern minor, differed from it precisely in not having the sharpened seventh degree of the leading-note. That the seventh degree was often sharpened even in modal music, according to the principles of musica ficta, is another matter.

LEADING SEVENTH. A chord built up in thirds (chord of the minor seventh) on the basis of the leading-note in music in a major key, e.g. b, d', f', a', and resolving on the tonic triad (c', e', g' in the same instance), producing a resolution of a vulgar kind known as "concertina harmony".

LE BÈGUE, Nicolas Antoine de (b. Laon, c. 1630; d. Paris, 6 July 1702).

French organist and composer. He became organist at the churches of Saint-Merry and Saint-Médéric in Paris. In 1678 he succeeded La Barre as organist to the king. He published 2 books of 'Pièces de clavessin', the first in 1677¹ (some reprinted in the 'Trésor des pianistes') and 3 books² of organ pieces, 1676, etc. Two of these are reprinted in Ritter's 'Geschichte des Orgelspiels'. Examples from his system of ornamentation from harpsichord pieces are given in Dannreuther's 'Ornamentation', but Dolmetsch ('The Interpretation of the Music of the XVIIth and XVIIIth Centuries') shows that his principles are the same as those of Chambonnières. A manuscript 'Méthode pour toucher l'orgue' is in the town library at Tours, and a Magnificat³ and some organ pieces are in the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris (Vm. 7, 1823).

LE BEL, Firmin (b. ?; d. ?).

French 16th-century singer. He took holy orders and worked in the diocese of Noyon until, in 1540, he succeeded Mallapert as maestro di cappella at the Church of Santa Maria Maggiore in Rome. Later on he held the same post at that of San Luigi dei Francesi, but in 1561 he joined the Papal Chapel as a singer.

He settled at Munich as a pianoforte teacher for some years before 1856, where, with Faisst, Stark and others, he started the music school. He was a very accomplished and successful teacher and the virtual founder of the Stuttgart Conservatory.

The 'Grosse Pianoforte Schule', which he edited with Stark, was published by the house of Cotta and afterwards revised by Max Pauer (1904); the famous edition of Beethoven's pianoforte sonatas, issued by the same firm, was begun by these editors and continued by Hans von Bülow.

LEBORNE, Aimé (Ambroise Simon) (b. Brussels, 29 Dec. 1797; d. Paris, 1 Apr. 1866).

French composer of Belgian birth. He was taken to France early and went to school at Versailles. On 8 Jan. 1811 he entered the Paris Conservatoire, where he became a pupil of Berton and Cherubini. In 1818 he obtained the second Prix de Rome, in 1820 the first and in 1821–23, having taken French nationality, he was entitled to study in Rome and travel in Germany at the French government's expense. On his return to Paris he became known as an opera composer, and he was appointed professor successively of counterpoint, fugue and composition at the Conservatoire, the last from 1836 to 1866, replacing Reicha. On 1 Jan. 1829 he became Librarian of the Opéra and of the royal chapel. He wrote a treatise on harmony which remained in manuscript and brought out a new edition of Catel's 'Traité d'harmonie' with numerous additions (1848). Having adapted Carafa's 'Les Deux Figaros', performed at the Théâtre de l'Odéon in 1827, he wrote the following operas of his own:

'Le Camp du drapeau d'or', prod. Paris, Opéra-Comique, 28 Feb. 1828.

LE BORNE, Fernand (b. Charleroi, 10 Mar. 1862; d. Paris, 15 Jan. 1929).

Belgian critic and composer. He studied in Paris under Massenet, Saint-Saëns and Franck, and remained there, thus identifying himself with the French school. In 1901 he obtained the Chartier prize of the Institut for his chamber music. He contributed musical criticism to 'Le Monde artiste' and 'Le Soir' of Brussels, and was the regular music critic of 'Le Petit Parisien'.

LEBRUN. German family of musicians of (1) French descent and (2) Italian parentage.

(1) Ludwig August Lebrun (b. Mannheim, 1746; d. Berlin, 16 Dec. 1790), oboist and composer. He was the son and pupil of Alexander Lebrun, oboist in the Mannheim orchestra, 1747–70, and himself entered the orchestra in 1764. According to the judgment of contemporaries, Lebrun was a very fine and highly skilled performer on his instrument; "even if not as learned as Besozzi, he is undoubtedly more of a genius" (C. F. D. Schubart, who also claims that Lebrun was the first to reach high D and E and calls his compositions "as sweet as drops of nectar").

In 1778 Lebrun gave up his seat in the orchestra, married Franziska Danzi (see below) and accompanied her on her journeys to London (1779–81), Paris, Vienna, Italy and elsewhere, giving concerts by himself and together with his wife. As a composer Lebrun wrote some ballet music for the King's Theatre in London, presumably for those operas in which his wife sang; at least two of these ballets were published, 'Armida' and 'Agus, ballet champêtre'. For his instrument Lebrun published seven concertos and other pieces. A thematic catalogue of 6 trio Sonatas (Op. 1) is in D.T.B., Vol. XVI (1915).

(2) Franziska Lebrun (b. Mannheim, 1756; d. Berlin, 14 May 1791), soprano singer, wife of the preceding. She was the daughter of Innocenzo Danzi and elder sister of Franz Danzi. She made her operatic début as a girl of sixteen at Schwetzingen, the summer residence of the elector palatine, as Sandrina in Sacchini's 'La contadina in corte'. Burney, who happened to be present at that performance (9 Aug. 1772), writes:

Signora Francesca Danzi, a German girl whose voice and execution are brilliant; she has likewise a pretty figure, a good shake, and an expression as truly Italian, as if she had lived her whole life in Italy; in short she is now a very engaging and agreeable performer, and promises still greater things in future, being young, and having never appeared on any stage till this summer.

His judgment was confirmed by her later brilliant career.

In Reichard's 'Theaterkalender' of 1777 she is called the "most admirable songstress who has ever been heard. . . . By permission of the court she will be going to England in 1777." She made her London début at the King's Theatre on 8 Nov. of that year, as Ariene in Sacchini's 'Creso', and during that season sang three more first serious parts, in Sacchini's 'Erifile', J. C. Bach's 'La clemenza di Scipione' and Tommaso Giordano's 'Il re pastore', with the Munich-born tenor Valentin Adamberger ("Adamonti") as her partner. From London Francesca Danzi went to Paris to appear at the Concert Spirituel, and proceeded to Milan where she sang in the opening season of the Teatro alla Scala, inaugurated on 3 Aug. 1778 with Salieri's 'Europa riconosciuta'; the libretto of this opera was by Mattia Verazi, the court poet at Mannheim, and no doubt it was through his good offices that the young German singer was given that great chance in her European career. About this time she married the oboist L. A. Lebrun, and it was as Signora Le Brun that she made her reappearance in London on 27 Nov. 1779, at the opening of the King's Theatre for a new season, in which Pacchierotti was the primo uomo and Bertoni the conductor. She sang in several new operas (Sacchini's 'Rinaldo', Bertoni's 'Orfeo', etc.) and stayed also for the following season (1780-81, under the direction of Giovanni Battista Bianchi), in which she added the female title-parts in Grétry's 'Zemira e Azore', Rauzzini's 'Piramo e Tisbe' and others to her repertory.

From 1782 to 1786 Franziska Lebrun was at Munich; on 12 Jan. 1787 she sang at the San Carlo Theatre, Naples, in the first production of Paisiello's 'Pirro'; in the autumn of 1789 she went, with her husband, to Berlin, their last engagement, as it turned out. The last opera in which she appeared was Reichardt's 'Brenno' (14 Feb. 1790). While in London for the second time (1779-81) she also tried her hand at composing and published two sets each of 6 sonatas for harpsichord and violin (Opp. 1 & 2).¹

(3) Sophie Lebrun (b. London, 20 June 1781; d. ?), pianist, daughter of the preceding and (1). She became celebrated chiefly under her married name of Dulcken² and made successful concert tours through France, Italy and Germany. On 18 Apr. 1799 she married Dulcken, a famous pianoforte maker of Munich. She composed, but never published, some pianoforte sonatas and other pieces.

(4) Rosine Lebrun (b. Munich, 13 Apr. 1785; d. ?), pianist, singer and actress, sister of the preceding. She was first taught the pianoforte by Streicher, but afterwards studied singing under her uncle Franz Danzi and made a successful début; but having married Stenzsch, an actor at the Munich court theatre, on 30 Nov. 1801, she gave up opera to play in comedy, in which she displayed a fair amount of talent.

J. M.

LEBRUN, Jean (b. Lyons, 6 Apr. 1759; d. Paris, c. 1809).

French horn player. He studied in Paris under Punto. He possessed great technical ability and produced the highest notes with perfect ease. He was at the Paris Opéra from 1786 to 1792, when the Revolution drove him to London, whence he went to Berlin as member of the royal chapel. In 1802 he toured on the Rhine and in the Netherlands, and he returned to Paris in 1806, where he failed to find an appointment and died in poverty. He is credited with the invention of the mute for the horn. Some horn concertos of his remained in manuscript.

See also HORN, p. 372.

LEBRUN, Louis Sébastien (b. Paris, 10 Dec. 1764; d. Paris, 27 June 1829).

French tenor singer and composer. He sang both at the Opéra and the Opéra-Comique in Paris. He was also maître de chapelle of Napoleon's private music. Between 1790 and 1818 he composed sixteen operas, of which 'Marcelin' (Théâtre Feydeau, 22 Mar. 1800) and 'Le Rossignol' (Opéra, 23 Apr. 1816) were the most successful. He also wrote a 'Te Deum'.

LEBRUN, Paul (b. Ghent, 21 Apr. 1861; d. Louvain, 4 Nov. 1920).

Belgian conductor and composer. He studied at the Ghent Conservatory and obtained the Belgian Prix de Rome in 1891 with a cantata, 'Andromède'. He then continued his studies, not only in Rome but also in Germany, Vienna and France. He had already conducted the choral society Orphéon de Cambrai in 1890, and in 1895 he became conductor of the Cercle Artistique of Ghent. In 1913 he was appointed director of the music school at Louvain, a post he retained until his death.

Lebrun's works include an opera, 'La Fiancée d'Abydos' (libretto based on Byron); choruses; a Symphony in E minor, a symphonic poem 'Sur la montagne' and 'Marche jubilaire' for orchestra; a string Quartet, etc.

LECHNER, Leonhard (b. Etsch¹ Valley, Tyrol, ?; d. Stuttgart, 9 Sept. 1606).

Austrian composer. He was brought up as a chorister in the Bavarian court chapel at Munich under Lassus, of whose works he always remained an ardent admirer. In 1570 he held some post as schoolmaster at Nuremberg, and while still there he began to be known as a diligent composer of motets and German songs in the madrigal or villanella style, also as editor of various collections of music. Thus in 1579 he introduced some degree of order into the chaos of the frequent republications of earlier works by Lassus, by bringing out, evidently in concert with the composer himself, a revised and enlarged edition of his two books of motets of 1568, one for 4 and 5 voices, the other for 6-10, incorporating more of Lassus's earlier work of the same kind. In 1581 he brought out a book of five previously unpublished masses by Lassus and in 1583 a collection entitled 'Harmoniae miscellae', containing motets a 5 and 6, mostly by composers connected at one time or another with the Bavarian chapel. Dehn in his 'Sammlung älterer Musik' published a selection from this latter work, including a good motet by Lechner himself, 'Ne intres in iudicium'.

In 1584, probably on the recommendation of Lassus, Lechner was appointed Kapellmeister at Hechingen to Count Eitel Friedrich of Hohenzollern, but he suddenly gave up this post in 1585, without any ostensible reason. Religion may have been the determining motive, as we know that he was succeeded at Hechingen by Ferdinand Lassus, the son of Orlando; and it was also in 1585 that Orlando dedicated to Count Eitel Friedrich a book of motets, and meanwhile Lechner, after an unsuccessful application for the post of Kapellmeister at Dresden to the then Lutheran court of Saxony, in 1587 became Kapellmeister at Stuttgart to the court of Württemberg, where he remained till his death. It would almost appear as if he continued to cherish a hankering after the Saxon court, since his last work was the composition of a wedding motet ('Laudate Dominum' for 15 voices) for the marriage of the Elector Johann Georg I of Saxony.

Besides his editorial work already referred to, Lechner's own works may be summarized as follows:

1. Two books of 'Motettæ' or 'Sacrae cantiones' a 4-6, containing 86 numbers (1575, 1581).

¹ From his birthplace comes the designation Athesinus, which he usually appended to his name.

2. 'Liber Missarum 6 et 5 voc.' (1584), containing 3 masses and 10 introls.
3. 'Magnificat sec. octo tonos' (1578), 8 numbers.
4. 'Septem Psalmi Poenitentiales' . . . 6 v. (1587).
5. Various collections of 'Teutsche Lieder, geistliche und weltliche a 3, 4 und 5' (1575-89).

F. Commer, in his volume of 'Geistliche und weltliche Lieder', republished four good specimens of Lechner's work: two "geistliche Lieder", 'Christ ist erstanden' a 4 and 'Herr Jesu Christ dir lebe ich' a 5; two "weltliche", 'Wol komst der Mey' a 4 and 'Will uns das Meidlein nimmer han' a 5. Also in the 'Publikationen der Gesellschaft für Musikforschung', Vol. XIX (1895), Eitner republished Lechner's songs, 1579, containing his rearrangement, a 3, of twenty-one songs a 3, from Regnart's 'Tricinia', and three Italian madrigals of Lechner's own. LECHTHALER, Josef (b. Rattenberg, Tyrol, 31 Dec. 1891; d. Vienna, 21 Aug. 1948).

Austrian musicologist and composer. He studied philology at Innsbruck, musicology at Vienna University under Guido Adler and church music with Goller and Springer at the Musical Academy there. In 1919 he took a doctor's degree with a dissertation on Uttendal. In 1924 he was appointed teacher of theory in the church music section of the Vienna Academy, and he was director of that and the school music section in 1933-38 and again from 1945. He was a recognized expert on questions of church and school music, editor of the periodical 'Musikerziehung' and a composer of many vocal and instrumental works designed to further young people's musical education.

Among Lechthaler's principal works are a cantata, 'Der lichte Tag', for 3 solo voices, male chorus and orch. (Op. 58), 'Lieder der Wanderschaft' for mezzo-soprano, chorus and 4 insts. (Op. 42); many unaccompanied choruses ('Der Bauer', 'Es tönt der Lieder Zier', &c.); 2 stg. Quartets (D mi., Op. 19, C mi., Op. 55), Trio for vn., viola da gamba and harpsichord (Op. 57); song cycle 'Coniunx coniugi' (to words by Ruth Schaumann) (Op. 60), &c.

LECLAIR. French family of violinists and composers. Of the eight children of Antoine Leclair, a master lacc-maker at Lyons, no fewer than six became professional musicians.

(1) Jean Marie Leclair, "l'aîné" (b. Lyons, 10 May 1697; d. Paris, 22 Oct. 1764). It has been stated that he began his public life as a dancer at the Rouen theatre; but this is doubtful.¹ In 1722 he went to Turin as ballet master, where he composed some interludes for the 'Semiramide' of Orlandini, and where Somis was so much pleased with some ballet music of his that he induced him to take up the violin, which up to that time he had cultivated as a secondary pursuit only, and to place himself under his tuition. His first stay at Turin, near Somis, was only until 1723, but he returned in 1726.

Leclair appears to have continued his studies for a considerable time before going to Paris in 1728. From 1728 to 1736 he won a brilliant success in Paris at the Concert Spirituel and at court. During this period he studied composition under Chéron. In 1734 he became a member of the royal orchestra, but owing to a dispute with Guignon as to the leadership of the second violins, he gave up his post again and about 1735 retired from the Opéra. His name ceases to appear in the programmes of the Concert Spirituel about 1736.

For the rest of his life he appears to have been exclusively occupied with the composition and publication of his works, and with teaching. He came out of his retirement to make a journey to Holland at the invitation of the Princess of Orange, for the purpose of hearing and meeting Locatelli, of whose powers as a violinist he, led by the extraordinary and novel difficulties presented in the caprices by that artist, had probably formed a great idea. On his return in 1743-44 he visited the court of Don Philip of Spain at Chambéry. His opera, 'Scylla et Glaucus', was performed at the Opéra on 4 Oct. 1746, and in 1748 the Duc de Gramont appointed Leclair first violin in his private orchestra at Puteaux. There he wrote various ballets and divertissements. Soon after his return from another visit to Holland he was assassinated, late at night, close to the door of his own house. Neither motive nor author of the crime was ever discovered, although there are reasons for suspecting that his wife was responsible.² His body was found in the early morning of 23 Oct. 1764.

² See the article by L. de La Laurencie in S.I.M.G., VI, 250.

³ See Nicolas Slominsky, 'A Thing or Two About Music', pp. 86-90.

Owing to the merit of his compositions for the violin Leclair occupies a prominent place among the great classical masters of that instrument. As to his powers as a performer we have but the indirect evidence of the difficulties presented in his compositions. These are very considerable and, barring Locatelli's eccentricities, greater than any that we find in the works of his predecessors or contemporaries. He very freely employs, in fact not seldom writes whole movements in double-stops; and altogether, even according to the modern standard of technique, his music is exacting both for the left hand and the bow. In one instance he directs a note to be stopped with the left thumb. As a composer, judging him by his best works, Leclair must be accorded the first place among French writers for the violin. It has been justly remarked that a great deal of what he wrote is antiquated, but much remains that is truly charming. He is no mere imitator of the Italians, but there is a distinct individuality in many of his movements and also a definite national French element. On the whole, gracefulness and vivacity are more prominent than depth of feeling, his frequent employment of double-stops giving much richness of sound.

The two sonatas of his edited by Ferdinand David ('Hohe Schule des Violinspiels') are good examples of his higher powers, especially the pathetic one surnamed 'Le Tombeau'. On the other hand, a Saraband and Tambourin, often played with great success by Joachim and others, are good specimens of his lively style. This is a list of his works, as appended to his Op. 12:

Op.

1. Sonatas for vn. alone with a bass (1st book) (1723).
2. Sonatas (2nd book) (c. 1728). Another set is called 'opus 1' and published by Walsh.
3. Sonatas for two vns. without bass (1730) (c. 1732).
4. 'Sonates en trio' for 2 vns. & continuo (c. 1730).
5. Sonatas for vn. alone (3rd book) (1734).
6. 'Première Récréation de musique . . . pour deux violons et B.C.' (1737).
7. Six concertos (c. 1737).
8. 'Deuxième Récréation de musique . . . pour deux flûtes ou deux violons et B.C.' (c. 1737).
9. Sonatas (4th book) (1738).
10. Six concertos (2nd book) (c. 1743 or 1744).
11. 'Scylla et Glaucus' (musical tragedy) (1746).
12. Sonatas for 2 vns. without bass (2nd book) (c. 1747).
13. 'Ouvertures et sonates en trio', 2 vns. & continuo (1753).
14. Trio for 2 vns. & bass (1766), posthumous.
15. Sonatas for vn. & bass (1767), posthumous.

There is a portrait of him, by Alexis Loir, engraved by François (Lyons, 1741).

As a rule his works were engraved by his wife, whose name was Louise Roussel, and whom he married in 1730. A complete edition by Marc Pincherle was undertaken in 1953-54. See also Guignon (rivalry).

(2) Jean Marie Leclair, "le cadet" (b. Lyons, 23 Sept. 1703; d. Lyons, 30 Nov.

1777), brother of the preceding. He found his first employment as a violinist in the orchestra of the Academy of Besançon. In 1733 he returned to his native town, where he played a leading part in musical life as teacher, violinist and composer. The Lyons Academy performed two divertissements of his, 'Le Rhône et la Saône' in 1733 and 'Divertissement champêtre' in 1736. He also wrote motets, symphonies, etc. He published one book of sonatas for solo violin and one for two violins.

(3) Pierre Leclair (b. Lyons, 16 Nov. 1709; d. Lyons, 2 Apr. 1784), brother of the preceding. He published his Op. 1, six violin duets, in 1764; a second set is preserved in manuscript at Lyons.

LECOQC, (Alexandre) Charles (b. Paris, 3 June 1832; d. Paris, 24 Oct. 1918).

French composer. He entered the Paris Conservatoire in 1849 and in 1850 obtained the first prize for harmony and accompaniment. He took the second prize for fugue in Halévy's class in 1852. Towards the close of 1854 he left the Conservatoire.

Lecocq found the usual difficulty in obtaining access to the stage, and would probably have had to wait a long time but for a competition for an operetta opened by Offenbach in 1856. He was bracketed with Bizet, and 'Le Docteur Miracle' was produced at the Théâtre des Bouffes-Parisiens on 8 Apr. 1857. The operetta was evidently the work of a clever musician, who understood how to write for the voice. Notwithstanding this good beginning the small theatres still closed their doors to him, and Lecocq was driven to teaching for a livelihood. He then tried a different line, publishing, in conjunction with Besozzi, a collection of sacred songs for women's voices called 'La Chapelle au couvent' (1865) — less incongruous when we remember that he was a good organist; but the stage was irresistible, and after the failure of 'Huis clos' (1859), a little one-act piece, 'Le Baiser à la porte' (1864), was followed by 'Liline et Valentin' (1864), 'Les Ondines au champagne' (1866), 'Le Myosotis' (1866), 'Le Cabaret de Ramponneau' (1867) and 'Fleur de thé', three acts (1868).² This last piece was a brilliant success. Lecocq at last found himself established with the public and produced in rapid succession:

- 'L'Amour et son carquois', 2 acts (1868).
- 'Gandolfo', 1 act (1869).
- 'Le Rajah de Mysore', 1 act (1869).³
- 'Deux Portiers pour un cordon', 1 act (1869).
- 'Le Beau Dunois', 1 act (1870).⁴
- 'Le Barbier de Trouville', 1 act (1871).
- 'Le Testament de M. de Crac', 1 act (1871).
- 'Sauvons la caisse', 1 act (1871).
- 'Les Cent Vierges', 3 acts (Brussels, 1872).⁵
- 'La Fille de Mme Angot', 3 acts (Brussels, 4 Dec. 1872).⁶
- 'Les Prés Saint-Gervais', 3 acts.⁷
- 'Giroflé-Girofla', 3 acts (Brussels, 21 Mar. 1874).⁸
- 'Les Jumeaux de Bergame', 1 act (1868).
- 'Le Pompon', 3 acts (1875).
- 'La Petite Mariée', 3 acts (1875).⁹
- 'Kosiki', 3 acts (1876).
- 'La Marjolaine', 3 acts (1877).¹⁰
- 'Le Petit Duc', 3 acts (1878).¹¹
- 'Camargo', 3 acts (1878).
- 'La Jolie Persane' (1879).
- 'La Petite Mademoiselle', 3 acts (1879).¹²
- 'Le Grand Casimir' (1879).¹³
- 'Le Jour et la nuit' (1881).¹⁴
- 'Le Cœur et la main' (1882).
- 'La Princesse des Canaries' (1883).¹⁵
- 'L'Oiseau bleu' (1884).
- 'La Vie mondaine' (1885).

'La Fille de Mme Angot', the most enduring of all these, ran for 500 nights consecutively.

An attempt at a higher class of music, 'Plutus', produced at the Opéra-Comique on 31 Mar. 1886, failed and was withdrawn after eight performances; the earlier style was returned to in pianoforte accompaniment, orchestral music and compositions for various instruments, a Sonata for violin and pianoforte, 2 choruses. He arranged Rameau's 'Castor et Pollux' as a vocal score.

Lecocq realized that what the public really liked was light, gay, sparkling melodies. His style, not a very elevated one, made small demand on the poetry or the intellect of the composer; but it required tact, ease, freedom and, above all, animation. These qualities are conspicuous in Lecocq's operettas, which have become universally popular owing to the life, brio and easy gaiety which pervade them.

LE COUPPEY, Félix (b. Paris, 14 Apr. 1811; d. Paris, 5 July 1887).

French pianist and teacher. He was a pupil at the Paris Conservatoire, where, in his seventeenth year, he was an assistant teacher of harmony. In 1825 he obtained the 1st pianoforte prize and in 1828 that for harmony and accompaniment. In 1837 he became professor of solfège until 1843, when he succeeded his master, Douren, as teacher of harmony and accompaniment, a post he held until 1854. From 1854 to 1886 he was teacher of pianoforte. In this capacity he wrote many studies and similar things for his instrument. His work entitled 'Cours de piano' comprises 'A B C du piano'; 'L'Alphabet'; 'Le Progrès'; 'L'Agilité'; 'Le Style'; 'La Difficulté'. He also wrote 'École du mécanisme du piano'; 'L'Art du piano'; 'De l'enseignement du piano'; 'Conseils aux femmes professeurs' (1865). M. L. P.

LECUNA, Juan Vicente (b. Valencia, Venezuela, 20 Nov. 1899).

Venezuelan composer. After having studied at the Escuela Nacional de Música at Caracas, he continued his musical studies in New York and Baltimore. He was in the Venezuelan diplomatic service in Washington from 1936 to 1942. In 1939 he represented his country at the International Congress of Musicology in New York, and in 1941 in the International League of Composers, also in New York. In 1943 the Venezuelan government sent him to Brazil, Uruguay, Argentina and Chile to study the conditions of musical education in those countries.

Among his compositions there are an orchestral suite, 'El canto de la sangre'; 'Pieza' for pianoforte and orchestra; a string Quartet; a Sonata for harp; and many instrumental pieces and songs. N. F.

LECUONA, Ernesto (b. Guanabacoa, Cuba, 7 Aug. 1896).

Cuban composer. He studied the pianoforte and began to compose at an early age. He formed a rumba band which became extremely successful and wrote a great number of popular songs and pianoforte pieces in native rhythms. Particularly popular are his songs 'Siboney' and 'Malagueña'. Lecuona rarely ventured into the field of composition in larger forms; his 'Rapsodia negra' (1943) is a suite of dances inspired by Afro-Cuban folk music. N. S.

LEDGER LINES. See LEGER LINES.

LEDUC (Le Duc). French family of musicians and music publishers.

(1) Simon Leduc ("l'aîné") (b. Paris, 1748; d. Paris, Jan. 1787), violinist, composer and publisher. He was a pupil of Gaviniès and appeared as soloist in violin concertos at the Concert Spirituel in Paris up to 1763, and afterwards, on various occasions, almost up to the time of his death.

As a composer he published from 1768 onwards two books of sonatas, two books of duos for violins without bass, six trios for 2 violins and bass, three violin concertos, worthy of his master Gaviniès; also two 'Symphonies concertantes'.

His work as a publisher is not less important. At the end of 1767 he published not only his own works, but the German and Italian compositions of J. C. Bach, Haydn, Nardini and others. About 1775 he acquired the publishing business of Rouillé de La Chevardière.

(2) Pierre Leduc (b. Paris, 1755; d. Holland, 1816), violinist and publisher, brother of the preceding. He made a remarkable début as violinist at the Concert Spirituel in 1770. He followed his elder brother as publisher, succeeding in 1775 to the publisher Venier in the rue Saint-Thomas du Louvre and, after the death of Simon, carrying on his brother's business in 1804.

(3) Auguste Leduc (b. Paris, ?; d. Paris, ?), publisher, son of the preceding. He succeeded his father and published 'Les Principes de composition des écoles d'Italie' by A. Choron. His daughter married Zimmermann.

(4) Alphonse Leduc (b. Nantes, 9 Mar. 1804; d. Paris, 17 June 1868), publisher. His relationship to the preceding is uncertain, but he acquired the business from him in 1841.

(5) Alphonse Leduc (b. Paris, ?; d. Paris, 1892), son of the preceding. He took over the business on his father's death in 1868 and considerably developed it, devoting himself particularly to the publication of numerous educational works. He also founded a periodical, 'L'Art musical', which became extinct at his death. His career was exceptionally brilliant and fruitful. He married a daughter of the famous pianist Henri Ravina, who in 1835, at the age of seventeen, had been appointed pianoforte professor at the Paris Conservatoire, at a time when Zimmermann was Inspector of Studies.

(6) Alphonse Leduc (b. Paris, 14 Nov. 1878; d. Paris, 24 May 1951), publisher, son of the preceding. He succeeded to the business and twice became president of the Chambre Syndicale des Éditeurs de Musique. His two sons, Claude Alphonse and Gilbert Alphonse, became joint directors of the business with him in 1938. M. P., adds.

LEE, George Alexander (b. London, 1802; d. London, 8 Oct. 1851).

English composer. He started upon his musical career as a singer and conductor at Dublin in 1822 and in 1826 returned to London, where his first engagement was at the Haymarket Theatre. The following year he began to write for the stage, contributing incidental music to several plays at Covent Garden; the opera 'The Sublime and the Beautiful', was produced there in 1828, and another, 'The Nymph of the Grotto, or A Daughter's Vow', written in collaboration with Giovanni Liverati, in 1829. About this time Lee married Mrs. Waylett, a ballad singer of some repute, and together with his wife became involved in various managerial ventures, at the Tottenham Theatre, Drury Lane (1831-32) and the Strand Theatre (1834), all of short duration. He owned for some time a music shop in Frith Street, was later conductor at the Olympic Theatre and Vauxhall, and finally pianist at the 'Poses Plastiques' in Bow Street. Lee adapted two of Auber's operas for the English stage ('Fra Diavolo' as 'The Devil's Brother', Drury Lane, 1831, and 'Le Lac des fées' as 'The Fairy Lake', Strand Theatre, 1839) and wrote music for about 20 plays, burlettas, melodramas, etc. He also composed many songs and ballads, highly popular in their day ('Away, away to the mountain's brow', 'Come where the aspens quiver', 'The Macgregors' Gathering', etc.), and was the author of a 'Complete Course of Instruction in Singing'. LEE, Samuel (b. ?; d. Dublin, 21 Feb. 1776).

Irish violinist and musical director. Handel, during his visit to Dublin for the production of 'Messiah' in 1742, often visited his house and employed him as copyist. In 1751 he was appointed conductor of the City Music or Corporation Band, and in 1753 his salary was increased from £40 to £60 a year.¹ In the autumn of 1750 he opened a music shop at the Little Green, off Bolton Street, and printed much music, including 'Lee's Masque', a collection of Popular Songs, four in each number, "price a British sixpence each" (1753-56). In July 1751 he was one of the syndicate (the others being Signor Marella, Joseph de Bocck, Daniel Sullivan and Stephen Storace) which took a lease of Crow Street Music Hall for six years, at an annual rent of £113:15s. He led the band at Marlborough Green from 1752 to 1756 and in 1758 was appointed musical director of Crow Street Theatre. In 1768 he removed his music shop to No. 2 Dame Street, where he published a miscellaneous lot of music. Three years later he opened a coffee-house in Essex Street, which was largely patronized by theatrical folk.²

LEEDS. Music at Leeds is most satisfactorily discussed in two sections: first, the Triennial Musical Festival; then, existing or recently existing concert-giving societies.

MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—The first of these important meetings took place on 7-10 Sept. 1858 and formed part of the ceremony connected with the opening of the Town Hall by Queen Victoria. Sterndale Bennett was the conductor, and his 'May Queen' was the chief novelty of the festival. There were difficulties in the way of establishing the festival as a triennial event. The second did not take place until 1874, 14-17 Oct., when Costa conducted. At the third festival, 19-22 Sept. 1877, Costa was again the conductor, and Macfarren's 'Joseph' was the most important new work. From 1880 (13-16 Oct.) until 1898 inclusive, Sullivan was the conductor. In 1880 his 'Martyr of Antioch' and J. F. Barnett's 'Building of the Ship' were commissioned. 10-13 Oct. 1883 was the date of the fourth meeting. For 1886 (13-16 Oct.) Sullivan's 'Golden Legend', Stanford's 'Revenge', Mackenzie's 'Story of Sayid' and Dvořák's 'Saint Ludmila' were commissioned. In 1889 (9-12 Oct.) the new works included Parry's 'St. Cecilia's Day', Stanford's 'Voyage of Maeldune' and Corder's 'Sword of Argantyr'. In 1892 (5-8 Oct.) Alan Gray's 'Arethusa' and a Symphony by Frederick Cliffe were the novelties. Instead of the choirs being drawn only from Leeds, the influence was extended that year (and until 1898) by obtaining singers from different centres in the West Riding of Yorkshire, who were trained in their separate towns and met occasionally at Leeds for general rehearsals. (This plan was dropped in 1901, but was resumed in and since 1910.) In 1895 (2-5 Oct.) Parry's 'Invocation of Music' and in 1898 (5-8 Oct.), Sullivan's last festival, Stanford's 'Te Deum' and Elgar's 'Caractacus' were among the novelties, and the diapason normal pitch was employed for the first time.

For the festival of 1901 (9-12 Oct.) Stanford was appointed conductor and the programme was commemorative of the music of the 19th century. In 1904 (5-8 Oct.) he again conducted, and the new works were Mackenzie's 'Witch's Daughter', Walford Davies's 'Everyman', Stanford's 'Songs of the Sea', Charles Wood's 'Ballad of Dundee', Joseph Holbrooke's 'Queen Mab' and Stanford's violin Concerto (played by Kreisler).

At the festival of 1907 six new works by native composers were given, including Stanford's 'Stabat Mater', Somervell's 'Intimations of Immortality', Vaughan Williams's 'Toward the Unknown Region' and Bantock's 'Sea Wanderers'. In 1910, from which time onwards the chorus had sectional rehearsals at Leeds and Huddersfield, only two novelties were introduced, Vaughan Williams's 'Sea Symphony' and Stanford's 'Songs of the Fleet'. After this festival Stanford resigned the conductorship, and for the festival of 1913 (1-4 Oct.) Nikisch, Elgar and H. P. Allen shared the duties. The novelties were Elgar's 'Falstaff', Harty's 'Mystic Trumpeter', Butterworth's 'Shropshire Lad' and Basil Harwood's 'On a May Morning'. Preparations were being made for a festival in 1916, but the first world war intervened, and it was not till 1922 (4-7 Oct.) that the festivals were resumed, Albert Coates and H. P. Allen being the conductors. The only new work was Holst's 'Ode to Death'. For 1925 (7-10 Oct.) the same conductors were engaged, and the programme included Holst's 'Choral Symphony'.

At the festival of 1928 the conductors were Sir Thomas Beecham and Sir Hugh Allen. There was a rather dubious innovation in the absence of any new work, and the programme was mainly on familiar lines, Beethoven's great Mass being a central feature and Hubert Parry's 'Job' and Vaughan Williams's 'Pastoral Symphony' the chief representatives of British music. In 1931 Beecham and Sargent shared the conductorship. The programme made amends for the lack of enterprise shown in its immediate predecessor, for it included three new works by English composers: Walton's 'Belshazzar's Feast', Frederic Austin's 'Pervigium Veneris' and Eric Fogg's 'The Seasons'. The same conductors took part in the 1934 festival, and the new works were Cyril Scott's 'La Belle Dame sans merci' and Dyson's 'Blacksmiths'. In 1937 Beecham and Sargent were again the conductors, and the only absolute novelty was Walton's choral work, 'In Honour of the City of London', for Lennox Berkeley's 'Jonah' oratorio had been heard before on a semi-private occasion.

This festival presented a departure of some moment in that, while the London Philharmonic Orchestra was engaged as usual, the final concert was given with the co-operation of the local orchestra, which had, since the preceding festival, taken the name of the Northern Philharmonic Orchestra and was acquiring a wider reputation in the north of England. In another respect the festival marked a turn in its fortunes. Ever since the first world war its finances had been precarious, but on this occasion a lowering of the price of seats brought about a marked increase in the attendances and a widened interest in the event.

The second world war again interrupted the triennial course of the festival. Its resumption in 1947 met with financial success, though it was not considered advisable to contribute to musical history in the way of first performances. A number of the choral and orchestral works were at any rate new to the festival, which was conducted by Sir Malcolm Sargent and Sir John Barbirolli.

The festival of 1950 employed three orchestras: the Royal Philharmonic, the Hallé and the young Yorkshire Symphony, conducted by Beecham, Barbirolli and Maurice Miles. Comparative novelties on the programme were Benjamin Britten's 'Spring Symphony', a motet ('Morning Watch') by Edmund Rubbra and the sixth Symphony of Vaughan Williams. Honegger's 'King David', seldom heard since its first English performance over twenty years before, offered an example worth considering by choral societies.

THE LEEDS PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—This, the oldest existing Leeds concert organization, was founded in 1871. Its first conductor was James Broughton, who was succeeded in 1884 by his brother Alfred, both of whom were also chorus-masters of the Leeds Festivals. Adolf Beyschlag was conductor for two seasons, 1895-97, and then Stanford conducted the Society for eleven seasons, 1897-98 to 1908-9. For some years the Society had no official conductor, one being engaged for each concert, but in 1916 the old method was resumed, and Herbert Fricker, the Town Hall organist, was conductor for the season 1916-17. On his leaving for Canada, (Sir) Edward Bairstow, organist of York Minster, was appointed, and he occupied the position until near the time of his death. In 1896 the Leeds Subscription Concerts were run jointly with those of the Philharmonic, but this arrangement came to an end in 1909.

Among the more important events in the career of the Philharmonic may be mentioned the first performance at Leeds of Brahms's Requiem (1878) and Elgar's 'Dream of Gerontius'; visits to London in 1889 (Beethoven's ninth Symphony under Henschel), 1891, 1897 (ninth Symphony under Mottl) and many subsequent occasions, to sing important works, such as Beethoven's 'Missa solemnis' (under Richter), etc.

In 1906 the Society paid the first visit to Paris by an English society's choir, singing under Stanford's direction the Sanctus from Bach's B minor Mass, Beethoven's ninth Symphony, etc., and the visit was repeated in 1912, when the Requiem of Berlioz was given.

The musical policy of the society, established during the twenty-nine years of Bairstow's direction, has been a balanced selection of standard and reasonably modern works flanking the annual performance of 'Messiah', to which Bairstow brought special knowledge and a passion for perfection. For two and a half seasons after his death in 1946 the society sang under guest conductors until Sir Malcolm Sargent became conductor in 1949.

THE LEEDS CHORAL UNION.—This organization began operations on 26 Mar. 1896, with the first and only performance of Gounod's 'Redemption' ever given at Leeds. Alfred Benton, organist of the Leeds Parish Church, was the society's first conductor, and he was succeeded in 1905 by (Sir) Henry Coward. During this period the society introduced many choral works, paid special attention to Elgar's works and gave most of his choral compositions, in many cases for the first time at Leeds.

The Choral Union had an advantage of no little moment in being subsidized by an enthusiastic amateur, H. C. Embleton, through whose munificence the choir was taken far afield, several times to London, twice to Canterbury, to Germany in 1912 and to Paris in 1912 and 1924. On the second visit to Paris the choir was accompanied by the London Symphony Orchestra for a series of concerts, and the whole of the proceeds were given to French charities, without any deduction for expenses, all of which were borne by Mr. Embleton.

On the retirement of Sir Henry Coward in 1931 Norman Strafford became conductor. Mr. Embleton's death in 1930 deprived the Choral Union of generous financial support that had been forthcoming for many years, and on the outbreak of war the society was dissolved.

LEEDS CHORAL SOCIETY.—Another Leeds choir of high aims, originally styled the New Leeds Choral Society, as its members were drawn from what was then the newer part of Leeds, was founded by H. Matthias Turton, a Leeds organist, in 1902. On his departure to Canada the society was conducted by Dr. C. H. Moody, organist of Ripon Cathedral, who was succeeded by Herbert Bardgett in 1926. Under these two conductors the "New Choral" Society, as it came to be known, persevered in presenting Bach's Christmas Oratorio as a recognized alternative to 'Messiah' at Christmastide and maintained a high standard in general, until the outbreak of war made it impossible to continue. In 1944 the Society resumed activity under George Jefferson, and two years later, reconstituted as Leeds Choral Society, elected Norman Strafford conductor.

SATURDAY ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.—Perhaps the most influential agency for bringing the best music before the people of Leeds has been the orchestral concerts given on Saturday evenings. These had their origin in the Municipal Concerts, initiated by Fricker in the autumn of 1903. He adopted an orchestra which had been organized by some local professional musicians. It consisted at first of fifty professionals, a number afterwards increased to about sixty. It had no direct subsidy from public money, but since Fricker as conductor received no further remuneration than his stipend as Town Hall organist, and the concerts took the place of the customary Saturday organ recitals, there was no additional expense for hall, lighting, etc., and the small charges made for admission nearly sufficed to maintain the concerts. They were carried on for some years under these conditions, until the economists on the Council discovered that they involved an expenditure of something over £200 a year, and it was decided that this was more than Leeds could afford to expend on an institution whose object was merely artistic. They were thus reorganized by a committee under the title of the Leeds Saturday Orchestral Concerts. For a good many years these prospered artistically and financially, but in the season 1925-26 they, in common with nearly all Leeds concert enterprises, suffered from a lack of support which made their future less assured than it had seemed. When Fricker left Leeds for Toronto the conductorship came into various hands—Hamilton Harty, Eugene Goossens, Aylmer Buesst and Julius Harrison. The programmes consisted chiefly of favourite classics, and unfamiliar works were exceptional, but a high standard was maintained.

NORTHERN PHILHARMONIC ORCHESTRA.—From the orchestra engaged at these Saturday concerts was organized the Leeds Symphony Orchestra, which was made into a limited company in 1928 and consisted of 35 shareholders, all playing members. The orchestra was augmented according to requirements and averaged about 55 artists.

Thanks largely to the representations of a few influential friends, the Saturday Concerts secured from the Corporation a guarantee against loss. In the season 1933-34 the orchestra had the good fortune to engage (Sir) John Barbirolli as conductor, and the increased efficiency in their performance soon resulted in a corresponding increase in the number of subscribers, an addition to the number of Saturday concerts each season, the accumulation of a healthy reserve fund and the subsequent invitation to take part in the Leeds Festival of 1937. Two years before this the orchestra's name was changed to the Northern Philharmonic Orchestra, in recognition of the widened scope of its activities. Barbirolli's New York engagement cut short his work at Leeds, and the conductorship again came into various hands after 1936, with a short spell of permanence between 1942 and 1945, when Heinz Unger conducted.

In addition to Saturday concerts, the Northern Philharmonic has for many years collaborated with some of the principal choral societies in the North of England, in the adequate presentation of modern as well as standard works, with obviously better results than obtained with the "scratch" orchestras of limited experience on which choral concerts had formerly to rely.

The founding of the Yorkshire Symphony Orchestra has naturally restricted the activities of the older orchestra at Leeds itself, but there is still scope for the Northern Philharmonic in the wider area indicated, where their experience in accompanying choral music is appreciated.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.—Leeds University took over the work of the Leeds Bohemian Concerts, an earlier string-quartet association, to give a series of five concerts each season, for which the best quartet parties were engaged. The programmes, while relying on established classics, have taken advantage of the appeal of such works in doing steady justice to the claims of more modern music. Another body, the Leeds Concert Society, was founded in 1938 with similar objects in view, and after the first shock of war instituted a series of summer-time chamber concerts (avoiding the hours of black-out) which continued throughout the war and until 1948. After one more season in 1950, faced by the increased cost of engaging artists and the resumption of normal musical activities in the University, this Society wound up its affairs.

AMATEUR ORGANIZATIONS.—If the cultivation of music by non-professional performers is a sign of healthy musical life, Leeds can claim to flourish to the extent of more choral societies than have been mentioned above, and a few amateur orchestras, one of which, the Leeds Symphony Society, was founded in 1890, and has proved a training-ground for players in professional bodies. Less known to the public is the Leeds Music Club, now (1954) in its twenty-fourth consecutive year, and believed to be unique in that its members themselves provide the music they listen to, the programmes observing a fair balance between solos, chamber music and small choral items with or without orchestra.

LEEUEWEN BOOMKAMP, Carel van (b. Borculo, Holland, 11 Aug. 1906).

Dutch violoncellist and gambist. After taking lessons from a local teacher (E. D. Ferree) he, at the age of fifteen, came into contact with Gerard Hekking, who advised him to take up the study of music professionally. The following year he was granted a State subsidy, which enabled him to study for three years in Paris under Hekking. From 1925 to 1930 he acted as solo cellist, first with the Haarlem Orchestra and then with the Concertgebouw Orchestra in Amsterdam. Since then he has devoted himself entirely to solo playing, chamber music and teaching, and in 1932 he made a long tour of the Netherlands East Indies. He has also played in many European cities and in 1936 became a member of the Budapest Trio. For the performance of some of Bach's music he reintroduced the violoncello piccolo, being the first to play it in Holland so far as can be ascertained. In later years he has made a great speciality of the viola da gamba, on which he is not only a virtuoso but an artist of fine feeling and capacity. With this he was an original member of Musica Antiqua. In 1947 he issued a book on 'De Klanksfeer der Oude Muziek' ('The Sound Sphere of Ancient Music'), which won high praise alike from musicians and musicologists.

LEEVEES, William (b. London, 11 June 1748; d. Wroughton, Somerset, 28 May 1828).

English violoncellist and composer. He entered the first regiment of Foot-Guards in 1769 and was promoted lieutenant in 1772. After taking holy orders he was appointed in 1779 rector of Wroughton, the birthplace of John Locke, the philosopher, and the home of Hannah More. He was a good cellist and composed much sacred music, but will be remembered only as the author of the air of 'Auld Robin Gray', supposed to have been composed by him in 1772 (autograph in the B.M. Add. MSS 29,387), published by Exsham of Dublin in 1781 and by Corri & Sutherland in 1783. This is now regarded as of doubtful authenticity.¹

LE FEBURE, JEAN (b. ?; d. ?).

French 17th-century composer. He was Kapellmeister to Cardinal Andreas of Austria at Constance in 1596-1600 and Kapellmeister at Mainz Cathedral in 1600-7. He composed a book of madrigals, also motets, hymns and other church music. E. v. d. s.

LEFEBURE-WÉLY, Louis (James Alfred) (b. Paris, 13 Nov. 1817; d. Paris, 31 Dec. 1869).

French organist and composer. His father was the organist and composer Antoine Lefèvre, who took the name of Lefebure-Wély and died in 1831. As a child he showed a precocious talent for the organ, and when his father died he was appointed, at the age of fifteen, to be organist at Saint-Roch in his father's place. He entered the Paris Conservatoire in 1832 and gained the first prize for pianoforte and organ in 1835. His compositions for the organ enjoyed some popularity in England in his day, but their musical value is small. He was decorated by the Legion of Honour in 1850, being at the time organist of the Madeleine, where he was in 1847-58. After this he had for some time no regular post, but in 1863 accepted the organ of Saint-Sulpice, so long held by his friend and master Séjan. Here he remained until he died from consumption. G. LEFÉBURE, Yvonne (Élise) (b. Ermont, Seine-et-Oise, ?).

French pianist. At the age of nine she won a gold medal in a music competition organized by the journal 'Comœdia', and then entered the Paris Conservatoire, where she studied under Alfred Cortot and won numerous prizes, including, at the age of thirteen, the first prize for pianoforte. She was still very young when she made her first appearances with the symphonic orchestras of Paris. She has also played in Athens, Amsterdam (1935), Berlin, Salzburg and in London at the Queen's Hall during a visit of the Colonne Orchestra in 1937. In 1938 she played in Bucharest and was decorated by King Carol of Rumania. In 1948 she visited the U.S.A. and later she again toured in Germany, Switzerland and England, and played at the Prades Festival under the direction of Casals.

Since 1924 Yvonne Lefebure has been professor of the pianoforte at the École Normale de Musique, and she has also contributed articles to numerous musical periodicals. She visits London frequently to give courses of pianoforte playing and to broadcast. A. H. (ii).

LEFEBVRE, Charles Édouard (b. Paris, 19 June 1843; d. Paris, 8 Sept. 1917).

French composer. He was a pupil at the Paris Conservatoire, where he gained the first Prix de Rome with his cantata 'Le Jugement de Dieu'. In 1884 he obtained the Prix Chartier for his concerted compositions and in 1895 he succeeded Benjamin Godard as professor of the instrumental ensemble class in the Conservatoire.

Lefebvre was a sincere composer who did delicate work in many forms. For the stage he wrote 'Lucrèce', three-act opera, not performed; 'Le Trésor', one-act opéra-comique (Angers, 1883); 'Zaire', four-act opera (Lille, 1887); 'Djelma', three-act opera (Paris, Opéra, 25 May 1894); 'Singoalla', three-act opera, unperformed.

His church music includes a setting of Psalm XXIII and some motets. His 'Judith', of which portions had been given at concerts of the Conservatoire, was brought out as a whole at the Padeloup Concerts in 1879, being later heard in many other French towns, as well as in Belgium and Germany. An 'Ouverture dramatique' was played at the Colonne concerts; and 'Dalila', orchestral scenes, and a Symphony in D major are important works for orchestra. Other works worth mentioning are 'Éloa', a poème lyrique; 'Melka', a "legend" given at the Lamoureux concerts; 'Sainte Cécile', for solo voices, chorus and orchestra (Concerts de l'Opéra, 1896); 'La Messe du fantôme', for voice and orchestra (Colonne concerts); a Serenade, an Overture, 'Toggenburg' (Colonne concerts, 1904); sonatas, trios, quartets, suites, etc., for various instruments, a Suite for wind instruments, etc.

LEFEBVRE, Joseph¹ (b. Berlin, 20 July 1761; d. Paris, after 1822).

French composer. He was a brother of Louise Rosalie Dugazon and entered the orchestra of the Paris Comédie-Italienne in May 1790. In 1801 he became conductor of the united theatres Favart and Feydeau (the Opéra-Comique), a post he retained until 1822. Lefebvre wrote the music of two comic operas for the Comédie-Italienne, 'L'Embaras du choix' (10 Dec. 1788) and 'Caroline de Lichtfield [Lichfield]' (2 Dec. 1789), of which single songs were published. A. L.

LEFELD, Jerzy (b. Warsaw, 17 Jan. 1898).

Polish pianist and composer. He studied composition with R. Świąkowski and pianoforte with A. Michałowski at the Warsaw Conservatory, where later he became teacher of the pianoforte class. He is highly esteemed by his countrymen, but his fame is not due so much to his compositions, which are strictly academic in form and fairly conservative (symphonies), or to his pedagogic activities, although he educated many young Polish pianists, as to his activities as an accompanist. In this capacity he has been appearing frequently on the concert platform with the best vocalists and instrumentalists.

Lefeld's works include 2 symphonies (1915-1917 and 1921), a string Sextet (1918), published by P.W.M., and numerous pianoforte pieces. C. R. H.

LEFÈVRE, Jean (Xavier) (b. Lausanne, 6 Mar. 1763; d. Paris, 9 Nov. 1829).

Swiss clarinettist and composer. He was a pupil of Michel Yost in Paris and for many years a member of the Opéra orchestra there. From 1795 to 1825 he was professor of the clarinet at the Conservatoire and from 1807 member of the imperial (afterwards royal) chapel. He composed concertos, sonatas, trios, duets, etc., for his instrument, to which he added a sixth key. He also wrote the official clarinet tutor for the Conservatoire, which appeared in 1802, also in a German edition, and was translated into Italian.

LEFFLER, Adam (b. London, 1808; d. London, 28 Mar. 1857).

English bass singer. He was the son of James Henry Leffler, a bassoon player and organist of St. Katherine's Hospital by the Tower of London, the German Lutheran church in the Savoy and Streatham Chapel, and who died suddenly in the street in 1819. Adam was soon after his father's death admitted a chorister of Westminster Abbey. On attaining manhood he was endowed with a bass voice of exceptionally fine quality and extensive compass — E to g' — and a natural gift for singing. He first attracted notice in Oct. 1829 at a festival at Exeter, where the casual absence of another performer gave him the opportunity of appearing as a principal singer. He acquitted himself so satisfactorily that he was immediately appointed a deputy at Westminster Abbey. He afterwards took and maintained a good position on the English operatic stage and in the concert-room. W. H. H.

LE FLEM, Paul (b. Lézardrieux, Côtes-du-Nord, 18 Mar. 1881).

French critic and composer. After solid classical studies in Paris (he is licencié en philosophie) he completed his study of harmony with Lavignac, of counterpoint with Ganaye and Roussel, and of composition with Vincent d'Indy. He became teacher of counterpoint at the Schola Cantorum.

He has written some chamber music (Sonata for violin and pianoforte, Quintet, etc.) and various works intended for the pianoforte, for voice and for chorus. His most extensive works are 'Aucassin et Nicolette', a chantefable in 3 parts with a prologue, a Symphony, a 'Triptyque symphonique' and a 'Fantaisie' for pianoforte and orchestra.

Le Flem was chorus master at the Opéra-Comique and became head of the Chanteurs de Saint-Gervais. He brought this celebrated choir to a very high artistic level.

In 1928 his Symphony in A major was played in its entirety for the first time, twenty-two years after its composition. In 1936 Le Flem composed a mimodrame dansé based on 'Macbeth', in 1937 a 'Fête de printemps' for orchestra, in 1938 'Le Rossignol de Saint-Malo', a tragi-comic fantasy in one act, libretto by Gandrey-Réty (produced Paris, Opéra-Comique, 1942), and incidental music for 'Les Paralytiques volent'.

As a critic Le Flem was much appreciated for his articles in 'Comœdia'. M. P.

LE FLEMING, Christopher (Kaye) (b. Wimborne, 26 Feb. 1908).

English composer. He had a mainly private education and owing to defective eyesight in his early years was forbidden to receive a full professional musical training. He is thus almost wholly self-taught as a composer, but studied for a time at the Brighton School of Music and learnt the pianoforte under George Reeves. He did some work as a pianist, teacher and lecturer early in his career, and in 1943 became Director of Music at St. Mary's School, Calne, and Director of the Wiltshire Rural Music School. In 1945 he was appointed Assistant Director of the Rural Music Schools Association and the following year editor of 'Making Music'.

Le Fleming's works include:

CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

- 'The Singing Friar', with tenor solo.
- 5 Psalms, with soprano solo.

LE FRANC, Guillaume¹ (b. Rouen, ?; d. Lausanne, June 1570).

poser. He was the son of Pierre Le Franc of Rouen and probably one of the French Protestants who fled to Geneva for an asylum from the persecution to which those who embraced the doctrines of the Reformation were then exposed. He settled in that city in 1541, shortly before the return of Calvin from Strasbourg, and obtained a licence to establish a school of music. In 1542 he became master of the children and a singer at St. Peter's at a salary of 10 florins. In 1543 the Council of Geneva resolved that whereas the Psalms of David are being completed¹, and whereas it is very necessary to compose a pleasing melody to them, and Master Guillaume the singer is very fit to teach the children, he shall give them instruction for an hour daily.

His pay was increased from 10 to 50 florins, and afterwards raised to 100, with the use of part of a house; but on the refusal of the council to grant a further addition to his salary Le Franc left Geneva in 1545 and joined the choir of the Cathedral of Lausanne, where he remained until his death.

Le Franc's name is chiefly known in connection with the Psalter published at Geneva by Calvin for the use of the reformed churches. The first edition of this celebrated work appeared in 1542, containing 35 psalms, and was enlarged from time to time until its completion in 1562. Of this Psalter Le Franc has been generally believed to be the musical editor; but later researches show the claim set up for him to be devoid of foundation and the credit to belong to Louis Bourgeois. He certainly had nothing to do with the Psalter after leaving Geneva in 1545, and although the resolution of the council quoted above may appear to indicate an intention of employing him to adapt melodies to some of the psalms then newly translated by Marot, there is no evidence that this intention was ever carried into effect.

Le Franc, however, did edit a psalter. The church of Lausanne had on several occasions shown a spirit of independence of that of Geneva and at the time of Le Franc's arrival sang the psalms to melodies by Gindron, a canon of the cathedral, which differed from those in use at Geneva. As early as 1552 Le Franc appears to have been engaged on a new psalter, for in that year he obtained a licence to print one at Geneva, there being then no press at Lausanne. No copy of this book, if it was ever published, is known to exist, but the terms of the licence² show that it consisted

² This important document, discovered in the registers of the Council of Geneva, deserves to be quoted in full:

Jeudi 28 juillet 1552.

... Sur ce qui le dit maître Jacques, ministre de Lausanne, a proposé que à Lausanne ilz ne se sont peult estre d'accord de chanter les pseaulmes changés icy par maistre Loys Bourgeois, ny ceulx qu'il a myst en of the psalms of Marot with their original melodies, and the 34 psalms translated by de Bèze the year before, to which Le Franc, probably in rivalry with Bourgeois, had adapted melodies of his own. At any rate, in 1565, three years after the completion of the Genevan Psalter, that of Lausanne appeared, under the following title:

Les Pseaumes mis en rime françois par Clement Marot et Theodore de Bèze, avec le chant de l'église de Lausane [sic] 1565. Avec priuilege, tant du Roy, que de Messieurs de Geneue.

In the preface Le Franc disclaims any idea of competition with those "who had executed their work with great fidelity", or even of correcting "what had been so well done by them". He gives no intimation that he had himself taken any part in that work and states with respect to his own book that, in addition to a selection of the best tunes then in use in the church of Lausanne as well as in other reformed churches, he had supplied new ones to such of the psalms, then recently translated, as had not yet been set to music and were consequently sung to the melodies of psalms in the older editions of the psalter. He adds that his object was that each psalm should have its proper tune, and confusion be thereby avoided.

Stress has been laid by some writers who attributed the Genevan melodies to Le Franc, on a letter written to Bayle by David Constant, professor of theology at Lausanne at the end of the 17th century, in which he states that he had seen a certificate bearing the date of 2 Nov. 1552, and given by de Bèze to Le Franc, in which de Bèze testifies that it was Le Franc who had first set the psalms to music. Constant adds that he himself possessed a copy of the psalms in which the name of Le Franc appeared and which was printed at Geneva under the licence of the magistrates of that city. Baulacre, however, writing in 1745 in the 'Journal Helvétique', after investigating the accuracy of Constant's statement, shows that the account he sent to Bayle of de Bèze's letter was erroneous, as that letter contained no reference to the authorship of the melodies. Even had it done so, we have seen above that in that very year Le Franc had obtained a licence to print a collection of psalms for Lausanne, and the psalter to which Constant refers is that of 1565, also compiled for local use.

In this latter collection 27 melodies are composed or adapted by Le Franc to the psalms left without them in the Genevan chans du sieur de Beze, ilz sont en propos de faire imprimer les pseaulmes translatez par Marot en leur premier chant, et aussy ceulx qu'a translaté le sieur de Beze, en vng chant que y a mis le chantrre de Lausanne pour les chanter, ce qu'ilz n'hont ausé faire sans licence. Pourquoy il a requis permettre les imprimer icy. Arrêté que, attendu que c'est chose raisonnable, il leur soit permys.

Psalter of 1562 (LI¹, LIII, LXII, LXIII, LXIV, LXV, LXVI, LXVII, LXVIII, LXX, LXXI, LXXVI, LXXVII, LXXVIII, LXXXII, XCV, XCVIII, C, CVIII, CIX, CXI, CXVI, CXXVII¹, CXXXIX, CXL, CXLII and CXLIV), 19 are selected from the tunes previously in use at Lausanne, and the rest are taken from the Genevan Psalter.

Before long, however, Lausanne followed the example of the other reformed churches, and the Psalter of Le Franc was superseded by that of Bourgeois.

Le Franc's tunes, if they are his, are of small merit. Some specimens of them are given by Douen.

LEGATO (Ital., sometimes ligato; Fr. lié; Ger. gebunden). A term meaning "connected" or "tied" and indicating the performance of a musical phrase without any perceptible hiatus between the ending of one note and the beginning of the next.

A legato style of singing or playing is presumed in the notation of music unless indications to the contrary (e.g. staccato) are given. There are, however, physical limits to the possibility of maintaining the legato in singing and in playing wind instruments supplied by the lungs of the player, due to the necessity for taking breath, though in both these cases the ability to take breath with as little interruption as possible of the tone is a first essential of technique. Similarly in the case of the bowed strings the change of direction of the bow implies a partial interruption of the legato; hence the necessity for the slur to indicate where the legato may be broken induced its use as an indication of the legato itself.

On keyboard instruments the legato can be maintained indefinitely, and slurs therefore are required only for the sake of phrasing.

Occasionally the word legato is written at the beginning of a movement or passage as a special warning. The use of the superlative, legatissimo, has no real meaning. It merely indicates the extreme desire of the composer for the maintenance of the legato style.

LEGER (Ledger) LINES (Fr. lignes postiches, supplémentaires; Ger. Hilfslinien, Nebenlinien; Ital. linea d'aiuto). The short lines drawn above and below the stave for those notes which exceed its limits.

The origin of the term is not known. It is proposed to derive it from the French léger, light, or from the Latin legere, to read, or as if it were equivalent to layer — additional lines laid on above or below; but none of these is quite satisfactory. The term came into use in the year 1700. (See C. J. Evans, Mus.T., June 1879, and the Oxford Dictionary, s.v.). The analogous use of the word ledger, as "a horizontal timber in a scaffolding, lying parallel to the face of the building", is interesting. C.

responsibility for its musical policy two years later, when Joseph Bennett retired. He chose to exert his influence rather as editor than as critic, until his retirement in 1931. A man of wide interests and generous enthusiasms, Legge was exactly fitted to sweep away the repressive style of dogmatic criticism to which Bennett had clung, and through the "Music Page" of the 'Daily Telegraph' he stimulated the general reader's interest in music and musicians to an uncommon extent. His active pen was often exercised in many directions outside daily journalism. H. C. C.

LEggerMENTE (Ital. = lightly; not leggeramente or leggieramente).

LEggerO (Ital. = light; not leggiero). This adjective, or its adverb entered above, is usually applied to a rapid passage. In piano-forte playing it indicates an absence of pressure, the keys being struck with only sufficient force to produce the sound.

Leggero passages are usually, though not invariably, piano, and they may be either legato or staccato; if the former, the fingers must move very freely and strike the keys with enough percussion to ensure distinctness, but with the slightest possible amount of force. Examples of legato passages marked leggeramente (sic) are found in the twenty-fifth variation of Beethoven's Op. 120 and in the finale of Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor (which also contains the unusual combination of forte with leggero), and of staccato single notes and chords in the finale of Mendelssohn's Concerto in D minor.

On stringed instruments leggero passages are as a rule played by diminishing the pressure of the bow upon the strings, but the word generally refers rather to the character of the movement than to any particular manner of bowing. The scherzo of Beethoven's Quartet in E♭ major, Op. 74, is marked leggeramente, although it begins forte, and the same indication is given for the second variation of the andante in the "Kreutzer" Sonata, which is piano throughout; but the fact that Beethoven used the term in this form does not prove its being good Italian. LEGRANT, Guillaume (Gran Guielmo) (b. ?; d. ?).

French (?) 14th-15th-century composer. Two settings of parts of the ordinarium missae are preserved at Oxford, Bodl. Can. misc. 213, and Bologna, Liceo musicale 37; one of them is dated 1426. Both are published by van den Borren. Three chansons, preserved at Oxford, partly published by Dannemann, are set note against note in a simple common-time rhythm. They show an unusual amount of accidentals. The ordinarium missae settings make use of alternating choirs, a practice that was later on to become very popular in Italy, where, as his Italian nickname suggests, Legrant may have lived. E. D. LEGRENZI, Giovanni (b. Clusone nr. Bergamo, [bapt. 12 Aug.] 1626; d. Venice, 26 May 1690).

Italian composer. He was the son and pupil of Giovanni Maria Legrenzi, a musician, and received his first appointment as organist to the church of Santa Maria Maggiore at Bergamo. He next became maestro di cappella of the church of the Spirito Santo at Ferrara, where he still was in 1664. When Krieger, Kapellmeister to the Duke of Weissenfels, visited Venice in 1672, he found Legrenzi settled there as director of the Conservatorio dei Mendicanti. In 1681 he became vice-maestro and on 23 Apr. 1685 maestro di cappella of St. Mark's, exercising both functions till his death. He entirely reorganized the orchestra of St. Mark's, augmenting it to 34 performers: 8 violins, 11 violette, 2 viole da braccio, 2 viole da gamba, 1 violone, 4 theorbos, 2 cornetts, 1 bassoon and 3 trombones. He composed industriously and left specimens of his skill in most departments of music — church sonatas (1654, 1655, 1663 and 1677), motets (1655, 1660, 1670, 1692), masses, psalms (1657, 1667), 6 oratorios, instrumental music of various kinds and 17 operas. In his Op. 2, 'Suonate a 2 e 3', a work by his father is included.

The most remarkable of the operas are 'Achille in Sciro', his first (1664), 'Zenobia e Radamisto' (1665), 'La divisione del mondo' (1675), 'Eteocle e Polinice' (1675), 'Germanico sul Reno' (1676), 'Totila' (1677), 'I due Cesari' (1683), mentioned in the Paris 'Mercure galant' (Mar. 1683), 'Giustino' (1683) and 'Pertinace' (1684), his last. They were nearly all produced at Venice. Like Scarlatti and other composers of his time Legrenzi did not attempt to banish the comic element from his serious operas. One of his orchestral compositions is in seven real parts, and all are important. His best pupils were Lotti, Gasparini, Pollaro and Caldara.

Legrenzi's name has been handed down to posterity by Bach and Handel, both of whom treated subjects from his works, the former in an organ Fugue in C minor on a "Thema Legrenzianum elaboratum cum subjecto pedaliter" ¹ (B.-G. XXXVIII. 94), the latter in the phrase "To thy dark servant light and life afford" in the chorus "O first-created beam" in 'Samson'; this is taken from a motet of Legrenzi's — 'Intret in conspectu' ², of which a copy in Handel's handwriting is to be found among the manuscripts of the Royal Library now at the B.M. LEGROS, Joseph (b. Monampteuil nr. Laon, 7 Sept. 1730; d. La Rochelle, 20 Dec. 1793).

French tenor singer and composer. He made his début at the Paris Opéra on 1 Mar. 1764 as Titon in a revival of Mondonville's 'Titon et l'Aurore' and continued to sing there with great success until 1783, creating many first tenor parts in operas by Monsigny ('Aline'), Philidor ('Ernelinde'), Piccinni, Grétry, Gossec, Sacchini, etc., and four Gluck parts, Achilles in 'Iphigénie en Aulide' and the hero in the French 'Orphée' in 1774, Admetus in the French 'Alceste' in 1776 and Pylades in 'Iphigénie en Tauride' in 1779. In 1777 Legros succeeded Gossec and Gaviniès as director of the Concert Spirituel, remaining in this post until 1791, when the Concert came to an end; he then retired to La Rochelle.

As a composer Legros made himself known by some songs and by two operas, 'Hylas et Églé' (in collaboration with Desormery, Paris, Opéra, 16 Feb. 1775) and 'Anacréon' (at the palace of the Comte de Provence, Brunoi, 1782).

LEHÁR, Franz (b. Komárom, 30 Apr. 1870; d. Ischl, 24 Oct. 1948).

Hungarian composer. He studied at the Prague Conservatory and began his career as a conductor of military bands at Losonc, Pola, Trieste, Budapest and Vienna (1894-99). To that period belongs his opera 'Kukuška', produced at Leipzig in 1896 and at Budapest in 1899 (revised 1905 as 'Tatjana' and given at Brno, Vienna, etc.). Lehár turned to operetta in 1902 with 'Wiener Frauen', and more than 30 such works for the stage followed. Nearly all of them were first produced in Vienna, and many of them became famous all over the world. His greatest success was 'Die lustige Witwe' (Vienna, Theater an der Wien, 28 Dec. 1905; Daly's Theatre, London, as 'The Merry Widow', 8 June 1907). The following is a list of those of Lehár's operettas which were also produced in London or New York (London being understood where the name of a theatre alone is given):

LE HEURTEUR, Guillaume (b. ?; d. ?).

French 16th-century composer. He was a canon in the church of Saint-Martin at Tours. His works appeared chiefly in Attaignant's collections between 1530 and 1543, among them four masses, which Ambros ranks with those of Sermisy, a few Magnificats and motets, and a number of chansons. Two of the chansons are given in Eitner's Selection of Chansons (1899), Nos. 28, 29. Fétis mentions some independent works by Le Heurteur, which, however, Eitner was unable to verify.

J. R. M.

LEHMANN, Lilli (b. Würzburg, 24 Nov. 1848; d. Berlin, 17 May 1929).

German soprano singer. She was taught singing by her mother, Marie Lehmann, formerly prima donna at Cassel under Spohr and the original heroine of some of his operas. The daughter made her début in Prague as the First Boy ('Zauberflöte'), and was engaged successively at Danzig in 1868 and at Leipzig in 1870. She made her début in Berlin as Vielka (Meyerbeer's 'Feldlager in Schlesien') on 19 Aug. 1870, with such success that she was engaged there as a light soprano, remaining till 1885. In 1876 she played Woglinde and Helmwige and sang the Bird-music in the first production of Wagner's 'Ring' at Bayreuth. In that year she was appointed imperial chamber singer.

In London Lilli Lehmann made a successful début at Her Majesty's Theatre as Violetta ('Traviata') on 3 June, as Philine ('Mignon') on 15 June 1880, and sang there for two seasons. She took part, as one of the Rhine maidens, in the first performance in England of 'The Ring', at Her Majesty's Theatre in 1882. The development of her voice from a light to a dramatic soprano followed closely on the growth of her power as a tragic artist. She appeared at Covent Garden in German opera with great success as Isolde on 2 July 1884. In passing through London to the U.S.A. she gave a concert with Franz Rummel at the Steinway Hall on 22 Oct. 1885. From 1885 to 1890 she sang in German opera in America, but she returned to London in June 1887, singing three times in Italian as Fidelio at Her Majesty's, to the Florestan of her husband, Kalisch. In 1890 she returned to Germany, singing both in opera and concerts. In 1899 she reappeared at Covent Garden as Fidelio, Sieglinde, Norma, Isolde, Ortrud and Donna Anna, and won warm appreciation. She also sang in Paris at the Lamoureux concerts and appeared at the Nouveau Théâtre as Donna Anna in 1903.

An accomplished musician and actress as well as a magnificent singer, all styles came alike to Lilli Lehmann. Apart from her striking Wagnerian impersonations, her Fidelio was the finest seen in England since the death of Tietjens. After an active stage career of nearly thirty-five years she settled down as a teacher in the Berlin suburb of Grunewald, and there, in Oct. 1900, she completed her celebrated book on singing, 'Meine Gesangkunst', which was ably translated into English by Richard Aldrich and published three years later in New York. Under the title of 'How to Sing' it met with great success and it remains an enduring record of sound scientific methods, intelligent observation and practical experience, marred only by some superfluity of physiological illustration and detail.

LEHMANN, Liza (Elizabeth Nina Mary Frederika) (b. London, 11 July 1862; d. Pinner, Middlesex, 19 Sept. 1918).

English soprano singer and composer of German descent. She was the daughter of Rudolf Lehmann, the painter, by his wife Amelia, daughter of Robert Chambers of Edinburgh, author and publisher. She was first taught singing by her mother, a highly cultivated amateur and well known in the musical world both as a composer and arranger of old classical songs under the initials "A. L.". Later she studied singing with Randegger and composition with Ravnkilde in Rome, Freudenberg at Wiesbaden and Hamish MacCunn in London. On 23 Nov. 1885 she made her début at the Monday Popular Concerts with great success, and she was a favourite at these concerts during the nine years she remained in the vocal profession. She appeared at all the chief concerts in the kingdom, receiving especial encouragement from Clara Schumann and Joachim. On 15 Mar. 1888, at the Philharmonic, Clara Schumann accompanied her in Schumann's 'Nussbaum' and 'Frühlingsnacht'. On 14 July 1894 Liza Lehmann gave a farewell concert at St. James's Hall, previous to retiring from the vocal profession on her marriage to the miniature painter and composer Herbert Bedford in Oct. of the same year. Her voice — a light soprano, with an extensive compass from a to b", and of a carrying nature — was perfectly produced.

On her retirement Liza Lehmann devoted herself to composition with conspicuous success. In 1896 her song cycle 'In a Persian Garden', the words taken from FitzGerald's version of the Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám, was introduced in private at a concert in the house of Mrs. E. L. Goetz, by Emma Albani, Hilda Wilson, Ben Davies and David Bispham. It was afterwards produced publicly at the Monday Popular Concerts and elsewhere, being received with remarkable enthusiasm, both in England and the U.S.A.

By this and other song cycles, 'In Memoriam' (from Tennyson), 'The Daisy-Chain', 'More Daisies', 'Songs of Love and Spring', etc., Liza Lehmann may be said to have established a vogue for song cycles in England. She was the first woman to be commissioned to undertake the composition of a musical comedy, 'Sergeant Brue' (book by Owen Hall), produced at the Strand Theatre, 14 June 1904, transferred to the Prince of Wales's Theatre and later returning to the Strand. Her larger productions for the theatre were 'The Vicar of Wakefield', a romantic light opera based on Goldsmith (1906) and a stage setting of the morality play 'Everyman', produced by Beecham in Feb. 1916. She also wrote incidental music for plays, ballads for voice and orchestra and many songs and piano-forte pieces, several of which gained considerable popularity. A. C.

LEHMANN, Lotte (b. Perleberg, Brandenburg, 2 July 1885).

American soprano singer of German birth. She was taught singing in Berlin by Mathilde Mallinger, who had been the first Eva in 'Die Meistersinger' at Munich in 1868. Having obtained her first engagement at the Hamburg Opera in 1909, she moved in 1916 to Vienna and became one of the most eminent lyric-dramatic sopranos of her time. In 1913 she first sang in London, at Drury Lane Theatre, as Sophie in 'Der Rosenkavalier', but her brilliant career in England dates properly from her appearance at Covent Garden in 1924 as the Marschallin in the same work. It was a part she had never sung before, but she was to become particularly associated with it.

Lotte Lehmann married a Viennese, Otto Krause. In 1934, after a difference of opinion with Hitler, she severed her ties with Germany. In 1938 she took steps to obtain United States citizenship. As a girl she had had literary aspirations, and these she was not altogether to renounce; she has published verses, a novel and an autobiography ('Anfang und Aufstieg', Vienna, 1937; English version, under the title 'Wings of Song', London, 1938).

Though a Prussian by birth, Lotte Lehmann came to represent to the world the traditional Viennese qualities of charm, breeding and warm-heartedness. The vivid personality expressed by her voice was sometimes felt to overpower her characterizations; and while no one in her time sang Sieglinde more beautifully, a certain assurance of ingratiating inseparability from her art introduced into Hunding's hut a note not purely primeval. She succeeded, however, in spite of an utterance that could not have been more feminine, in becoming a pre-eminently famous Leonora in 'Fidelio'. She first sang that part at the Beethoven Festival in Vienna (1927) under Franz Schalk.

Lotte Lehmann's voice was lovely, and generous enough in volume to carry fully formed words across a large space; and along with her rich vocal gift went a rare theatric power of establishing herself from the first phrase of a part as ardently engaged and quiveringly sentient. Elsa's "Mein armer Bruder!" never failed, as she uttered the words, to raise the action to a higher degree of vividness and pity. She continued to sing as Eva at a time when the experience of a magnificent career had begun rather to weigh upon the fresh girliness of her delightful earlier impersonation; but the part of the Marschallin in 'Der Rosenkavalier' became more and more her own. The lyric stage of the time knew no performance more admirably accomplished; it seemed to embody a civilization, the pride and elegance of old Vienna, its voluptuousness, chastened by good manners, its doomed beauty. As a Lieder singer Lotte Lehmann excelled in Schumann rather than Schubert. R. C.

LEHMANN, Marie (b. Hamburg, 15 May 1851; d. Berlin, 9 Dec. 1931).

German soprano singer. She was a younger sister of Lilli Lehmann and was also taught by her mother. She sang in the first Bayreuth production of Wagner's 'Ring' in 1876 as Wellgunde and Ortlinde, and was for many years a valued member of the company in Vienna. She was also an excellent concert singer. A. C.

LEHR, Lorenz (b. Zürich, 24 July 1889).

Swiss violoncellist. Having attended the "Gymnasium" at Zürich and the Commercial High School at Neuchâtel, he studied for five years at the State High School for Music in Berlin, where Hugo Becker was his master for the cello. In 1914-35 he was solo cellist of the Musikgesellschaft at Berne and a member of the Berne String Quartet, at the same time teaching the cello and chamber music at the Conservatory. Since that time he has been living in Berne as a concert cellist, member of the radio chamber-music team and teacher. In 1948 he was elected president of the Swiss Association of Music Teachers, in which capacity he has done good work on behalf of the Swiss music-teaching profession. He is an artist of high rank, whose playing arrests attention by fullness of tone and intensity of expression.

LEHRSTÜCK (Ger., didactic or educational piece). A small musical stage piece originating in Germany during the 1920s and 1930s. and cultivated by Eisler, Weill, Hindemith (e.g. 'Plöner Musiktag') and others, with Bert Brecht as the chief literary exponent. It was intended mainly for the working classes and thus usually made easy to perform, both musically and in the matter of staging. It remained confined chiefly to Germany, but had some slight influence in other European countries and in the U.S.A. Its purpose was both easy performance as Gebrauchsmusik and the enlightening of the masses, especially in politics. During the Nazi rule it often tended to counteract those influences, with the result that its less docile exponents were forced to leave the country.

LEIBOWITZ, René (b. Warsaw, 17 Feb. 1913).

Franco-Polish composer and conductor of Russian parentage. In 1926 he took up residence in Paris, which has since remained his home. From 1930 to 1933 he studied in Germany and Austria with Schoenberg and Webern. The first works which he considers mature date from 1937.

Leibowitz has come into prominence as the leader of a group of young French twelve-note composers. He has expounded the doctrines of Schoenberg not only in his theoretical works (his 'Schönberg et son école' is the first full-length account of the Schoenberg school in any language), but also by conducting concerts of twelve-note music (chiefly with the chamber ensemble of the Orchestre National) in France, Great Britain, Belgium, Italy, Switzerland and other countries. In Jan. 1947 he organized an International Festival of Contemporary Chamber Music in Paris at which works by a number of the younger twelve-note composers from many countries were performed, as well as some by Schoenberg, Berg and Webern. He has contributed numerous articles on present-day music to French, English and German periodicals, and has taken part in many polemical discussions on this subject. In the winter of 1947-48 he visited the U.S.A. and conducted several concerts of twelve-note music.

Leibowitz's own works conform strictly to the principles of the twelve-note technique; the dominating influence is that of Schoenberg, but some works, for instance 'Tourist Death' for soprano and orchestra, and the 'Chamber Concerto' for violin, pianoforte and 17 instruments, show a dramatic quality reminiscent of Berg. Leibowitz is a fanatical disciple of Schoenberg, and his activities have done a great deal for the cause of twelve-note music in France and other countries.

LEICHTENTRITT, Hugo (b. Pleszow, Poznań, 1 Jan. 1874; d. Cambridge, Mass., 13 Nov. 1951).

German writer on music and editor. He spent his youth in America and studied at Harvard under J. K. Paine; he continued his musical studies at the High School for Music in Berlin and graduated Ph.D. in 1901 with a dissertation on the opera of Reinhard Keiser. He then joined the staff of the Klindworth-Schwarzenka Conservatory. He brought out several books of an educational kind and began biographical work with 'Chopin' (Riemann's 'Berühmte Meister', 1905). A collection of Beethoven's Letters (1912), 'Erwin Lendvai' (1912), 'Busoni' (1916) and 'Analyse der Chopinschen Klavierwerke' (1920) show the versatility of his interests, and his 'Händel' (1924) is one of the chief modern authorities on its subject. His 'Geschichte der Motette' (1908), the several volumes he edited for the D.D.T. and his revision and enlargement of Vol. IV of Ambros's 'Musikgeschichte' (1909) show the substantial nature of his scholarship. After 1933, when the Nazi rule drove him from Germany, he became lecturer on the staff of Harvard University. H. C. C.

LEIDER, Frieda (b. Berlin, 18 Apr. 1888).

German soprano singer. She studied medicine at first, but became a pupil for singing of Leo Leissner and began to make her mark in Germany, both on the stage and in the concert-room, during the years that followed the close of the first world war. She made her début at Halle, her first important successes being at Hamburg and at the Berlin State Opera. Under the auspices of Bruno Walter, chief conductor of the German season given at Covent Garden in 1924, she made her début in London on 8 May in 'Tristan und Isolde', appearing a few nights later as Brünnhilde in the 'Ring'. Her success in both characters was emphatic and her talent evoked the most favourable criticism. She may be reckoned among the few German sopranos of the 1920s-30s who have understood the art of investing Wagnerian declamation with sympathetic charm as well as strong dramatic feeling. In addition, she is an actress of unusual gifts — a Brünnhilde and an Isolde of the true heroic stamp — and in these parts she became a reigning favourite at the Berlin State Opera, where she was engaged for some years. She sang again in London for several years, attempting Donna Anna apart from Wagnerian parts, but proving less successful as a Mozart singer. She also appeared with success at the Vienna State Opera and other leading continental theatres. H. K., adds.

LEIFS, Jón (b. Sólheimer Farm, N. Iceland, 1 May 1899).

Icelandic conductor and composer. He was educated at the College in Reykjavík and studied music at the Leipzig Conservatory under Teichmüller, Szendrei, Scherchen, Graener and Lohse from 1916 to 1922. He afterwards appeared as guest conductor with several orchestras in various European countries and in 1926 he conducted the Hamburg Philharmonic Orchestra during a tour of Iceland. In 1934-37 he was musical director and later adviser to the Icelandic State Broadcasting System. He founded the League of Icelandic Artists in 1928, the P.E.N. Club Centre of Iceland in 1930, the Composers' Society of Iceland in 1945 and S.T.E.F. (the Icelandic Performing Right Society) in 1948, becoming president of all these associations.

In 1951 he was elected president for two years of the Council of Northern Composers.

Leifs has also been engaged in research into Icelandic folksong, which he collected among the peasantry and recorded with the aid of the gramophone, and on which he has written essays. As a writer he has moreover dealt with classical interpretation and other subjects, and produced a book on artistic inspiration in Iceland. His compositions are often based on old Norse legendary material or musically on folksong. They are said to aim at establishing an Icelandic national art of composition by modern means but without compromising with continental schools or subscribing to aesthetic tendencies and fashions. The following are his principal works:

'Baldr', wordless opera.
Incidental music for the drama 'Loftr'.
Cantata 'Iceland'.
Oratorio 'Edda'.
'Trilogia piccola' for orch.
Overture 'Iceland' (with final chorus ad lib.).
Saga-Symphony.
String Quartet No. 1.
String Quartet No. 2.

Also smaller choral works, Icelandic dances for orch., songs, folksong settings, &c.

E. B.

LEIGH, Adele (b. London, 15 June 1928).

English soprano singer. She studied at the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art in London, winning the special award and diploma upon graduation, and she spent a year at the Juilliard School of Music, New York, in 1947. She also has lessons in voice production with Maggie Teyte. She has sung at the Covent Garden Opera in London since 1948 and was engaged in the season of 1952-53 as principal lyric soprano. Among the parts she has taken are those of Susanna in 'The Marriage of Figaro', Pamina in 'The Magic Flute', Marcellina in 'Fidelio', Madeleine Lavatte in Bliss's 'The Olympians', the Page in Verdi's 'Masked Ball' and Amor in Gluck's 'Orpheus'. She has also sung at several concerts in London, appearing at the Royal Festival Hall, the Royal Albert Hall and elsewhere in concert and oratorio, and she has broadcast a number of times.

The rapid advance of Adele Leigh from small parts to leading ones at Covent Garden was due to gifts of an unusual order: a clear soprano voice of beautiful quality, easy and even vocal production, and a graceful talent for acting.

M. K. W.

LEIGH, Walter (b. London, 22 June 1905; d. nr. Tobruk, Libya, 12 June 1942).

English composer. He was educated at University College School and Christ's College, Cambridge, where he took the degree of B.A. in 1926. He also spent two years (1927-29) at the High School for Music in Berlin, where he studied composition with Hindemith. He joined the army early in the second world war and was killed in action in the Libyan campaign.

Leigh's music includes chamber works (one of which, the Sonatina for viola and piano-forte, was performed at the I.S.C.M. Festival of 1932 in Vienna), orchestral music for amateurs (mostly published abroad) and comic operas, incidental pieces for the stage, revue and film music. Hindemith's concern for practical music-making is reflected in Leigh's work for amateurs and for the stage. His style is simple but musically, essentially diatonic, effective in performance and free from posing or mystification. His work for the stage has done something to raise the standard of light music in England, since he combines a flair for popular melody with a craftsman's equipment.

Leigh's most successful work has been the comic opera 'Jolly Roger', which ran for six months at the Savoy Theatre in London in 1933. In 1935 he was commissioned by the B.B.C. to write an overture (subsequently called 'Agincourt') in celebration of King George V's jubilee, and in 1936 he composed the music for the Cambridge production of Aristophanes' 'Frogs', in which he showed not only an aptness for setting the Greek text but also a talent for parody. A further association with Cambridge was the post of musical director at the Festival Theatre, which he held in 1931-32.

Among the more important works by Leigh not mentioned above are the following:

- Pantomime 'Aladdin' (1931).
- 'The Pride of the Regiment', comic opera (1932).
- Incidental music for Shakespeare's 'Midsummer Night's Dream' (1937).
- Music for the revue 'Nine Sharp' (1938).
- Music for the 'Little Revue' (1939).
- Music for stg. orch. (1931).
- 3 Pieces for amateur orch. (1934).
- Concertino for harpsichord & stgs. (1936).
- 3 Movements for stg. 4tet (1930).
- Trio for flute, oboe & pf. (1935).

LEIGHTON, (Sir) William (b. ?; d. ?, c. 1616¹).

English musical editor and amateur composer. He was one of the band of Gentlemen Pensioners of Elizabeth and James I and published in 1614:

The Teares or Lamentacions of a Sorrowfull Soule; Composed with Musically Ayres and Songs both for Voyces and Divers Instruments. Set forth by Sir William Leighton, Knight, one of his Majesties honourable Band of Gentlemen Pensioners. And all Psalmes that consist of so many feete as the fiftieth Psalm, will go to the four partes for Consort. London, 1614, Wm. Stansby.

The work consists of 54 metrical psalms and hymns, 17 of which are for 4 voices, with accompaniments in tablature for the lute, bandora and cittern; and 13 for 4 voices and 24 for 5 voices without accompaniment. The first 8 (of the 17) pieces are of Leighton's own composition, and the rest were contributed by the following composers:

John Bull, William Byrd, John Coperario, John Dowland, Alfonso Ferrabosco, Thomas Ford, Orlando Gibbons, Nathaniel Giles, Edmond Hooper, Robert Johnson, Robert Jones, Robert Kindersley, Thomas Lupo, John Milton, Martin Peerson, Francis Pilkington, Timolophus Thopull (pseudonym of Thomas Lupo), John Ward, Thomas Weelkes and John Wilbye.

From the dedication to Prince Charles we learn that the collection was compiled while Leighton was — unjustly, as he alleges — incarcerated for debt. He had in the preceding year published the poetry alone in a duodecimo volume. Some verses by him were prefixed to Alison's 'Psalms' (1599), and he wrote a poem in praise of James I called 'Vertue Triumphant' (1603). A wordless round printed on the title-page was resolved by E. T. Warren Horne and set to the words 'Resolutio of the Rota', etc. This is now in B.M. Add. MSS 31, 418/70b. A fragment of a 4-part piece called 'Surdus Melopaeus' or 'The deafe composer of tunes' is also in B.M. Add. MSS 4388/84. The words of an anthem by him are given in Clifford's collection (1663).

LEINERT, Friedrich Otto (b. Oppeln, Upper Silesia, 10 May 1908).

German conductor, composer and writer on music. He studied at Marburg University and had his musical training at the Orchestra School in Dresden. He took his Ph.D. degree at Marburg in 1935. After serving as operatic conductor at Ratibor, Elbing, Gotha, Weimar and Eisenach, he became organist and orchestral conductor at Marburg. He published a book, 'Johann Evangelist Bradl (1760-1837) als Lieder- und Kammerkomponist' (Wolfenbüttel, 1937) and edited selected works by Spohr in 6 volumes. Among his compositions are a ballet, 'Die Laute des Vicomte', solo cantatas for 1-3 voices, 'Musik für Orchester', Concerto for stg. orch., Concerto for oboe & orch., songs with clar., &c.

LEIPZIG. Leipzig, in Saxony, has for some centuries been one of the foremost musical towns and owes its high position to several causes, chief of which are: (1) the St. Thomas School (Thomasschule), with its famous choir and its long list of distinguished cantors, among whom John Sebastian Bach, who held the post from 1723 to 1750, stands out pre-eminent; (2) the Gewandhaus Concerts, with a history of over 200 years; (3) the Conservatory, founded in 1843 through the instrumentality of Mendelssohn, who was its first chief; (4) several great music-publishing houses, with Breitkopf & Härtel at the head of the list.

(1) ST. THOMAS SCHOOL.—This is a public school of ancient foundation consisting of several hundred boys from the ages of ten to nineteen, of whom about 60 are musical "scholars" and receive a free education. These scholars or alumni, as they are called, in addition to their ordinary school work, are given a thorough musical education under the direction of the cantor and form the choir. They furnish the music at both the St. Thomas and the St. Nicholas Churches, and at one or other of these on Sunday mornings, either immediately before or in the course of the service, they perform with the assistance of a portion of the Gewandhaus Orchestra a cantata, nearly always one of Bach's. On Saturdays at 1.30 in the St. Thomas Church it had long been the practice for the choir to sing unaccompanied motets, preceded by some big organ work—generally by Bach, but also by other of the great organ writers ancient and modern. The motets embraced music of all periods, from the earliest Netherland and Italian writers down to contemporary composers. For example, Vaughan Williams's unaccompanied Mass in G minor was given in this way more than once in the winter of 1923 with great effect. There are many distinguished names in the long succession of cantors. Johann Urban, appointed in 1439, was the first holder of the office, and Sethus Calvisius (1594–1615), Johann Hermann Schein (1615–30) and Johann Kuhnau (1701–22) are some of the most famous of Bach's predecessors. In 1918 Karl Straube, who had been the organist of the St. Thomas Church, was appointed cantor, and his pupil Günther Ramin succeeded him as organist. The church fell a victim to bombing in the second world war, but the famous organ is reported to have been moved to a place of safety. The magnificent organ playing of both Straube and Ramin has for many years been one of the leading features of Leipzig and has set new standards of organ playing for the whole of Germany. Ramin succeeded Straube, who died in 1950, as cantor in the mid-1930s.

(2) GEWANDHAUS CONCERTS.—These are so called from their having been held in the hall of the Gewandhaus, the ancient market-hall of the Saxon linen-merchants of Leipzig. They date from the time when Bach was cantor of the St. Thomas School, and the original title was "das grosse Concert". The first performance was held in a private house in 1743; the conductor was Doles, afterwards cantor of the school (1756–89), and the orchestra consisted of 16 performers. The concerts were interrupted by the Seven Years' War, but resumed on its termination in 1763, under the direction of J. A. Hiller, who conducted them at his own risk and gave them the title of "Liebhaber-concerte". The orchestra was increased to 30, and regular performances were held down to Easter 1778. After a pause of three years the concerts were resumed and located in the Gewandhaus, to which a hall for balls and concerts had lately been added. The credit for this change is due to Burgomaster Karl Wilhelm Müller, who may be considered as the founder of the institution in its present form. He and eleven of his friends constituted themselves a board of directors, appointed J. A. Hiller as conductor and opened a subscription list for 24 concerts. The first concert in the new rooms took place on 29 Sept. 1781; the first regular subscription concert on 25 Nov.

In process of time the old Gewandhaus became too small and inconvenient for modern conditions, and in 1884 a fine new building was opened containing a large hall for the orchestral concerts and a smaller one for chamber music, both of which possess admirable acoustic properties. Regular conductors of the Gewandhaus orchestra during more recent years were Wilhelm Furtwängler (from 1922), Hermann Abendroth (from 1928) and Karl Straube (choral concerts, now succeeded by Günther Ramin). The first conductor of the reconstituted orchestra after the second world war was Herbert Albert, who was succeeded by Franz Konwitschny in 1949.

Mendelssohn was the conductor from 1835 to 1843 and was succeeded by Ferdinand Hiller (1843–44). Since then Niels Gade (1844–48), Julius Rietz (1848–60), Karl Reinecke (1860–95) and Arthur Nikisch (1895–1922) were successively in charge. The most brilliant periods in the past have undoubtedly been those under Mendelssohn, Nikisch, Furtwängler and Abendroth.

(3) THE CONSERVATORY.—The foundation of the Conservatory was entirely due to Mendelssohn. It was opened on 3 Apr. 1843 with a brilliant staff of teachers. Mendelssohn himself was the first head, and gave lessons in pianoforte playing and composition, in both of which subjects he had the co-operation of Schumann. The chief violin teacher was Ferdinand David, leader of the Gewandhaus orchestra. The business and financial management was placed in the hands of a committee of leading Leipzig citizens, while the purely musical side was administered by the chief members of the teaching-staff. If the Conservatory cannot boast to-day of quite the same renown as it possessed in those early days, when it was first and alone in the field, that is explained by the subsequent springing up of similar institutions all over Germany and by developments in that part of Germany resulting from the 1939–45 war. At the present day there are between five and six hundred students. The head of the institution before the second world war was Max Pauer and among its many excellent teachers were Karl Straube, Robert Teichmüller and Max Pauer himself (pianoforte), Julius Klengel (cello), Walter Davisson (violin) and Hermann Grabner (composition). Its present director is Rudolf Fischer and the teaching-staff includes Günther Ramin (organ and church music), H. Steuer (pianoforte) and Grabner. The Staatliche Hochschule für Musik, as the Conservatory is now called, also maintains a Kantorei, a students' choir mainly concerned with the performance of old music, and a students' orchestra which gives public concerts.

(4) OPERA.—Unlike in other German cities of similar standing, opera has seldom taken a very prominent position in the musical life of Leipzig. It had one or two brief periods of brilliance, notably in the 18th century, when J. A. Hiller made it the home of the German Singspiel. But Leipzig has always been handicapped by lack of funds and by the possession of too small a theatre. Until it possesses a larger stage it will be impossible for it to compete with such places as Berlin, Dresden or Munich. The present intendant of the Opera is Krüger, and its musical director H. Seidelmann; the orchestra is the Gewandhaus orchestra.

Since 1926 the following operas have had their first productions at Leipzig:

1926. Ettinger, 'Clavigo'.
 1927. Křenek, 'Jonny spielt auf'; Rezníček, 'Satuala'.
 1928. Weill, 'Der Zar lässt sich photographieren'; Ettinger, 'Frühlingserwachen'; Wetzler, 'Die baskische Venus'; d'Albert, 'Die schwarze Orchidee'.
 1930. Křenek, 'Das Leben des Orest'; Weill, 'Mahagonny'; Dressel, 'Der Rosenbusch der Maria'.
 1934. Vogel, 'Die Verdammten'.
 1936. Stieber, 'Der Eulenspiegel'.
 1937. S. W. Müller, 'Schlaraffenhochzeit'.
 1939. Weismann, 'Die pfliffige Magd'.
 1948. Blacher, 'Die Nachtschwalbe'.

(5) OTHER INSTITUTIONS.—Mention should be made of the Riedel-Verein, a choral society founded in 1854 and named after its first conductor, Carl Riedel. It gives a series of excellent concerts each year and, in particular, has done a great work in popularizing by annual performance Bach's B minor Mass. The Leipzig Symphony Orchestra, though not in the same class as the Gewandhaus orchestra, gives capital concerts. Finally, a striking feature of musical life at Leipzig is the very large number of admirable men's choral societies—many of them composed entirely of working men. In nearly every case the standard of performance is extraordinarily high, both in quality of tone and on the purely musical side.

(6) A radio orchestra of 90 players under the conductorship of G. Wiesenhütter with Hermann Abendroth as frequent guest-conductor, which is maintained by the Mitteldeutscher Rundfunk, has become an important factor in Leipzig's musical life.

LEITE, Antonio da Silva (b. Oporto, 23 May 1759; d. Oporto, 10 Jan. 1833).

Portuguese composer. His master is said to have been Girolamo Sertori, an Italian resident at Oporto, many sacred works by whom are in the Lisbon Public Library. Leite's own church music (Bibl. Nac., Lisbon) shows a technical mastery of his material; his two operas, performed in 1807 (Theatro de S. João, Lisbon), have not been preserved. His printed works include a 'Tantum ergo' for 4 voices with orchestra, printed in London (1815), an instruction book, 'Rezumo de todas as regras, e preceitos da cantoria' (Oporto, 1787). Of more interest are his works for guitar 'Estudo de guitarra' (Oporto, 1796) and '6 Sonatas de guitarra' (Oporto, 1792); some of these have accompaniments for a violin and 2 horns.

LEITGEB, Ignaz. See LEUTGEB.

LEITMOTIV (Ger., plur. Leitmotive) = leading or guiding theme. A term invented by Hans von Wolzogen to mean a short figure of melody or progression of harmony (frequently the two in combination) of marked character, used to illustrate situations, personages, objects and ideas essential in a story or drama to which music forms a counterpart.

Leitmotive are appropriate alike to descriptive instrumental music called programme music and to opera. Though the principle of using them as recurrent features to present to the hearers associations of ideas may be traced back to much earlier times, it was Richard Wagner who gave the term a general currency by his reliance on the Leitmotiv as a primary means of characterization in all his mature music-dramas. He pushed the method to its extreme limits in 'Der Ring des Nibelungen', which is constructed on the most elaborate network of "leading themes". In 'Tristan', 'Meistersinger' and 'Parsifal' he showed that the Leitmotiv principle was no obsession with him, as it became with his immediate followers in dramatic composition. In these works Wagner uses the device more sparingly than in the 'Ring'; in fact it may be said that the simpler the stage situation the less he relied on these guides, and the more he indulged in a lyrical development of his material. The 'Ring', indeed, contains powerful development of certain Motives. A comparison of the Valhalla theme at the beginning of 'Rheingold', Scene II) where it emerges from the 'Ring' theme) with the same at the end of 'Götterdämmerung' gives an outstanding instance of the force of development. It also contains conspicuous transformations, not quite the same thing as development, e.g. that of Siegfried's horn, which in his boyhood represents his carefree joy in life:

later shows him as the full-grown hero bidding farewell to Brünnhilde:

and finally assumes a majestic form in the funeral music of 'Götterdämmerung'. Nevertheless there are many motives in the 'Ring', notably those associated with inanimate objects, e.g. the sword and the anvil, which remain the musical labels of those objects and are never completely merged into the psychological progress of the drama. The same is not always the case, and 'Tristan' particularly holds its musical pre-eminence on account of what may be called the symphonic development of its leading themes.

As regards earlier history it may be noted that J. S. Bach illustrates the principle of leading themes in his allusive use of chorales throughout the church cantatas and kindred works. The introduction of "Meine Seel' erhebt" by the solo oboe in the "Suscepit Israel" of the Magnificat in D major is a typical case in point. In Mozart there is more than a hint of a leading motive in the "Così fan tutte" motto which is quoted in the overture of that opera and returns twice during its course. The romantic movement of the early 19th century favoured the exploitation of all kinds of literary allusiveness and quotation in music. Berlioz's idée fixe in the 'Symphonie fantastique', Mendelssohn's references to his own leading themes in 'Elijah' and Schumann's quotations of the Grossvaterlied in the 'Carnaval' and the Marseillaise in the 'Faschingsschwank' show the principle gaining hold in different kinds of music not connected with the stage. Naturally, however, the stage most often suggested the sort of relevance of idea which led composers to something approaching the Leitmotiv, and pre-Wagnerian opera affords numerous instances, from the theme of mourning which links the opening chorus of Gluck's 'Orfeo' with the song "Che farò" to several recurrent themes in Weber's 'Der Freischütz', the most immediate predecessor of Wagner.

Wagner's exhaustive use of the Leitmotiv and perhaps still more the blind copying of his methods by his followers produced a certain reaction among 20th-century composers against this means of expression. Debussy's 'Pelléas et Mélisande' (1902) marks the turn of the tide. For while the analyst may find themes more or less associated with the several personages of drama, they are no longer "leading themes" in the true sense of the word, since it is not by them that the hearer's attention is focused and directed.

LE JEUNE, Claude (or Claudin) (b. Valenciennes, 1528; d. ?, between Mar. 1600 and Mar. 1601¹).

French or Flemish composer. The titles of several of his works inform us of his birthplace. The inscription on a portrait of him in 1598 reads: "Species Claudii Junii Valentini Belgae". He is described as "Belga", because Valenciennes was then part of Flanders, and not of France. Fétis gave the date of his birth as 1540, but Ernest Bouton, in a biographical notice of Le Jeune published at Valenciennes in 1845, fixes it at 1528, and this has since been accepted, for already in 1554 there are 4 compositions by Le Jeune in the second and third books of chansons published by Phalèse at Louvain. His active life would seem to have been spent mostly in Paris, but in what position or under what circumstances is not known. In 1564 appeared his 'Dix Psaumes de David à 4 en forme de motets avec un dialogue à 7'. In the 21st to the 25th 'Livres de chansons', first published by Le Roy and Ballard in 1569, and frequently reprinted afterwards, 39 numbers by Le Jeune were included in association with Lassus and other masters. In 1581, on the occasion of the marriage of the favourite of Henri III, the Duc de Joyeuse, with the queen's sister, there is the story handed down in Bayle's 'Dictionnaire' of the magical effect of Le Jeune's music in first rousing and then quieting the martial ardour of a military officer present, this effect being attributed to the composer's extraordinary knowledge and skill in the use of the twelve modes.¹ The story may be apocryphal, but it is interesting as testifying to the reputation the composer had by then acquired. In 1585 Christophe Plantin of Antwerp published Le Jeune's 'Livre de meslanges à 4, 5, 6, 8, et 10 parties'. This work was reprinted in Paris in 1587, but Henri Expert is disposed to think a first edition had already appeared in Paris in 1582. It consists of a miscellaneous collection of French chansons, Italian madrigals, Latin motets and other pieces, including what is described as a 'Venetian Echo' a 10. Expert has reprinted part of this work as one of the volumes of his series 'Les Maîtres-Musiciens de la Renaissance française'. One of the pieces described as a 'Villageoise de Gascogne', with text in dialect, "Debat la noste trill 'en Mai", has also been edited with English words by Lionel Benson. In 1588, during the siege of Paris by Henri III in the wars of the Catholic League, we are told that Le Jeune, whose sympathies were on the Huguenot side, endeavoured to escape from the city, carrying his MSS with him, but was arrested by the Catholic soldiers and would have seen his MSS committed to the flames but for the timely intervention of his Catholic fellow-musician Jacques Mauduit. In 1598 appeared at La Rochelle one of Le Jeune's chief works entitled:

Dodécachorde contenant douze Psaumes de David mis en musique selon les douze modes approuvez des meilleurs auteurs anciens et modernes à 2, 3, 4, 5, 6 & 7 voix.

These Psalms are the metrical versions of Marot and Bèze set in elaborate motet style, each in several divisions with varying number of voices, and with the Genevan tune of each Psalm as cantus firmus in one or other of the voices. On the title-page of this work we find Le Jeune for the first time described as "compositeur de la musique de la chambre du roy", so perhaps the permission to print such a work and the possibility of holding the appointment were a result of the Edict of Nantes in 1598.

The publication of the work at La Rochelle, the headquarters of French Protestantism, is significant; also its dedication to the Duc de Bouillon, a patron of the Huguenot cause. In the dedication reference is made to the cessation of civil strife under Henri IV, and with an allusion to the supposed characteristics of the Dorian and Phrygian modes the hope is expressed that music may also contribute its share to the restoration of lasting peace and concord.

The next important publication bearing Le Jeune's name appeared after his death under the editorship of Cécile Le Jeune, his sister, who prefixed a very flattering dedication to King James I of England. It is entitled 'Le Printemps' a 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8 (Paris, 1603). With other laudatory verses there is an 'Ode sur la musique du défunct Sieur Cl. de J.', the second stanza of which begins thus:

Le Jeune a fait en sa vieillesse
Ce qu'une bien gaye jeunesse
N'aurait avoir entrepris.

There is also a preface 'Sur la musique mesurée', in which the claim is made for Le Jeune of having successfully solved the problem of mating ancient rhythm with modern harmony, the music being made to follow exactly the metrical rhythm of the words in accordance with the rules of classical prosody. Metrical rhythm is extolled as being the soul of music, of which harmony is only the body. The poet Antoine Baif had in 1570 founded in Paris an Académie de Musique to encourage this new style of musical composition, and it would appear that Le Jeune, like Mauduit, was for some time associated with him. The work itself consists of 39 chansons, 33 of which are settings of vers mesurez, i.e. in accordance with the quantities of classical prosody, and 6 are longer settings of ordinary vers rimez. The vers mesurez consist of an interchange of réchant and chant, the former being a refrain sung at the beginning and between the verses of the song. The metrical scanning is at the head of each song, so that there seems to be no difficulty in understanding how it is to be sung. The 6 compositions to vers rimez are in the ordinary madrigal or chanson form. Two of them consist of Jannequin's settings of 'Le Chant du rossignol' and 'Chant de l'alouette', with a fifth voice-part added and the composition further extended by Le Jeune. There is also 'Ma Mignonne', a lengthy piece in 9 divisions a 2 to 8, a sestina a 5, 'Du trist' hyver', and a dialogue a 7, 'Amour quand fus tu né'. The text of this last piece is evidently a translation of an Italian madrigal which was also composed by Adrian Willaert as a dialogue a 7, 'Quando nascest' Amor'. It would seem as if Le Jeune liked to experiment in every possible variety of style of vocal setting. 'Le Printemps' is reprinted in modern score in 3 volumes of Expert's 'Les Maîtres-Musiciens'. There are also reprinted separately the two pieces by Jannequin with Le Jeune's additions.

A simple setting of all the tunes of the Genevan Psalter a 3, published by Cécile Le Jeune in 3 books (Paris, 1602-10), was soon forgotten and cast into the shade by the more important setting of the same tunes a 4 and 5, published by her in 1613. The latter work became immensely popular and was frequently reprinted in France and Holland for the use of the reformed churches. Like the earlier work of Goudimel it was also adapted to the German translation of the French Psalms by Ambrosius Lobwasser. The music is almost entirely in simple counterpoint, note for note, the proper tune being in the tenor, but sometimes in the bass, while, as Ambros says, the descant part is so melodious that it might be mistaken for the proper tune. It is perhaps too much to say that Le Jeune's musical reputation rests entirely on this one work, since possibly its popularity was due to the reputation the musician had otherwise acquired. While Ambros is disposed to consider Le Jeune's chanson as being somewhat of a declension from the higher style of earlier French masters, he yet gives high praise to the 'Dodécachorde' as showing him to be a solid and capable master of the polyphonic school.

A book of Psalms in a quite different style had also appeared under Cécile's editorship in 1606. It is entitled 'Psaumes en vers mesurez mis en musique à 2-8 parties'. This work consists of a selection of Psalms not from the Genevan version, but in a verse translation in accordance with the rules of classical prosody, and the music also set accordingly as in 'Le Printemps'. It is also republished by Expert in 3 volumes of his 'Les Maîtres-Musiciens'. Another publication of 1606 is 'Octonaire de la vanité et inconstance du monde mis en musique à 3 & 4'. This was reprinted by Expert in 1925.

In 1608 Cécile Le Jeune published a book of 'Airs' a 3 to 6, forming a sequel to an earlier book of the same kind issued in 1594. Lastly, in 1612 a nephew of Le Jeune published a 'Second livre de mélanges à 4-10', in which, judging from its miscellaneous contents, he must have collected all he could still find of his uncle's works, chansons, madrigals, motets, etc., with two instrumental fantasias, one of which, a 4, was separately reprinted in score and parts by Expert. It only remains to add that besides his larger republications Expert issued some works by Le Jeune in separate numbers.

LEJEUNE, Gabrielle (b. Liège, ?; d. ?).

Belgian mezzo-soprano singer. After her vocal studies at the Liège Conservatory she graduated to the Théâtre de la Monnaie in Brussels, making a promising début in 1892 as Aida. This led to her engagement at the Paris Opéra-Comique, where she gained valuable experience and sang in a variety of parts. She first appeared in London, at Covent Garden Theatre, on 15 May 1895, as Bertha in 'Le Prophète'. Thenceforward until 1909 she sang there regularly, singing among others the part of Suzuki on the production of 'Madama Butterfly' in 1905, with a cast that included Destinnová, Caruso and Scotti. She also created the part of Joan in d'Erlanger's opera 'Tess' on 14 July 1909. Her voice was of very musical quality and excellently trained, but not powerful enough to stand the strain of high parts. She was married to the baritone, Charles Gilbert and accompanied him to New York, where they both took part in Oscar Hammerstein's opening season at the Manhattan Opera House, 1906-7.

LEKEU, Guillaume (b. Heusy nr. Verriers, 20 Jan. 1870; d. Angers, 21 Jan. 1894).

Belgian composer. He had his earliest music lessons from the organist at his native village. When he was nine the family moved to Poitiers, where he continued his musical studies while attending school, particularly with his physics master, an excellent amateur musician. In 1885 he began to compose and in 1888, when the family moved to Paris, he had lessons for a short time from Gaston Vallin. In the summer of 1889 he attended the Bayreuth Festival and on his return was introduced to César Franck, who accepted him as a pupil, but Franck died in Nov. 1890 and Lekeu next went to Vincent d'Indy, who advised him to try for the Belgian Prix de Rome. He gained the second prize in 1891 with the cantata 'Andromède', parts of which were performed in Brussels the following year and made an impression on Eugène Ysaÿe, who commissioned a violin sonata from him. On his return to Paris he began to work hard at various compositions, but he died of typhoid on the day after his twenty-fourth birthday and left a number of works unfinished.

Lekeu is one of those composers whose unfortunate early death has called forth judgments which somewhat rashly take high promises for glorious fulfilments. D'Indy, who admired his music, nevertheless qualified it guardedly with the epithet "quasi géniale", and it must be admitted that, like that of many other Belgian composers of his generation, it bears more signs of the mannerisms of the Franck school than marks of individuality. But although it can at times be weak and confused, its nobility of purpose commands respect, and there are splendid ideas, admirably presented, in all his best works. D'Indy thought both the unfinished cello Sonata and pianoforte Quartet worth completing, and Ysaÿe, to whom the violin Sonata was dedicated, often conducted the symphonic study on 'Hamlet', an intimately poetical work, and the Adagio for quartet and string orchestra, of finely elegiac character. The 'Fantaisie sur deux airs angevins' for orchestra was frequently played in Belgium and France, and introduced to London by Sir Henry Wood in 1903.

LELEU, Jean (called Lupi or *Lupus*¹)
 (b. Cambrai, 1506; d. Cambrai, 20 Dec. 1539).

Flemish composer. He was a choir-boy at Cambrai cathedral under Jean Remy. He is named in the records there on 21 Oct. 1521 as being fifteen years of age. On 30 May 1522 he was sent to the University of Louvain with a scholarship. On 21 Mar. 1527, back at Cambrai, he succeeded Remy as singing-master at the cathedral. His mother kept house for him and looked after the choir-boys. He was several times reproved for negligence, and in 1531 his replacement by another musician was contemplated; but he was reinstated, only to be expelled again in Oct. 1532 and once more allowed to continue on 9 Dec., but on condition that his mother should give up managing his household. Being taken ill in 1535, he resigned on 28 May and was given the canon's house called "L'Homme armé" as a retreat. He resumed duties in July 1537, but finally gave them up on 10 Dec. 1539, ten days before his death. Not having been a canon, he was not entitled to be buried in the cathedral next to his predecessors, as he had wished, but the chapter accorded him that honour by a special dispensation on account of his excellence as a musician.

The known works by Leleu include 3 Masses ('Mijn Vriendinne', 'Veni Sponsa Christi' and 'Surrexit pastor bonus'), 5 motets² and 10 chansons for 4 voices.³ E. B.

LELEU, Jeanne (b. Saint-Mihiel, 29 Dec. 1898).

French pianist and composer. She entered the Paris Conservatoire at the age of nine. She was a pupil of Marguerite Long and Cortot for pianoforte (first prize, 1913), Chapuis for harmony (first prize, 1918), Estyle for score-reading (first prize, 1919) and Widor and Büsser for composition (first prize, 1922). In 1933 she was awarded the Prix de Rome.

Jeanne Leleu's compositions include two ballets, 'Un Jour d'été' (given at the Paris Opéra-Comique in 1940) and 'Nautéas' (produced at Monte-Carlo in 1947), three symphonic suites, 'Transparences', 'Femmes' and 'Virevoltes', a pianoforte Concerto, a Quartet for strings and pianoforte, and songs to words by Michelangelo. of organists and violinists, and received his musical training at the Conservatory of Cologne and the University of Bonn, where he took the Ph.D. degree in 1916. In 1927 he was appointed professor of composition at the Cologne High School for Music, which post he has held to the present day. The majority of his compositions is written for use in church, school and home, and intended for amateur performers. Lemacher modelled his style on Brahms and Bruckner, and while in his music, which abounds in Rhenish humour, there is a leaning towards a linear as well as an impressionist style, the keynote of his writing is simplicity and poignancy. Many of his pupils play a prominent part in Germany's musical life. He has also written a number of books on musical subjects such as counterpoint and harmony, and a handbook each on church music and music for the home. His compositions include the following:

LE MAISTRE, Matthieu (b. Roclenguesur-Geer, Liège, c. 1505; d. Dresden, 1577).

Walloon composer. Nothing is known of his career before 1554, when he was appointed Kapellmeister to the Saxon court at Dresden on the retirement of Johann Walther; but it is more than likely that he was there some years before, since no newcomer would have been given so important a post. Hermann Finck mentions him as one of the best composers of the time in his 'Practica musica' of 1556. He was pensioned off on 12 Feb. 1568 and succeeded by Scandello, his pension being confirmed on 24 June following. In a Latin poem prefixed to his last work in 1577 he describes himself as a "white-haired veteran whose strength is ebbing away", and he died before Apr. of that year.¹

Le Maistre's publications are the following:

- Motet 'Adjuva me Domine' 5 voices (in 'Tomus quartus Psalmorum', Nuremberg, 1554).
'Magnificat octo tonorum' (Dresden, 1557).
'Catechesis numeris musicis' (Nuremberg, 1563), consisting mainly of a few simple note-for-note settings of the chief parts of the Lutheran Catechism in Latin, the 'Pater noster' for 4 v. on the plainsong melody, the Creed and other pieces for 3 v.
Motet 'Dominus dixit', 8 v. (in 'Theaurus musicus', Nuremberg, 1564).
Motet 'Estote prudentes', 4 v. (ibid., 1564).
'Geistliche und weltliche teutsche Geseng', 4 & 5 v. (Wittenberg, 1566).
'Epithalamia in honorem orn. viri Dr. Nicolai Leopardi' (with Scandello and others) (Nuremberg, 1568).
Mass, 5 v. "ad imitationem cantilenae 'Ich weiss nur ein fest gebawets Haus'" (in 'Praestantissimum artificum lectis', 1568).
'Liber primus sacrarum cantionum', 5 v. (Dresden, 1570).
'Officia de Nativitate et Ascensione Christi', 5 v. (Dresden, 1574).
'Schöne und auserlesene deutsche und lateinische geistliche Gesenge', 3 v. or insts. (Dresden, 1577).

Other works (some incomplete) are in manuscript. The motet 'Estote prudentes' (1564) was reprinted by Commer in his 'Collectio', Vol. VIII. Kade's monograph contains 10 'Geistliche Gesänge' and 5 'Weltliche Gesänge', two of which are quodlibets—pieces with various texts and melodies combined. Two other pieces are in the Supplement to Ambros's 'Geschichte'.

LEMARE, Edwin (Henry) (b. Ventnor, Isle of Wight, 9 Sept. 1865; d. Los Angeles, 24 Sept. 1934).

English organist and composer. He was elected to the Goss scholarship at the R.A.M. in London in 1878. He was subsequently elected to a fellowship of the same institution, and in 1884 was made F.R.C.O. His successive appointments as organist were as follows: St. John the Evangelist's, Brownswood Park; St. Andrew's Church and the Public Hall, Cardiff; the Parish Church, Sheffield (1886); Holy Trinity, Sloane Street; St. Margaret's, Westminster. During his tenure of these last two London posts he became famous as a solo player and a giver of recitals of more than the usual interest. He made a prominent feature of transcriptions of modern orchestral music, and his work in this field had a good deal of influence on the subsequent development of the art of registration and even of organ building.

In 1900 Lemare made a recital tour of Canada and the U.S.A., and from 1902 to 1915 he held the post of organist at the Carnegie Institute, Pittsburgh, Pa. He was recitalist at the Panama-Pacific Exposition, San Francisco, 1915, municipal organist at San Francisco, 1917-21, and from 1921 to 1934 he held a similar post at Portland, Maine.

Lemare was one of the most brilliant players of his day, an unusually gifted improviser and a prolific and successful composer, chiefly of organ music. His works for the instrument number about a hundred, among the best being two symphonies, a 'Toccata di concerto' and a 'Fantaisie-Fugue'. The bulk of the remainder is in popular style and shows a pleasant vein of fancy and a dexterous management of effect. J. A. F.-M. & H. G.

LEMIÈRE DE CORVEY, Jean Frédéric Auguste (b. Rennes, 1770; d. Paris, 19 Apr. 1832).

French composer. He was mainly self-taught. His first opera, 'Constance', is said to have been performed in his native town in 1790. Shortly afterwards he went to Paris, had some lessons from Berton and on 21 Jan. 1794 appeared at the Opéra-Comique as the composer of a topical piece, 'La Reprise de Toulon', of which several airs were published. This was followed at the same theatre, disregarding some doubtful works, by 'Andros et Almona' (4 Feb. 1794), 'Les Suspects' (Théâtre Louvois, 19 May 1795), 'La Paix et l'amour' (Lille, 5 Dec. 1797), 'Les Deux Orphelins' (Théâtre des Amis des Arts, 26 May 1798) and 'Les Deux Crispins' (Théâtre Molière, 16 June 1798); of the last he wrote the text as well as the music.

After a long interval, during which Lemière served as an officer in Napoleon's army, he reappeared as a dramatic composer with 'La Cruche cassée' at the Opéra-Comique on 24 Dec. 1818; the score of this work is in the library of the Brussels Conservatoire. For the same theatre he wrote 'La Fausse Croisade' (12 July 1825) and 'Les Rencontres' (11 June 1828, with Catrufo) and for the Odéon arranged French versions of Rossini's 'Donna del lago' (1825) and 'Tancredi' (1827), and a Rossini pasticcio 'Le Testament' (1827).

Apart from his works for the stage, Lemière wrote instrumental works, of which 'La Bataille de Jéna gagnée sur les Prussiens', "grande pièce de musique" (published at Hamburg in 1806) is an example and which reached at least Op. 23 ('Duo concertant pour harpe et pianoforte', in B.M.), collections of romances ('Le Porte-feuille du troubadour', 1821), etc.

LEMLIN (Lämmlein), Lorenz (b. Eichstätt, Bavaria, ?; d. ?).

German 16th-century composer. In 1513 he attended the University of Heidelberg. He was afterwards singer and Kapellmeister to the elector palatine at Heidelberg. Georg Forster mentions him with respect as his worthy preceptor in music and inserts fifteen of his master's songs in his collections of 1539 and 1549. Eitner¹ speaks very slightly of these songs, while on the other hand Ambros² judges them very favourably. The only one accessible in a modern reprint is a humorous "cuckoo" song for six voices, which Ambros describes as quite a charming piece im Volkston, 'Der Gutzgauch auf dem Zaune sass'. This was first republished by C. F. Becker in his book 'Die Hausmusik in Deutschland' (Leipzig, 1840) and is also contained in Eitner's republication of Forster's 'Liederbuch' of 1540. The only other known works by Lemlin are a few Latin motets in collections from which Ambros singles out for special mention "a very beautiful" 'In manus tuas'. J. R. M.

LEMMENS, Nicolas Jacques (b. Zoerle-Parwijs, Westerloo, 3 Jan. 1823; d. Linterpoort nr. Mechlin, 30 Jan. 1881).

Belgian organist, pianist and composer. His father was provost and organist at Zoerle-Parwijs. His career was attached to the organ from the first. At the age of eleven he was put under van der Broeck, organist at Dieste. In 1839 he entered the Conservatoire at Brussels, but soon left it owing to his father's illness, and was absent for a couple of years. In the interval he succeeded his former master at Dieste, but fortunately gave this up and returned to the Conservatoire at the end of 1841. There he became the pupil of Fétis and was noted for the ardour and devotion with which he worked. He took the second prize for composition in 1844 and the first in 1845, as well as the first for organ playing. In 1846 he went, at the government's expense, to Breslau, and remained there a year, studying the organ under A. Hesse, who sent him back at the end of that time with a testimonial to the effect that "he played Bach as well as he himself did". In 1849 he became professor of his instrument at the Brussels Conservatoire, and Fétis, as the head of the establishment, bears strong testimony to the vast improvement which followed this appointment, and the new spirit which it infused through the country.

Though distinguished as a pianist, it is with the organ that his name will remain connected. In 1857 Lemmens married Helen Sherrington, and from that time he lived much in England; but on 1 Jan. 1879 he opened a college at Mechlin, under the patronage of the Belgian clergy, for training Catholic organists and choirmasters, which was soon largely attended.

His great work is his 'École d'orgue', which was adopted by the Conservatories of Paris, Brussels, Madrid, etc. He also published sonatas, offertories, etc., for the organ, also masses, motets, symphonies, and was engaged for twenty years on a method for accompanying Gregorian chants, which was edited by J. Duclos after the author's death and published at Ghent in 1886. Four volumes of œuvres inédites were published by Breitkopf & Härtel.

LEMMENS-SHERRINGTON, Helen (b. Preston, 4 Oct. 1834; d. Brussels, 9 May 1906).

English soprano singer, wife of the preceding. She came of a family who had lived for several generations at Preston. Her mother was a musician. In 1838 they migrated to Rotterdam, and there Miss Sherrington studied under Verhulst. In 1852 she entered the Brussels Conservatoire and took first prizes for singing and declamation. On 7 Apr. 1856 she made her first appearance in London and soon rose to the position of leading English soprano, both in sacred and secular music, a position which she maintained for many years. After her marriage, in 1860, she appeared on the English and in 1866 on the Italian operatic stage, and the operas in which she appeared included 'Robin Hood', 'Amber Witch', 'Helvellyn', 'L'Africaine', 'Norma', 'Huguenots', 'Roberto', 'Don Giovanni', 'Domino noir', 'Fra Diavolo', 'Martha', etc.

LEMOINE. French family of music publishers established in Paris.

(1) Antoine Marcel Lemoine (b. Paris, 3 Nov. 1753; d. Paris, Apr. 1817). He was a performer on the guitar and played the viola in the orchestra of the Théâtre de Monsieur. The publishing firm was founded by him in 1772.

(2) Henry Lemoine (b. Paris, 21 Oct. 1786; d. Paris, 18 May 1854), son of the preceding. He was a pupil at the Paris Conservatoire in 1798–1809 and became one of the most successful pianoforte teachers in Paris. He took over the business on his father's death in 1817 and raised it to a high position. His educational compositions include a 'Petite Méthode élémentaire' for pianoforte, a 'Traité d'harmonie pratique', a 'Solfège des solfèges', in ten small volumes, 'Tablettes du pianiste', etc.

(3) Achille Philibert Lemoine (b. Paris, 1813; d. Sèvres, 13 Aug. 1895), son of the preceding. He was a partner in the firm from 1850 and two years later undertook the whole direction. In 1858 he added an establishment for engraving and music printing, which gave a great impulse to the business; this was carried still farther by the acquisition of the "fonds Schönenberger". In 1885 Lemoine founded a branch establishment in Brussels, in association with his sons.

(4) Henry Lemoine (b. Paris, 8 Apr. 1848; d. Paris, 24 Apr. 1924), son of the preceding.

(5) Léon Lemoine (b. Paris, 1855; d. Paris, 1916), brother of the preceding.

(6) Henry Jean Lemoine (b. Paris, 10 Apr. 1890), nephew of the preceding, son of (4). He carries on the firm under the title of Henry Lemoine & Cie.

Among the numerous publications of the house may be mentioned the 'Répertoire classique du chant français' and the 'Répertoire de l'ancien chant classique', both edited by Gevaert.

LEMOYNE, Gabriel (b. Berlin, 14 Oct. 1772; d. Paris, 2 July 1815).

French pianist and composer. He went with his father, Jean Baptiste Lemoine, back to Paris as a child and studied with Clément and Edelmann. He went on tour with the violinist Lafont and settled in Paris. He collaborated in a piece for the stage, 'L'Entre-Sol', with Louis Alexandre Piccinni and also wrote 2 pianoforte Concertos, a Trio for violin, cello and pianoforte, Op. 12, violin Sonatas, Opp. 10 and 22, pianoforte Sonatas, Opp. 1 and 19, etc.

LEMOYNE, Jean Baptiste (b. Eymet, Périgord, 3 Apr. 1751; d. Paris, 30 Dec. 1796).

French conductor and composer, father of the preceding. After several engagements as conductor in provincial theatres he went to Berlin in 1770 and studied under Graun, Kirnberger and I. A. P. Schulz. After a short engagement as second Kapellmeister at the court theatre of Berlin he went to Warsaw and thence to Paris. There he produced an 'Ode sur le combat d'Ouessant' at the Concert Spirituel in 1778. This was followed by an opera, 'Électre' (1782), imitating the style of Gluck, of whom he declared himself a pupil. When Gluck indignantly repudiated the statement Lemoine revenged himself by writing another opera, 'Phèdre', in the style of Piccinni. It was produced at court, at Fontainebleau, on 26 Oct. 1786, and then brought out at the Paris Opéra on 21 Nov. following. It met with great success, owing largely to the fine libretto by François Benoit Hoffman and the beautiful singing of Antoinette Saint-Huberty, Lemoyne's pupil.

After a visit to Italy Lemoyne returned to Paris in 1788. The following year he produced two works at the Opéra: 'Les Prétendus' on 2 June 1789 and 'Nephté' on 15 Dec. The latter again had a libretto by Hoffman, the more successful perhaps because it was based on Corneille's tragedy 'Cinna'; but the music must have had something to do with it, for Lemoyne was brought before the curtain to acknowledge the applause, the first time this had happened to any composer in Paris.

Sixteen operas by Lemoyne are enumerated by Fétis.

LENDVAI, Erwin (b. Budapest, 4 June 1882; d. London, 31 Mar. 1949).

Hungarian composer. He studied music under Koessler in Budapest and was the winner of a state prize at Milan, where he received further musical training from Puccini. In 1913 he was appointed teacher of theory at the Jaques-Dalcroze school at Hellerau near Dresden and in 1919 professor of composition at the Klindworth-Scharwenka Conservatory in Berlin. His music is of a fine, delicate texture and happily expresses the composer's poetic disposition.

The following are among Lendvai's more important works:

Opera 'Elga', libretto by Martha von Zobeltitz, on Gerhart Hauptmann's play, prod. Mannheim, 6 Dec. 1916.

'Nippon' for women's chorus, Op. 5.

LENEPVEU, Charles (Ferdinand) (b. Rouen, 4 Oct. 1840; d. Paris, 16 Aug. 1910).

French composer and teacher. After finishing his classical studies at his native place he went to Paris at his father's desire to study law, and at the same time he learnt solfege from Savard, a professor at the Conservatoire. His first essay as a composer was a cantata composed for the centenary of the Société d'Agriculture et de Commerce of Caen, which was crowned and performed on 29 July 1862. After this success he resolved to follow the musical profession and, through the intervention of Savard, he entered the Conservatoire and joined Ambroise Thomas's class. He carried off the Prix de Rome in 1865 as the first competitor, and his cantata, 'Renaud dans les jardins d'Armide', was performed at the opening of the restored Salle du Conservatoire on 3 Jan. 1866. While he was in Rome Lenepveu took part in the competition instituted by the Minister of Fine Arts in 1867, and his score of the opera 'Le Florentin', written on a libretto by Vernoy de Saint-Georges, was accepted from among sixty-two compositions, without hesitation on the part of the judges or murmurs on the part of the rival competitors. The prize work was to have been given at the Opéra-Comique, but political events and the war delayed the fulfilment of the promise, and Lenepveu, instead of composing for the Concerts Populaires, which were always ready to receive new works, made the mistake of holding aloof, resting on his laurels, while his companions, Massenet, Dubois, Guiraud, Bizet and others, all of whom were waiting for admittance into the theatres, devoted themselves to symphonic music and thereby acquired skill in orchestration as well as the recognition of the public.

Lenepveu, who on his return from Rome had resumed his contrapuntal studies with the organist Chauvet while waiting for the production of 'Le Florentin', brought forward nothing except a funeral march for Henri Renault, played under Pasdeloup on 21 Jan. 1872. In the preceding year (20 May 1871) he had produced a Requiem at Bordeaux for the benefit of the widows and orphans of those killed in the Franco-Prussian war; fragments of these works given at the Concerts du Conservatoire, 29 Mar. 1872, and at the Concerts Populaires, 11 Apr. 1873, showed an unfortunate tendency in the composer to obtain as much noise as possible.

At length, after long delays and repeated applications, 'Le Florentin' was given at the Opéra-Comique on 26 Feb. 1874, and was wholly unsuccessful. After this Lenepveu was never able to get any opera produced in France. Having completed a grand opera, 'Velléda' (on the subject of Chateaubriand's 'Martyrs'), he determined to bring it out in London, where it was performed in Italian, with Patti in the principal part (Covent Garden, 4 July 1882).

Lenepveu produced a drame lyrique, 'Jeanne d'Arc', performed in the Cathedral of Rouen (1 June 1886); a 'Hymne funèbre et triomphal' at Rouen, 1889; an 'Ode triomphale à Jeanne d'Arc' at the same place, 1892; and a Requiem, 1893. From Nov. 1880 he took a harmony class for women at the Paris Conservatoire in the place of Guiraud. In this capacity Lenepveu was decorated by the Legion of Honour on 4 Aug. 1887. He was professor of composition in the Conservatoire from 1894 and was elected a member of the Institut in 1896.

LÉNER QUARTET. Hungarian string-quartet team. The four artists composing it were wholly the product of the Musical Academy of Budapest, Jenő Léner, the leader (1894-1948), Joseph Smilovits, the second violin (b. 1894) and Sandor Roth, the viola (b. 1895), being pupils of Jenő Hubay, who, as far as chamber music is concerned, owed much to the influence of his master and intimate friend Joachim. Imre Hartman, the cellist (b. 1895), was a pupil of the equally famous David Popper.

All won many distinctions and were members in 1918 of the Opera orchestra in Budapest when, at the outbreak of revolution in Hungary, Léner gathered around him his three friends, and the four together retired to a remote Hungarian village, dedicating their best energies to the study of chamber music. After two years of work they made an appearance in Vienna before an international gathering of musicians, among them Ravel, who personally invited them to Paris. They afterwards played with success in all the musical centres of Europe.

Their fourth visit to London in 1925 was signaled by an historical series of quartet compositions ranging from Stamitz to Debussy, given at the Wigmore Hall in London, and by a unique recital in the Albert Hall, in which a platform was erected in the centre of the hall.

The playing of the Léner Quartet was characterized by fine tone-quality, homogeneity of style and technical brilliancy. Gramophone records of their playing are still in demand.

LENG, Alfonso (b. Santiago de Chile, 11 Feb. 1884).

Chilean composer. He studied both dentistry and music, the latter under Enrique Soro at the Conservatorio Nacional de Música of Santiago. He qualified as a dentist in 1910 at the University of Chile and was a professor at the Dental School in 1911-28. In 1928-36 he was a senior professor and then became the Decano de la Facultad de Odontología. He is an honorary member of the Facultad de Bellas Artes, and in 1947 was elected president of the Asociación Nacional de Compositores Chile, a branch of the I.S.C.M.

Leng's music is very popular in his native country and includes a symphonic poem, 'La muerte de Alsino', a 'Fantasia' for piano-forte and orchestra, and several orchestral and instrumental pieces as well as some fine songs.

LENORMAND, René (b. Elbeuf, 5 Aug. 1846; d. Paris, 3 Dec. 1932).

French writer on music and composer. He was intended for a commercial career, but his mother taught him music and in 1868 he became a pupil of Damcke in Paris. He founded a society for the cultivation of songs of all nations; on the other hand, he was far from international in his outlook in his 'Étude sur l'harmonie moderne', published in 'Le Monde musical' in 1913 (Eng. trans. by Herbert Antcliffe, London, 1915), which confines itself almost entirely to French music, though as far as it goes it is an admirable piece of work.

Lenormand's compositions include an opera, 'Le Cachet rouge'; a mimed drama, 'La Nuit de juillet'; a cantata, 'Souvenirs du Valais'; 'Le Voyage imaginaire' and 'Deux Esquisses' on Malay themes for orchestra; 'Le Lahn de Mabed' for violin and orchestra; a string Quartet; a Trio for violin, cello and pianoforte; violin pieces; pianoforte music; about 150 songs, etc.

G.

LENTON, John (b. ? London, 1656; d. London, ?).

English violinist and composer. He was appointed musician for the violin to Charles II on 2 Aug. 1683 and was one of the band of music of William and Mary and of Anne from 1692 to 1718. In 1694 he published 'The Gentleman's Diversion, or The Violin explained', with some airs composed by himself and others at the end. A second edition, with an appendix, and the airs omitted, appeared in 1702, under the title of 'The Useful Instructor on the Violin'. It is remarkable that in neither edition is there any mention of "shifting", and the scale given reaches but to c'''. In 1692, in conjunction with Thomas Tollet, he published 'A Consort of Musick in three parts'.

Lenton composed the overtures and act tunes for the following plays: Rowe's 'The Ambitious Stepmother' (1700) and 'Tambelane' (1702), Shakespeare's 'Othello' (1703), Rowe's 'The Fair Penitent' (1703), Otway's 'Venice Preserved' (revival of 1703), Dennis's 'Liberty Asserted' (1704), Trapp's 'Abra Mule' (1704), Mrs. Centlivre's 'The Gamester' (1705) and for an unidentified tragedy, 'The Royal Captive'. Songs by him are in the several collections of the period and other vocal pieces in 'The Pleasant Musical Companion' (1685). He contributed to Durfey's 'Third Collection of New Songs', to 'Apollo's Banquet', and revised the tunes for the earlier editions of Durfey's 'Wit and Mirth, or Pills to Purge Melancholy'. The second volume of Playford's 'Dancing Master' (1713) is "carefully corrected by J. Lenton, one of Her Majesties Servants". The date of his death has not been ascertained, but it was probably soon after 1718, when his name disappears from the royal band. W. H. H., adds. A. L.

LENZ, Heinrich (Gerhard) (b. ?, c. 1764; d. Warsaw, 21 Aug. 1839).

Polish or German pianist and composer. He played at the Concert Spirituel, Paris, in 1785, and at Salomon's concerts in London in 1792. He went to Hamburg in 1795 and was engaged in the same year by Prince Louis Ferdinand of Prussia; but, supplanted by Dussek in 1802, he went by way of Halle to Warsaw, where he became teacher at the Conservatory in 1826 and retired on the dissolution of that institution in 1831.

Lenz composed 3 symphonies, concertos, solos and sonatas, with and without flute or violin, 9 pianoforte trios and songs. He published, in Polish, a handbook entitled 'Łatwy sposób strojenia fortepianu bez pomocy nauczyciela' ('Easy Method of Pianoforte Tuning without the Aid of a Teacher').

LENZ, Wilhelm von (b. Riga, 1 June 1809; d. St. Petersburg, 31 Jan. 1883).

Russian politician and writer on music, of German descent. He was a councillor at St. Petersburg and there published in 1852 his 'Beethoven et ses trois styles' in 2 vols., in which the idea, originally suggested by Fétis, that Beethoven's works may be divided into three separate epochs, was carried out to its utmost limits. This was followed by 'Beethoven: eine Kunststudie', in 6 vols. (I-III, Cassel, 1855-56, IV-VI, Hamburg, 1860). This is an entirely different work from the foregoing, and though often extravagant in expression, has a certain value from the writer's enthusiasm and the unwearied manner in which he collected facts of all kinds about Beethoven's works. He also published 'Die grossen Pianofortevirtuosen unserer Zeit' (Berlin, 1872), a collection of articles on Liszt, Chopin, Tausig, Henselt and many other great artists, from personal knowledge, well translated in 'The Monthly Musical Record' for 1878. 'Aus dem Tagebuche eines Livländers' appeared in Vienna, without date.

F. G.

The three periods marked out by Lenz in Beethoven's works as representing three distinctive styles are fixed arbitrarily, as indeed they could not fail to be, by whomsoever devised. It is impossible to classify any composer's music in such a way that the various aspects of the creative process — form, subject-matter, imagination, etc. — appear to have simultaneously arrived at the same stage of evolution. But as a rough classification Lenz's will perhaps do for Beethoven's work as well as any, though in arranging his list according to opus numbers he did not always bear in mind that they do not run chronologically throughout. His first period covers Opp. 1-21, the second Opp. 22-95 and the third Op. 96 to the end.

LEO DI MODENA (b. ?; d. ?).

Italian 16th-17th-century composer. He was a Jew of Mantua and wrote an essay on choral singing in the synagogue, published in Salomone Rossi's 'Schirha-Schirim' (Venice, 1623).

LEO, Leonardo (b. San Vito degli Schiavi nr. Brindisi, 5 Aug. 1694; d. Naples, 31 Oct. 1744).

Italian composer. His name is more correctly Leonardo Ortensio Salvatore de Leo. His birthplace is now called San Vito dei Normanni. His parents — who were not poor, as has been hitherto asserted — were Corrado de Leo and his wife Rosabetta, born Pinto. He went to Naples in 1709 and was admitted to the Conservatorio della Pietà dei Turchini as a paying pupil, remaining probably until 1713.

At Naples Leonardo must have studied first under Andrea Basso¹ and later under Nicola Fago, who was first master there in 1705-40. It has been stated that he was also a pupil of Pitoni at Rome and of Alessandro Scarlatti at Naples; but although his work was certainly much influenced by both these masters, he cannot have received direct tuition from either of them. He could not have gone to Rome for lessons while a student at a Neapolitan conservatory, and A. Scarlatti never taught at the Turchini.

Leo made his first appearance as a composer with a sacred drama on the subject of Santa Chiara, entitled 'L'infedeltà abbattuta', performed by the students of the conservatory during the Carnival of 1712, and repeated on 14 Feb. of that year at the royal palace, by command of the viceroy. Florimo names as his first composition another sacred drama, 'Il trionfo della castità di S. Alessio', produced on 4 Jan. 1713, at the Conservatory. The libretto was recently found at the Biblioteca Nazionale of Naples. Leo married on 14 June 1713 Anna Losi, a girl of seventeen, who bore him at least five children. His first secular opera was 'Pisistrato' (Teatro di San Bartolomeo, 13 May 1714), which was much admired. In Apr. 1713 the young composer was appointed supernumerary organist of the royal chapel without a salary, but in 1715 he received 9 ducats a month, and this was increased until it reached 14 ducats in 1725.

Leo also became maestro di cappella at the church of Santa Maria della Solitaria, which belonged to a convent of Spanish nuns. In 1718 he produced 'Sofonisba', at one time supposed to have been his first opera, and in any case the first which definitely established his reputation as a composer for the stage. The scores of most of his operas of this time have disappeared, and only the more important ones need be mentioned here. In 1722 he composed recitatives and comic scenes for Gasparini's 'Bajazette', first produced under the name of 'Tamerlano' at Venice in 1710. The comic scenes were written by Bernardo Saddumene, who afterwards became famous as a writer of comic librettos in Neapolitan dialect. This seems to have been the beginning of Leo's brilliant career as a composer of comic opera. 'La mpeca scoperta' ('L'imbroglio scoperto') was produced in 1723 at the Teatro dei Fiorentini, a theatre already celebrated for the comedies of A. Scarlatti and Leonardo Vinci, and was the first of a long series of successes in this line.

In 1725 Alessandro Scarlatti died, and a number of promotions took place on the staff of the royal chapel, Leo now becoming first organist. His fame now extended outside Naples. 'Timocrate' had been given at Venice in 1723, and in 1726 his 'Trionfo di Camilla' was produced at Rome. The charming pastoral "In van la gelosia", which occurs in this opera, enables us to fix the date of the Neapolitan comic opera 'La semeglianza di chi l'ha fatta', in which the same air is sung as a show-piece by one of the minor characters. In 1732 he produced his two celebrated oratorios 'La morte di Abele' and 'Sant' Elena al Calvario'. 'Demofonte', perhaps the most successful of all his operas, appeared in 1735; in this opera occur the well-known duet "La destra ti chiedo" and the pathetic air "Misero pargoletto", considered by Piccinni as a model of dramatic expression. In 1737 he was at Bologna for the production of 'Siface', which was given twenty-seven times at the Teatro Malvezzi, and for which the composer received 1595 lire. 'Farnace' (1737) was the last opera given at the old Teatro di San Bartolomeo before its final conversion into a church, the newly built San Carlo having taken its place as court theatre. Leo's 'L'Olimpiade' (1737) was the second opera performed there. In 1738 he composed 'Le nozze di Amore e di Psiche', a fiesta teatrale in honour of the marriage of Charles III with Maria Amalia Walburga of Saxony, and was so much taken up with this work that he was unable to finish the opera 'Demetrio', on which he was engaged, in spite of being imprisoned in his house and guarded by soldiers to ensure his working. He wrote the first act and part of the second, which was finished by Maio, Lorenzo Fago and Logroscino, the third being written by Riccardo Broschi, brother of Farinelli. The whole opera was, however, eventually finished by Leo himself and produced at Rome in 1742.

Leo's teaching appointments, which fall into this period, may be listed here:

Secondo maestro at the Turchini, Oct. 1734–23 Mar. 1737;

Primo maestro at the Conservatorio di Sant' Onofrio, 1 May 1739–44;

Primo maestro at the Turchini, 1 Jan. 1741 to his death (succeeding Nicola Fago).

Two important compositions belong to the year 1739: the celebrated Miserere and the comic opera 'Amor vuol sofferenze'. The 'Miserere' was composed in Mar., for the use of the royal chapel, and afterwards presented to King Charles Emmanuel of Savoy; Florimo tells a story of Leo's refusing to allow it to be copied after this, until his pupils contrived to do so secretly and perform it before him. 'Amor vuol sofferenze' is thus described with great delight by the Président Des Brosses to de Neuilly:

Nous avons eu quatre opéras à la fois sur quatre théâtres différents [i.e. San Carlo, Fiorentini, Nuovo and della Pace]. Après les avoir essayés successivement j'en quittai bientôt trois pour ne pas manquer une seule représentation de la Fresquatana, comédie en jargon dont la musique est de Leo . . . Quelle invention! Quelle harmonie! Quelle excellente plaisanterie musicale!

The heroine of the opera, Eugenia, disguises herself as a maidservant from Frascati: hence the title 'La finta Frascatana', under which the opera was revived at Bologna in 1742, and by which it was no doubt conveniently known at the time of its first production. It was also known as 'Il ciòè', from the absurd character Fazio, a muddle-headed person who is always explaining and contradicting himself with the word "ciòè" — "that is to say". In Nov. 1740 Leo went to Turin for the production of 'Achille in Sciro', and to Milan for that of 'Scipione nelle Spagne', being absent from Naples for four months. On Saturday morning, 31 Oct. 1744, he was found dead, having succumbed to apoplexy while seated at his harpsichord. He was buried at the church of Montesanto, the last resting-place of A. Scarlatti and many other musicians of his school.

At the time of his death Leo was engaged on a revised version of 'Amor vuol sofferenze'. He completed two arias and ten additional ones were afterwards composed by Matteo Capranica. There was also a revival under the title of 'La finta Frascatana' at the Teatro Nuovo, Naples, in the autumn of 1744.¹

In person Leo was of middle height and handsome features; in manner he was dignified and urbane. He was a man of serious character, working hard at night when his other occupations left him little opportunity for composition in the daytime, and so careful in the preparation of music for performance that he would begin on Ash Wednesday rehearsing the Miserere to be sung in Holy Week. As a teacher he was severe, but greatly beloved of his pupils, the most distinguished of whom were Piccinni and Jommelli.

Leo's fame as a composer rests chiefly on his sacred music and his comic operas. He was the first of the Neapolitan school to obtain a complete mastery over modern harmonic counterpoint. In the fugal movements of his psalms and masses he is entirely free from modal influences and careful to secure a strong rhythmic contrast between his subjects and counter-subjects, a means of effect but vaguely attempted by A. Scarlatti. Leo is, in this respect, an important factor in the development of modern scholastic counterpoint. In other respects he presents little that is new. His melody is flowing and dignified, but rarely passionate; his harmony clear and logical, with no attempt at romantic expression. Of his ecclesiastical style the 'Dixit Dominus' in C is a very typical specimen another 'Dixit Dominus', for ten voices and orchestra, in D major, exhibits similar qualities.

Of his masses that in D major for five voices and orchestra is the best; the well-known 'Miserere', and the series of Intros, etc., for Lent, composed in 1744, show a successful adaptation of old methods to modern needs of expression, combining poetic feeling with a studiously restrained style. His sacred music for solo voices is less severe in manner; we may mention the beautiful Lamentations for Holy Week, a graceful and florid 'Salve Regina' and a fine motet, 'Inter tot vana insana blandimenta', for soprano solo and double quartet of strings.

As a composer of serious opera Leo is not especially interesting, and the scarcity of his scores makes it difficult to trace his development. His comic operas, however, are full of life and humour. 'Amor vuol sofferenze' fully merits the praise bestowed on it by Des Brosses, and no more amusing plaisanterie musicale could be found than Fazio's great air, "Io non so dove mi sto", in which the mock-ecclesiastical accompaniment admirably illustrates the grotesque pomposity of the character. 'La semmeglianza' shows a keen sense of musical parody; and all the comic operas are full of sparkling and vivacious music, generally including one or two ensemble movements which are spirited, though never developed to a strong climax, either dramatic or musical. Mention must also be made of his instrumental music, which includes a Concerto for four violins and six admirable violoncello Concertos composed in 1737 and 1738, for the Duke of Maddaloni.

The best collection of Leo's operas was at Montecassino and is now housed in the Vatican; the British Museum and Fitzwilliam Museum afford the best materials for the study of his sacred music.

LÉONARD, Hubert (b. Bellaire, Belgium, 7 Apr. 1819; d. Paris, 6 May 1890).

Belgian violinist. He entered the Paris Conservatoire in 1836 and studied under Habeneck. He established his reputation as a brilliant player by a tour through Germany in 1844 and was the first to play Mendelssohn's violin Concerto in Berlin, under the composer. Later on he succeeded Bériot as first professor of the violin at the Brussels Conservatoire. In 1867 he resigned on account of ill-health and went to live in Paris. He was an eminently successful teacher and counted among his pupils many of the best modern Belgian, German and French violinists. Léonard was a brilliant virtuoso, excelling especially in arpeggios and staccato.

Madame Léonard (born Antonia Sitcher de Mendi (b. ? , 1831; d. Maisons-Lafitte, June 1914)), a niece of Manuel Garcia, gained much distinction in concert singing and was for many years a successful teacher of singing in Paris.

LEONARD, Lotte (b. Hamburg, 3 Dec. 1884).

German soprano singer and teacher. At the age of seventeen she began her studies at the Stern Conservatory in Berlin, first with Anna Wüllner, and then specialized in oratorio parts under Jeannette Grumbacher de Jong and in song under Therese Schnabel. After her début in 1914 she sang as soloist in the St. Matthew Passion under Furtwängler at Lübeck. After 1918 she was in constant collaboration with Siegfried Ochs, conductor of the Philharmonic Choir in Berlin, taking part in his concerts several times each year. From 1922 to 1930 she was soloist at the German Bach and Handel Festivals. She was the first German singer after the war of 1914-1918 to be invited to sing at Buenos Aires, where she gave a cycle 'Das deutsche Lied' and also sang at symphony concerts in the Teatro Colón. In 1927 she participated in the May Festival at Cincinnati.

In 1916 Lotte Leonard became teacher of singing at Bernuth's conservatory at Hamburg. From 1924 on she organized annual summer courses at Grundlsee in Austria, transformed in 1934 to a summer school of music under the direction of Egon Wellesz. In Oct. 1933 Lotte Leonard became Professeur de Chant at the Conservatoire International in Paris.

LEONCAVALLO, Ruggiero (b. Naples, 8 Mar. 1858; d. Montecatini nr. Florence, 9 Aug. 1919).

Italian composer. He was the son of a magistrate. His musical studies began with the pianoforte, which he learnt first from a musician named Sirl and afterwards from Simonetti, a teacher of some repute at Naples, the author of an 'Enciclopedia del pianista'. In due course Leoncavallo was admitted to the Neapolitan Conservatorio, where he became the pupil of Beniamino Cesi for the piano, of Michele Ruta for harmony and of Lauro Rossi for composition.

At the age of 18 he left the Conservatorio with the diploma of "maestro" and set to work upon an opera. His subject was the tragic story of Chatterton, the libretto being an adaptation of Alfred de Vigny's drama. At Bologna, whither he had gone to attend the great poet Carducci's lectures, he completed the opera and arranged for its production, but at the last moment the impresario decamped, leaving the unfortunate composer almost penniless. In despair Leoncavallo was compelled to undertake any work that would keep him from starvation. He gave lessons in singing and in pianoforte playing, and played accompaniments at café-concerts. In the latter capacity he travelled widely, visiting England, France, Holland and Germany, and going even as far as Cairo. After many years' wandering he returned to Italy and presented himself to the house of Ricordi with the scenario of a vast trilogy dealing with the history of the Renaissance in Italy, entitled 'Crepusculum', for which he had already completed the libretto of the first section, 'I Medici'. This latter was accepted, and in a year Leoncavallo had finished the music.

For three years he waited vainly in the hope of seeing his opera produced, and then betook himself in despair to the rival house of Sonzogno. There he was well received, and for this firm he wrote his 2-act opera 'Pagliacci', which was produced at the Teatro dal Verme, Milan, on 21 May 1892, with very great success. Leoncavallo's name soon became famous throughout Italy, and on 9 Nov. 1893 his 'Medici' was produced at the Teatro dal Verme. The work, which deals with the Pazzi conspiracy and the murder of Giuliano de' Medici, was a failure; and the composer, discouraged by its unfavourable reception, never completed, or at any rate never published, the remaining sections of the trilogy, 'Savonarola' and 'Cesare Borgia'. Leoncavallo's early opera, 'Chatterton', which was finally given at the Teatro Nazionale, Rome, on 10 Mar. 1896, was no more successful than 'I Medici', but 'La Bohème' (Teatro La Fenice, Venice, 6 May 1897), an adaptation of Henri Murger's novel, was far more favourably received, although handicapped by inevitable comparisons with Puccini's opera on the same subject, which had been produced with overwhelming success a few months earlier and was actually being played to crowded audiences at another theatre in Venice at the same time.

Leoncavallo's next opera, 'Zaza', an adaptation of the play by Berton and Simon, was produced at the Teatro Lirico, Milan, on 10 Nov. 1900, with fair success, and has subsequently been performed in Germany, Holland and Paris. 'Der Roland' was written in response to a commission of the Emperor William II, who heard 'I Medici' in Berlin in 1894 and believed that in the Italian poet and musician he had found a bard worthy of celebrating the glory of the house of Hohenzollern, as in 'I Medici' he had celebrated that of the great Florentine family. 'Der Roland' is founded upon Willibald Alexis's romance 'Der Roland von Berlin', which deals with the subjugation of Berlin by the Elector Frederick II. Of this work an Italian translation was made for Leoncavallo's benefit by the emperor's orders, from which he constructed his own libretto. This, after the music was finished, was translated back into German by Georg Droscher, and the opera was produced at the Royal Opera House in Berlin, on 13 Dec. 1904. In spite of the emperor's patronage and the favour of the court, 'Der Roland' attained no permanent success. It was, in fact, in his most ambitious works, such as this and 'I Medici', that Leoncavallo showed to least advantage. In operas of the type of 'Zaza' and 'Pagliacci' his strong feeling for theatrical effect served him well, but his musical inspiration was singularly deficient, and his more pretentious works were hardly more than strings of ill-digested reminiscences.

In 1910 two new operas by him were produced in Rome within four days of each other, 'Maia' in 3 acts, libretto by Paul de Choudens, at the Costanzi Theatre, 15 Jan. 1910, and 'Malbruk', a comic opera in 3 acts, libretto by Angelo Nessi (Teatro Nazionale, 19 Jan.).

Later works, of slight quality, were 'I zingari' (London, 1912), 'La reginetta delle rose' (Rome, 1912), 'Are you there?' (London, 1913), 'La candidata' (Rome, 1915), 'Goffredo Mameli' (Genoa, 1916), 'Prestami tua moglie' (Montecatini, 1916), 'Edipo re' (Chicago, 1920). Two posthumous operettas were, 'A chi la giarettiera' (Rome, 1919) and 'Il primo bacio' (Montecatini, 1923).

As a librettist Leoncavallo showed uncommon dramatic ability. Not only did he write the libretti for his own operas, but, like Boito, he occasionally placed his talent at the service of his friends, as in the case, for instance, of 'Mario Wetter', an opera by the Portuguese composer Augusto Machado. Apart from his operatic works Leoncavallo was the composer of a symphonic poem, 'Serafita', founded upon Balzac's novel, and of a ballet entitled 'La vita d'una marionetta'.

LEONETTI, Giovanni Battista (b. ? Crema, ?; d. ? Crema, ?).

Italian 16th-17th-century organist and composer. He was organist of the church of Sant' Agostino at Crema in 1617. He composed a book of masses for 8 voices and one of madrigals for 5 voices; also four madrigals for 6 voices contained in Orazio Scaletta's 'Affettuosi affetti' (1604).

LEONI, Giovanni Antonio (b. ?; d. ?).

Italian 16th-17th-century violinist and composer. He wrote 'Sonate di violino a voce sola di . . . lib. 1', Op. 3 (Rome, 1652). These 31 sonatas are among the earliest written for the violin. A motet by Leoni appears in a collective volume of 1625.

E. V. D. S.

LEONI, Leone (b. ?; d. ?).

Italian 16th-17th-century composer. He was maestro di cappella at Vicenza cathedral from 1588 at latest. His publications are five books of madrigals for 5 voices, containing 20 to 21 each (Venice, 1588-1602); 'Penitenza', a book of spiritual madrigals a 5, 21 numbers (1596); 'Sacri fiori', four books of motets for one to four voices with organ accompaniment (1606-22); 'Sacrae cantiones', Book 1, a 8, with double organ score, 20 numbers (1608); 'Psalmodia' with two Magnificats a 8 (1613); 'Aurea corona', concerti a 10 for 4 voices and 6 instruments, etc., 25 numbers (1615).

It will thus be seen that Leoni followed in the wake of Giovanni Gabrieli in the combining of voices and instruments, using the instruments obbligato. He belongs, in fact, to the Venetian school of composers, whose chief merit does not so much consist in the polyphonic interweaving of the separate voices in skillful and elaborate counterpoint, as in the variety and brilliance of colouring by expressive harmony and the contrasts of double choirs.

The works of Leoni which would seem to have been most valued by his contemporaries are his motets for double choir a 8, fifteen of which appear in the 'Promptuarium' of Schadaeus (1611) and four in the 'Flori-legium' of Bodenschatz (1621). Of these Ambros singles out two for special mention. A Passion motet, 'O Domine Jesu Christe adoro te', he describes as of an almost heavenly beauty, and of 'Petre amas me' he says that hardly anyone has given a more beautiful and touching expression to the rapturous utterance of divine love. In Torchi's 'L' arte musicale in Italia', Vol. II, there are two madrigals by Leoni from the volume of 1602, both interesting, one a nightingale echo song, the two upper voices meant to represent one nightingale echoing the other in canon.

LEONI, Michael (actually Myer Lyon) (b. ?; d. Kingston, Jamaica, 1797¹).

English tenor singer and composer. He was a Jew and uncle to John Braham. After being a chorister at the Great Synagogue in Aldgate, London, he made an appearance in opera at Covent Garden Theatre in the part of Arbaces, in T. A. Arne's 'Artaxerxes', in 1775, and the same year, on 21 Nov., he was the first Carlos in Sheridan and Linley's 'Duenna', appearing under the name of Michael Leoni. He sang in other Covent Garden operas, including Shield's 'Fitch of Bacon', in 1778. He then joined Giordani in the management of an English opera-house in Dublin, and was also engaged by Palmer for the Royalty Theatre. After remaining some time in England and Ireland, he was appointed "hazzan" at the synagogue at Kingston, Jamaica, being the first to hold that office in the English colonies.

Leoni's voice is said to have been of fine quality, surpassing even that of his talented nephew, John Braham. He composed small pieces for the theatre and for use in the Jewish ritual. The hymn-tune "Leoni" was named after him from the circumstance that he supplied Thomas Olivers, the hymn-writer, with it, the tune being sung as a 'Yigdal' in the synagogue. It was first published in a collection in 1781.

LEONIN (Leoninus) (b. ?; d. Paris, ?).

French 12th-century composer. He was maître de chapelle of the church of Beatae Mariae Virginis (later Notre-Dame de Paris) and the first great representative of the so-called Notre-Dame school. An anonymous English writer of the 13th century referred to him as "Magister Leoninus optimus organista", meaning that he was the leading composer of organa (not the best organist). This authority definitely assigns to him the composition of the 'Magnus Liber Organi de Gradali et Antiphonario pro servitio divino multiplicando'. This was a cycle of over eighty organa appropriate to all the liturgical festivals of the year. The pieces were in two parts, the second or duplus being a free counterpoint to the plainsong melody. They were substituted for the solo parts of the responsorial Gradual and Alleluia.

Léonin employs two techniques, which alternate within the same work. In one the plainsong melody is in enormously long notes and the organal part free and unmeasured in rhythm, with very complex melismata. In the other, which was called discantus style, the two parts move note for note, in rhythmic modes or patterns derived from troubadour music. The free melismatic style tends to be employed when the original plainsong melody is syllabic, the discantus technique when the plainchant is lyrically elaborate.²

Léonin's free organal melodies are of great length and sinuous power. They are closely related to the plainsong tropes, moving mainly by step or the pentatonic minor third. Larger leaps are infrequent, though passionate portamento-like sweeps may cover the range of an octave or more. Reese suggests that such portamenti may owe something to Arabian sources, by way of the troubadour influence.³

The 'Magnus Liber Organi' was compiled between 1160 and 1180 and was later revised and added to by Léonin's successor Pérotin. It has not come down to us in its original form, but in various manuscripts of which the most important are that at the Medicea-Laurenziana at Florence, the Wolfenbüttel Manuscript and the Toledo Codex.

LEONORE, OU L'AMOUR CONJUGAL ('Leonora, or Wedded Love'). Opera in 2 acts by Gaveaux. Libretto by Jean Nicolas Bouilly, based on an actual event. Produced Paris, Théâtre Feydeau, 19 Feb. 1798. 1st perf. abroad, Brussels, 29 June 1799. The work is historically important as the source of Beethoven's 'Fidelio', Sonnleithner's original libretto of which was a translation of Bouilly's. Paer wrote an opera on an Italian translation of 'Léonore', probably by Giacomo Cinti, 'Leonora, ossia L' amore coniugale', produced at Dresden, 3 Oct. 1804, before Beethoven's work appeared.

LEONOVA, Daria Mikhailovna (b. Tver, 1829; d. St. Petersburg, 1896).

Russian contralto singer. She had a compass of two-and-a-half octaves (g to c'''), bore one of the greatest names in the annals of Russian opera and was closely associated with such famous figures as Glinka, Dargomizhsky,

Rimsky-Korsakov, Stassov and Mussorgsky. She appeared with the celebrated Petrov in Glinka's 'Life for the Tsar' and in its composer's second opera, 'Russlan and Ludmila', and was to have taken part as Grunia in his proposed but abortive opera 'The Bigamist'. Later she figured in two of Scrov's, 'Rogneda' (1865) and 'The Power of Evil' (1871), in Cui's 'William Ratcliff' (1869) and in Rimsky-Korsakov's 'Pskovitianka' ('Ivan the Terrible') in 1873. She created the parts of the Innkeeper in Mussorgsky's 'Boris Godunov' and of Martha in his 'Khovanshchina'.

Leonova's name occurs in a number of letters from Glinka to his sister and to various friends in 1855 and the following year. He first refers to her as his pupil, but later describes her as "the celebrated St. Petersburg operatic artist" who is shortly to give some concerts in Moscow. In a letter to the singer, dated Mar. 1855, Glinka announces the gift of the complete edition of his songs as a token of his admiration of her beautiful voice and admirable talent. It becomes clear in the more confidential letters to his sister that the relationship of teacher and pupil has become somewhat more intimate. Hints of this are conveyed in French. Thus, after "elle a été tout à fait excellente pour moi" has occurred in two successive letters, he expresses the belief that "elle a véritablement d'amitié pour moi . . . more of this when we meet". Finally, "Je crois que cette personne m'est véritablement dévouée" appears to suggest that a mutual understanding has been reached.

Writing years later, when Leonova had reached the zenith of her career and had just returned from a triumphant tour of China, Japan, South America and many European centres, Stassov refers to her as among the greatest; the eminent critic goes astray, however, in stating that Glinka composed his song 'Tears' for her, for the composer divulges in a letter that Leonova wrote the melody and modestly confesses that he "did the rest". With Dargomizhsky her transactions were not confined to receiving his artistic advice, for he paid her the tribute of allotting the part of the Princess in his 'Russalka' — first performed in May 1856. Rimsky-Korsakov, who had first heard her in 'A Life for the Tsar' in 1859 and was destined to see her in the first performance of his own 'Pskovitianka' fourteen years later, suggests in his Memoirs that she might have reached greater heights had she resorted to himself for artistic counsel. He is describing the period during which she befriended the unfortunate Mussorgsky. In 1879 that composer joined her in a three months' concert tour of southern Russia. She had recently opened a small academy of singing at which Mussorgsky acted in the capacity of supervisor of studies. By this time he was nearing his end and, aware that he was penniless and without a home, Leonova offered him the shelter of her villa at Oranienbaum, where he hastened to complete the orchestration of 'Khovanshchina'. According to Rimsky-Korsakov, Leonova was then past her prime, but she was able nevertheless to make a singularly impressive appearance at the Mussorgsky memorial concert in Nov. 1881, at which she sang the dead composer's pathetic song 'Left Behind' and his 'Song of the Flea' with striking dramatic emphasis. LEOPOLD I, Emperor (b. Vienna, 9 June 1640; d. Vienna, 5 May 1705).

The half-century of his reign (1658–1705) was one of the most splendid periods in the history of the imperial court music. Vienna became, under the direction of the chapel-masters Bertali, Sances, Schmelzer and Draghi, one of the chief centres of Italian music, and about 400 new works — operas and oratorios — were performed there during that time. Besides being a generous protector of music and musicians, Leopold was a talented performer on several instruments and a prolific composer. He contributed numerous airs to A. Draghi's operas and on his own wrote one or two Italian operas and incidental music for some German and Spanish plays¹ performed at court. He also composed about a dozen oratorios (two of them in German), of which 'S. Antonio di Padova' and 'Il transito di S. Giuseppe' were repeated many times, the latter as late as 1730. Besides, extant works of his are in the Austrian State Library: 20 motets, 2 masses, 12 hymns, 9 psalms, 4 litanies and other sacred compositions, also more than 100 balletti (short orchestral dance pieces), etc. A selection of 10 sacred and 86 secular compositions (together with some works by his predecessor, Ferdinand III and his successor, Joseph I) were published by Guido Adler ('Musikalische Werke der Kaiser . . .', 2 vols. 1892–93). Other manuscripts are in the libraries of Berlin, Bologna, Uppsala, etc. A. L.

LEOPOLITA (Leopopolitanus, "Lwowieczyk"), Marcin (b. Lwów, c. 1540; d. Lwów, 1589).

Polish composer. Although, according to

Szymon Starowolski¹, he was educated at Cracow University, it is still uncertain whether or not he was a pupil of Sebastian Felsztynski. On 1 May 1560 Leopolita became royal court composer (compositor cantus), but about four years later he was succeeded by Marcin Wartecki (1564). He returned to Lwów, where he remained until his death. Although he enjoyed great fame among his countrymen and although his works were performed frequently at the Roratist Chapel, not a single work by him was published during his lifetime. Many of his works are lost.

In 1880 Father Polkowski discovered in the archives of the Wawel cathedral chapter three 5-part Masses by Leopolita: 'Missa paschalis', 'Missa Rorate' and 'Missa de Resurrectione', the first of which was published by Father Surzyński in 'Monumenta Musices Sacrae in Polonia' (Vol. III) in 1889.

According to Starowolski Leopolita also wrote an 'Ode to St. Martin', set to Latin words written by the composer himself, as well as 'Śpiewy na cały rok kościelny' (Totius anni cantus), the first work of that kind ever written in Poland.

Some of his 5-part motets remain:

- 'Mihi autem nimis honorati.'
- 'Cibavit eos ex odipe frumenti.'
- 'Spiritus Domini replevit orbem terrarum.'
- 'Resurgente Christo Domino.'

The few works by Leopolita which remain bear the stamp of unusual talent, skill and craftsmanship. In his 'Missa paschalis' he introduced four Polish Easter hymns, widely popular among the people. One of each supplies one strand among many in his web of sound. Then the first hymn appears in one part while the others are in the 2nd, 3rd, 4th or 5th voice and vice versa, but embellished with contrapuntal counter-melodies. The method employed is perfection and the effect it gives is one of serenity and devotion, austerity and gravity, from which all human passion is eliminated. The frequent appearance of stretti in imitation and the increase to six parts in the first 'Agnus Dei', which is the culminating point in the whole Mass², show how well Leopolita was acquainted with the secrets of counterpoint and what a master of polyphony he was.

LEOZ, Jesús García (b. Olite, Navarre, 10 Jan. 1904; d. Madrid, 23 Feb. 1953).

Spanish composer. He studied the organ at Pamplona with Munarriz, the organist of the Cathedral, and in Madrid; also harmony and counterpoint with Conrado del Campo and composition with Turina. At the Madrid Conservatory he was a prize-winner in pianoforte and composition. In 1938 his 'Three Dances for Orchestra' were performed by the Orquesta Sinfónica under the direction of Arbós. Among other orchestral works should be mentioned his Symphony in A♭ major, which was played in 1949 by the National Orchestra, Madrid, under the direction of Argenta. Among the chamber music works of Leoz are a Sonata for violin and pianoforte, a string Quartet and a pianoforte Quartet. He also composed various works for pianoforte and music for the following ballets: 'La Noche de San Juan', 'La zapatera y el embozado', 'Sacromonte', and 'Vida española'. Leoz's music is colourful and full of rhythmic variety, with a gift for genuine melody. For this reason he was in great demand in Spain as a composer for ballets. In his later years he devoted himself to the cinema and wrote the music for the following films: 'El abandonado', 'Eugenia de Montijo' (the story of the life of the Empress Eugénie), 'La maja del capote', 'Las inquietudes de Shanti Andía' (based upon a work by the celebrated novelist Pio Baroja), 'La manigua sin Dios', 'El santuario no se rinde', 'Cuatro mujeres' and 'Un hombre va por el camino'. w. s.

His principal instruments are the great organ of the Cordeliers at Toulouse (1727) and that of the Cathedral at Lodève (1752). He was nearly eighty years of age at his death.

(2) Jean François Lépine, jun. (b. Toulouse, 18 July 1732; d. Pézenas, 30 July 1817), son of the preceding. He was a pupil and friend of Dom Bédos and the most celebrated of the family. He established his factory at Pézenas. His principal instruments are the organ at Pézenas (1757), the reconstruction of the organ in the church at Saint-Just de Narbonne (1770-71) and the organ of the Cathedral of Saint-Pierre at Montpellier (1776-80), 48 stops and 3471 pipes.

(3) Adrien Lépine (b. Toulouse, 15 July 1735; d. Paris, ?), brother of the preceding. He established himself in Paris about 1758 and there became the brother-in-law of François

Henri Clicquot. In 1767 he restored the great organ of Nantes Cathedral, in 1777 constructed that of the Church of La Chapelle near Saint-Denis and in 1778 restored that of the Church of Saint-Médard in Paris. In 1772 he submitted to the Académie des Sciences (T.I., p. 109) a system of forte piano organisé, of his own invention. L'ÉPINE, (Francesca) Margherita de (b. ?; d. London, 9 or 10 Aug. 1746¹).

Italian or (?) Franco-Italian soprano singer.² From Italy she went to England with a German musician named Greber, and she was often called "Greber's Peg" by the wits of the day. An advertisement in the 'London Gazette' (No. 2834) in 1692 announces that the Italian lady (that is lately come over that is so famous for her singing) though it has been reported that she will sing no more in the consort at York-buildings; yet this is to give notice, that next Tuesday Jan. 10th, she will sing there, and so continue during the season.

A fortnight later this "lady" is more familiarly called the "Italian woman" in the notice given in the 'Gazette' that she would not only sing at York Buildings every Tuesday, but on Thursday in Freeman's Yard, Cornhill. In May 1703 she received "20 ggs for one day's singing in y^e play call'd the Fickle Shepherdess". In the theatrical advertisement for Lincoln's Inn Fields, 1 June 1703, it is said that "Signora Francesca Margarita de l'Épine will sing, being positively the last time of her singing on the stage during her stay in England". She continued, however, to sing during the whole of that month; nor did she ever leave England, but remained till the time of her death.

On 29 Jan. 1704 Margherita de L'Épine sang, for the first time, at Drury Lane Theatre. On her second appearance there was a disturbance in the theatre while she was singing, the instigation of which was attributed to her rival, Mrs. Tofts, whose servant was, indeed, one of the principal agents in it. Mrs. Tofts, however, indignantly denied this in a letter to Rich, printed in the 'Daily Courant' of 8 Feb. 1704. In 1705 'Arsinoë' was produced, as announced in the 'Daily Courant':

a new opera, after the Italian manner, all sung, being set by Master Clayton, with dances and singing before and after the opera, by Signoar F. Margarit a de l'Épine.

This singing was probably in Italian. She sang in Saggione's 'Temple of Love' the year after and in 1707 in 'Thomyris', the music taken from Scarlatti and Bononcini, the recitatives and accompaniments being added by Pepusch. She sang also in 'Camilla', performing her part in Italian, while the English singers sang their own language. These parts she repeated in 1708, and in 1709 added that of Marius in Scarlatti's 'Pyrrhus and Demetrius', arranged for the English stage by McSwiny and Haym. In 1710 she sang in 'Almahide', that opera, the first ever performed wholly in Italian on the English stage, the names of neither poet nor composer of which are known; and again in 'Hydaspes'. In addition to these she took part in 'Antiochus' and 'Ambleto', and in Handel's 'Pastor fido' and 'Rinaldo' in 1712; and in the pasticcio 'Ernelinda' and Handel's 'Teseo' in 1713. She continued to sing until 1718, when she married Pepusch and retired from the stage. She is said to have brought him a fortune of £10,000.

Her execution was of a very different order [from that of the English singers of that time] and involved real difficulties. Indeed, her musical merit must have been very considerable to have kept her so long in favour on the English stage, where, till employed at the opera, she sang either in musical entertainments, or between the acts, almost every night. Besides being out-landish, she was so swarthy and ill-favoured, that her husband used to call her Hecate, a name to which she answered with as much good humour as if he had called her Helen [Burney].

She is said to have been an excellent musician, not only as a singer, but also as an extraordinary performer on the harpsichord.

German 17th–18th-century organist. He was organist of the Domkirche³ at Halle from 1697 to 1702, when he was removed from his post by Frederick of Prussia owing to his dissolute manner of living, and was succeeded by the seventeen-year-old G. F. Handel. Handel was a Lutheran, but was appointed to this post, a fitting member of the Reformed Church not being obtainable. It is most important to realize that it was Leporin who was the author of the scandals with which many Handel biographers (starting with Mainwaring, who was followed by Schoelcher) have burdened Friedrich Wilhelm Zachau, Handel's master. Zachau's name has been finally cleared (after a general mention of the falseness of the accusations by Mattheson in his 'G. F. Händels Lebensbeschreibung') by Chrysander (I, 61).

LE ROUX, Gaspard (b. Paris, c. 1660; d. ? Paris, c. 1707).

French harpsichordist and composer. Practically nothing is known of his life. Although he won fame, he disappeared quite young, leaving only one large work in manuscript. He was, says Sébastien de Brossard, a celebrated master of the clavecin and an excellent musician.

The career of Gaspard Le Roux appears to have been at the earliest from 1685 to 1707 at the latest. In 1690 the 'Mercure' published an 'Air spirituel' in which the basso continuo is indicated as having been written by "M. le Roux, fameux maître de musique". In 1692 his name appears among the Parisian professors of the clavecin in the 'Livre d'adresses' of Blegny du Pradel. In 1695, in the list of organists and clavecinists established for taxation, he appears to hold a good position, for he is taxed at the highest rate. He paid 15 livres, like Couperin, Garnier, Marchand, Le Bègue and some others.

In 1701 he published in the collection of 'Airs sérieux et à boire' (Ballard) an 'Air sérieux' of delicate grace, written in a key more instrumental than vocal (F# minor). On 21 Apr. 1705 he took a copyright of ten years for the impression and the rights of sale of his principal work: a collection of his 'Pièces de clavessin' which appeared in that year, and which did not pass unnoticed, for the book was soon pirated by a Dutch publisher. In his preface the author gives no details about himself. He announces that he will include "d'autres morceaux de musique plus grands et plus relevés", probably his motets, of which some are preserved in Brossard's copies. The promise was not kept, and after the appearance of the 'Livre de clavecin' no trace of Le Roux's existence is to be found.

This clavecinist did not merit the oblivion into which he fell immediately after his death. If, in their traditional form, his pieces belong to the first school of French harpsichord music, the school of Chambonnières and Le Bègue, they show by certain signs of style that they are the work of a contemporary of Couperin who knew and appreciated the Italian sonatas.

The melodic themes, on the other hand, suggest a personal style; they show a fine sensibility and are quite modern at times. Keys rare at that time are employed for choice. The harmonies are subtle and have racial characteristics. The book of Gaspard Le Roux, in some ways in advance of his time, is certainly one of the best which appeared in France between those of Chambonnières and those of Couperin.

It should be noted that Le Roux's pieces can be played, following his own indications, in three different ways: (1) on the harpsichord alone; (2) on two harpsichords, an arrangement which Couperin also advocated; (3) as instrumental trios (violins and bass) in which the three separate parts are usually printed at the foot of the pages, below the harpsichord version.

Le Roux's motets, in the classic French style inaugurated by Du Mont and Lully and illustrated by Lalande, are also works of value, to judge by the three specimens in the Brossard Collection. Those for two or three voices with single basso continuo are brilliantly and expressively written.

LEROUX, Xavier (Henry Napoléon) (b. Velletri, Italy, 11 Oct. 1863; d. Paris, 2 Feb. 1919).

French composer. He was a pupil of Massenet at the Paris Conservatoire, where he gained in 1881 a second accessit for piano-forte and a first prize for harmony; in 1882 a second prize for counterpoint and an honourable mention for the Prix de Rome; in 1884 a first prize for counterpoint and the second Prix de Rome. Finally, in 1885, he took the Prix de Rome itself with the cantata 'Endymion'.

After his return to Paris from Rome Leroux began to make a name as a dramatic composer, and in 1896 he was appointed professor of harmony at the Conservatoire, a post he retained until his death. He also edited 'Musica' and founded the Conservatoire Musica. He wrote a Mass with orchestra, motets, lyric scene 'Vénus et Adonis', overture 'Harald', numerous songs, etc. His dramatic works are the following:

LE ROY (Leroy), Adrien (b. ?; d. Paris, ? 1589).

French singer, lutenist, composer and music printer. He was established in Paris and worked with the types of Le Bé (cut in 1540), as Attaignant had done before him with those of Hautin. Fétis states that he worked by himself for some time, but cites no evidence. In 1551 Le Roy married the sister of Robert Ballard, who was already occupying himself with music printing and was attached to the court; they joined in partnership and obtained a patent, dated 16 Feb. 1552, as sole printers of music to Henri II. In 1571 Le Roy received Lassus as his guest and published a volume of moduli for him, with a dedication to Charles IX.

Le Roy's name disappears from the publications of the firm in 1589, and it may be inferred that he died then. His instruction book for the lute (1557)¹ was translated into

English in two different versions, one by Alford (London, 1568) and one by "F. K. Gentleman" (London, 1574). A second work of his was a short and easy instruction book for the "guiterne" or guitar (1578); a third is a book of airs de cour for the lute (1571), in the dedication of which he says that such airs were formerly known as voix de ville.² Besides these the firm published, between 1551 and 1568, twenty books of 'Chansons' for four voices.

LE ROY, Bartholomeo (b. ? Burgundy, ?; d. ? Naples, ?).

Italian 16th-century composer of French descent. He was maestro di cappella to the viceroy of Naples in 1583-98. A Mass of his was published together with one by Palestrina (Venice, 1585). He also wrote madrigals, songs and an instrumental movement.

LE ROY, René (b. Maisons-Laffitte, Seine-et-Oise, 4 Mar. 1898).

French flautist. At the age of nine he began to study the flute with Hennebains, entered the Paris Conservatoire in 1916, in Lafleurance's class, and took a brilliant first-class prize in 1918. He then became a pupil of Philippe Gaubert, whom he succeeded as soloist in the Société des Instruments à Vent, founded by Taffanel. Later he formed a new group, the Quintette Instrumental de Paris. Both alone and with this group he made numerous concert tours through Europe with a growing success. A number of pieces were heard for the first time played by him, including the 'Sérénade' dedicated to him by Albert Roussel (1925) and d'Indy's 'Suite en parties' for quintet.

M. P.

LERT, Ernst (Joseph Maria) (b. Vienna, 12 May 1883).

Austrian conductor, opera producer and writer. He studied the history of music and art at Vienna University (Ph.D.) and operatic production with Mahler. After a short appointment at Freiburg i/B. he became in 1912 first producer and drama director of the Municipal Theatre of Leipzig, where he remained for seven years. Then followed appointments as general manager of the Municipal Theatre of Basel (1919-20) and Frankfurt o/M. (1920-23). In 1923-29 Lert was director of the German department at the Teatro alla Scala, Milan (with Toscanini as conductor), and he worked as a guest producer at Genoa, Venice and the Salzburg Festivals, and in Spain and South Africa. In 1939 he went to live in the U.S.A. as head of the opera departments of the Curtis Institute of Music, Philadelphia, and the Peabody Conservatory of Music, Baltimore. In addition he produced operas at the New York Metropolitan Opera and on other American stages.

Lert's speciality is the staging of Mozart's operas, a subject on which he has written a valuable study, 'Mozart auf dem Theater' (4th ed., 1920). He is also greatly interested in modern opera. The first performances for which he has been responsible include Bartók's 'Bluebeard's Castle' and 'The Woodcut Prince', Hindemith's 'Sancta Susanna' and Wellesz's 'Prinzessin Ginnara'.

K. G.

LERT, Richard (b. Vienna, 19 Sept. 1885).

Austrian conductor, brother of the preceding. After engagements at several smaller theatres he became Generalmusikdirektor at Mannheim and in 1929-32 was conductor at the Berlin State Opera. In 1939 he settled as conductor at Los Angeles.

German 17th-18th-century lutenist and composer of French origin. He was in the service of Baron von Neidhardt at Breslau in 1695. Johann Kaspar Kropfgans was his pupil. He is known by the work 'Philipp Franz Le Sage de Richée | Cabinet | Der | Lauten | In Welchem zu finden, 12 Neue Partien | . . .' (described in M.f.M., XXI, 10 & 11, with musical examples.

LESCHETIZKY, Theodor (actually Teodor Leszetycki) (b. Łańcut, Poland, 22 June 1830; d. Dresden, 14 Nov. 1915).

Polish pianist, teacher and composer. He received his first lessons in pianoforte playing from his father, Józef Leszetycki, who, when pensioned by Countess Potocki, took his family to live in Vienna, where he was able to listen to the best music and hear the greatest artists of that time. At the age of eleven he became a pupil of Czerny and at the age of fifteen he began to take pupils himself. He seems to have been a prodigy, not only in playing but in teaching as well, for he was soon fully occupied. Though he had begun to teach, he did not neglect his own studies, took lessons in counterpoint from Sechter and spent hours of concentrated study on the technique of pianoforte playing.

In 1852 Leschetizky moved to Russia. His début in St. Petersburg brought him a small circle of pupils which very soon grew into a large one. His fame as a pianist had preceded him, and shortly after his début he was invited to appear before the tsar. He was befriended by Anton Rubinstein, who, wishing to go on tour, asked Leschetizky to deputize for him until his return. Leschetizky's duties included the arranging of all the music at the imperial court, giving singing lessons to the daughter of the grand duchess and to one of her ladies-in-waiting, Mlle de Friedebourg, who possessed one of the most beautiful voices he had ever heard. In 1856 he married her. Sixteen years later they were divorced.

In 1862, when the St. Petersburg Conservatory was opened under the directorship of Anton Rubinstein, Leschetizky became head of the pianoforte department there. Besides his pedagogic activities he toured widely in Russia, Poland and Germany, both as pianist and as conductor. Speaking of his activities as conductor he said: "Conducting is not difficult. It is harder to play six bars well on the pianoforte than to conduct the whole of Beethoven's ninth Symphony." An exaggerated opinion which, however, explains his stubbornness in insisting on his pupils' spending hours on detailed study and knowing their music "inside out".

In 1864 Leschetizky visited England for the first time, making his début at the Musical Union concerts, where he played in Schumann's Quintet and some of his own pianoforte compositions. He revisited England several times. In 1878 he returned to Vienna. He bought a house and settled down. Two years later he was married again, to his former pupil of the St. Petersburg days, Annette Essipova, herself a fine pianist (1880-92). His two subsequent marriages were to his secretary Donnimirska-Benislavka (1892-1908) and another pupil, Marie Gabriele Rozborska (1908). The latter made her appearance in London as Mme Leschetizky in the year of her marriage.

Leschetizky wrote two operas: 'Die Brüder von San Marco', which remained in manuscript and was never produced, and 'Die erste Falte' (libretto by Salomon Mosenthal), which was staged in Prague with great success on 9 Oct. 1867 and at Wiesbaden in 1880. He also wrote numerous little pianoforte pieces of the morceaux de salon type. But his fame rests mainly on his teaching methods. He educated a whole generation of world-famous pianists, headed by Paderewski. His classes consisted of pupils of various nationalities. His opinion of the different national types is worth paraphrasing from A. Hullah (see Bibl.):

The English are good musicians, good workers and bad executants, doing by work what the Slavs do by instinct; their heads serving them better than hearts. Russians have passion, dramatic power, elemental force and extraordinary vitality. Turbulent natures, difficult to keep within bounds, but making wonderful players when they have the patience to endure to the end. Poles, less strong and rugged than the Russians, lean more to the poetical side of music; originality is to be found in all they do; refinement, an exquisite tenderness and instinctive rhythm. The French he compared to birds of passage, flying lightly up in the clouds, unconscious of what lies below. They are dainty, crisp, clear-cut in their playing and they phrase well. The Germans possess earnestness, patient devotion to detail, orderliness and intense and humble love of their art, but their outlook is a little grey. The Americans he finds more spontaneous. Accustomed to keep all their faculties in readiness for the unexpected, their perceptions are quick and they possess considerable technical facility. They study perhaps more for the sake of being up-to-date than for the love of music. He loved the Italians because they are Italians, though they could not, as a rule, play the pianoforte in the very least.

Leschetizky experienced many failures and dark days, but they did not make him either cynical or apathetic. He was patient; he knew what he wanted; he did not insist on subduing but on developing the characteristic qualities of each individual student. He was beloved and adored by his pupils, respected and recognized as teacher, and befriended by those who had the privilege of being acquainted with him.

LESLIE, Henry (David) (b. London, 18 June 1822; d. Llansaintfraild nr. Oswestry, 4 Feb. 1896).

English conductor and composer. He began his musical education under Charles Lucas in London in 1838. For several years he played the cello at the Sacred Harmonic Society and elsewhere. In 1847, on the formation of the Amateur Musical Society, he was appointed its honorary secretary, and he continued so until 1855, when he became its conductor, which post he retained until the dissolution of the Society in 1861. The choir which bore his name was actually formed by Joseph Heming in 1853 and conducted at first by Frank Moir; Leslie undertook the leadership in 1855, and the first concert took place in 1856. At first the number of voices was limited to about sixty, but afterwards it was increased to 240, so that a large work could replace the madrigals for the sake of which the choir was originally founded. In 1878 it gained the first prize in the International Competition of choirs in Paris.

In 1863 Leslie was appointed conductor of the Herefordshire Philharmonic Society, an amateur body at Hereford. In 1874 he became the director and conductor of the Guild of Amateur Musicians in London. In 1880 his choir was broken up; it was subsequently reorganized under Randegger, and in 1885-87 Leslie resumed its management.

Leslie's compositions were numerous and included practically every form. Not now considered important, they include the operas 'Romance' (Covent Garden, 1860), 'Ida' (Covent Garden, 1865) and 'Bold Dick Turpin' (St. James's Theatre, 1878); 2 oratorios, cantatas and other vocal works; 2 symphonies and an overture; a pianoforte Quintet; many songs, etc.

His son, William Henry Perry Leslie (b. London, 1860; d. Llansaintfraild nr. Oswestry, 23 May 1926), united something of his father's musical gifts and enthusiasm with a successful business career. He was a member of Lloyd's (Godwin & Leslie) and furthered various societies for amateur music in connection with Lloyd's. As a director of John Broadwood & Son he promoted the interesting concerts given by that firm in London. He was a member of the Council of the R.C.M. and Master of the Musicians' Company (1924). His most individual work for music, however, was accomplished in the singing-festivals and competitions which he organized in the neighbourhood of his country estate in Wales, at which his father had died.

LESSARD, John Ayres (b. San Francisco, 3 July 1920).

American composer. In composition he was a pupil of Nadia Boulanger, having studied with her at the Longy School of Boston and at the École Normale de Musique in Paris. Among his awards have been the Cabot Fellowship from Harvard University in 1940-1941, the Ditson Fellowship from Columbia University in 1945 and a Guggenheim Fellowship in 1946. Lessard was in the U.S. army for the years between 1942 and 1945. His works, still few in number, are finely constructed and tastefully stylized in the neo-classic manner. He has not so far shown a great independence of thought within the bounds of the aesthetic and technique of the "School of Paris".

The following are his chief works:

- Overture for orch. (1946).
 'Bos Hill' Overture (1946).
 Vn. Concerto (1941).
 'Cantilena' for oboe & stg. orch. (1946).
 Quintet for vn., viola, cello, flute & clar. (1943).
 Pf. Sonata No. 1 (1944).
 Pf. Sonata No. 2 (1945).

LESSEL, Franciszek (known as Franz Lessel) (b. Puławy, c. 1780; d. Piotrków, 26 Dec. 1838).

Polish composer. He was the son of Wincenty Lessel, who about the time of his son's birth became court musician to Prince Czartoryski. In 1797 he went to Vienna to study medicine, but the love of music prevailed and he turned to its study. He became Haydn's favourite pupil and repaid that master with the ardent devotion of a son. A year after Haydn's death he returned to Poland (1810) and lived with Prince Czartoryski's family at Puławy, occupied entirely with music. After the unsuccessful uprising against tsarist Russia (1830-31) the Czartoryskis were forced to leave Poland, and Lessel was faced with disastrous vicissitudes; but, being a man of great energy and varied cultivation, he managed to maintain himself. In 1837, feeling a presentiment of approaching death, he composed his Requiem and died soon after completing the work of a disease commonly spoken of as a "broken heart".

He left symphonies (the number of them unknown), chamber music, also church music, such as a Mass 'Zum Cäcilientag', the latter especially indicating talent of no common order. Among his effects were some autographs of Haydn presented by that master. Some of Lessel's works were published by Artaria, Weigl and Breitkopf & Härtel, among them being three pianoforte Sonatas (Op. 2) dedicated to Haydn; a Trio (Op. 5), a 'Fantasia' for pianoforte (Op. 8) dedicated to Clementi, an 'Adagio and Rondo' for pianoforte and orchestra (Op. 9), an overture (Op. 10) and yet another 'Fantasia' (Op. 13) dedicated to the object of his first love, Cecily Beidale; a pianoforte Concerto (Op. 14) and many songs widely popular among the Polish emigrants in France, Italy, England and Switzerland after 1831.

Lessel's pianoforte Concerto has been revived by Zbigniew Drzewiecki, who included it into his repertory.

LESSEL, Wincenty (b. Bohemia, c. 1750; d. Poland, ?).

Polish composer of Bohemian origin, father of the preceding. He received his musical education in Germany under Adam Hiller and Dittersdorf as well as under J. G. Schürer at Dresden, where during the years 1766-79 he played as a violist in the court orchestra. In 1779 he went to Warsaw and the next year he moved to Puławy as court harpsichordist, composer and tutor to the children of Prince Czartoryski. In 1787 Lessel became conductor of the prince's court orchestra. In 1825 he still lived at Puławy, the prince's estate.

The following compositions by Wincenty Lessel were published during his lifetime:

'Ariette pour le clavecin ou pianoforte, varié . . .' (Vienna, 1800).

'8 Polonaises' (Vienna, 1800).

Polonaise in B♭ ma., publ. by J. Elsner (Breslau, 1805).

'Pieśń do Boga', publ. by Horoszkiewicz (1889).

But his more ambitious and important works have remained in manuscript. They include incidental music for two plays: 'Matka Spartanka' ('The Spartan Mother') by F. D. Książnin (1787) and 'Pielgrzym z Dobromila' ('The Pilgrim from Dobromil'); an operetta, 'Dwaj strzelcy i mleczarka'

('Two Huntsmen and the Milkmaid', 1804)¹; melodrama, 'Piast' (1800); a pantomime (Puławy, 1805); a cantata for the consecration of the Protestant Church; musical comedy, 'Plotka' ('The Roach') (1805); many instrumental works, such as Sonata for pianoforte 4 hands, polonaises, military marches, organ preludes, as well as a 'Sinfonia' composed for his son's birthday.

LESSON (Fr. leçon). A general 17th-century name in England, as a rule for a keyboard piece primarily useful for teaching, but not therefore inferior in musical value if written by a good composer. The term survived well into the 18th century, when it came to be generally applied to the separate pieces which in their collected form made up a suite.

The pieces often illustrated different styles of playing and were sometimes arranged in order of difficulty. This is borne out by the fact that Domenico Scarlatti's 'Forty-two Lessons for the Harpsichord', edited by Mr. Roseingrave² are in the original edition called 'Esercizi—XXX Sonatas per gravicembalo', though they have little of the educational element in them.³ Rameau's 'Lessons for the Harpsichord', Opp. 2 and 3, are not arranged in order of difficulty, but are connected by the relation of their keys. In the case of Handel's '3 Leçons', the first consists of a prelude and air with variations in B♭ major, the second of a minuet in G minor and the third of a chaconne in G major; so they may be presumed to be intended for consecutive performance. His 'Suites de pièces pour le clavecin', in two books, were called 'Lessons' in the first edition, but in the later editions this name was discarded for that which they now bear. Instances of the use of the word to indicate a composition in three movements are to be found in the works of many 18th-century composers.⁴

Although in general the name was applied to pieces for the harpsichord alone⁴, it was sometimes used for concerted chamber music, as in the 'Firste Booke of consort lessons' collected by Thomas Morley (London, 1611) and in Mathias Vento's 'Lessons for the Harpsichord with accompaniment of Flute and Violin'.

LESTAINIER, Jean (b. Mechlin, c. 1515; d. Mechlin or Augsburg, Mar. 1551).

Netherlands composer. He became a choir-boy at the church of Saint-Rombaud in his native town under the organist Remi van der Meulen. In 1540 he was assistant organist at the court of the Emperor Charles V and a prebendary of Hainault and Valenciennes. In 1547 he was still in court service, by that time as organist in Madrid. He accompanied the emperor to Germany in 1547-48, and by 1550 he held further church benefices at Ghent and Soignies. His death is recorded at St. John's Church, Mechlin, but, as the emperor was at Augsburg at the time, it is possible that Lestainier was with him and died there.

Two motets by Lestainier are in Sigismund Salminer's collection 'Cantiones selectissimae' (Augsburg, 1548-49), and one of them, 'Anima mea turbata est', reappeared in Vol. VI of 'Evangelia dominicorum' (Nuremberg, 1554-56). E. B.

LESUEUR, Jean François (b. Drucat-Plessiel nr. Abbeville, 15 Feb. 1760; d. Paris, 6 Oct. 1837).

French composer. He was a great-nephew of the painter Eustache Lesueur and became a chorister at Abbeville at the age of seven. At fourteen he went to the college at Amiens, but two years later, in 1779, broke off his studies to become, first, maître de musique at the cathedral of Séz, and then sous-maître at the church of the Innocents in Paris. There he obtained some instruction in harmony from the Abbé Roze, but it was not any systematic course of study so much as his thorough knowledge of plainsong and deep study that made him the profound and original musician he afterwards became.

His imagination was too active and his desire of distinction too keen to allow him to remain long in a subordinate position; he therefore accepted in 1781 the appointment of maître de musique at the cathedral of Dijon, whence after two years he removed to Le Mans and then to Tours. In 1784 he went to Paris to superintend the performance of some of his motets at the Concert Spirituel, and he was re-appointed to the church of the Holy Innocents as headmaster of the choristers, in place of the Abbé Roze. He now mixed with the foremost musicians of the French school, and with Sacchini, who gave him good advice on the art of composition and urged him to write for the stage. When the Italian died in Oct. 1786 Lesueur wrote in his memory the cantata 'L'Ombre de Sacchini', which was sung at the Concert Spirituel on 8 Dec.

In the same year Lesueur competed for the musical directorship of Notre-Dame, which he obtained, and immediately entered upon his duties. He was allowed by the chapter to engage a full orchestra and thus was able to give magnificent performances of motets and messes solennelles. His idea was to excite the imagination and produce devotional feeling by means of dramatic effects and a picturesque and imitative style, and he even went so far as to precede one of his masses by a regular overture, exactly as if it had been an opera. Crowds were attracted by this novel kind of sacred music, but its success soon aroused opposition, and a violent anonymous attack was made upon him, under pretext of a reply to his pamphlet, 'Essai de musique sacrée, ou musique motivée et méthodique pour la fête de Noël' (1787). Lesueur's rejoinder was another pamphlet, 'Exposé d'une musique, une, imitative et particulière à chaque solennité' (4 pts., 1787), in which he gives a detailed sketch of an appropriate musical service for the great festivals and states expressly that his aim was to make sacred music "dramatic and descriptive". Meantime the chapter, finding that his projects had involved them in heavy expense, curtailed the orchestra, while at the same time strong pressure was put upon him by the archbishop to take orders. He willingly assumed the title of Abbé, but declined the priesthood, especially as he was composing an opera, 'Télémaque', which he was anxious to produce. Considering his reduced orchestra inadequate for his masses he resigned and retired in the autumn of 1788 to the country house of a friend, where he passed nearly four years of repose and happiness.

On the death of his friend in 1792 Lesueur returned to Paris, invigorated and refreshed in mind, and composed a series of three-act operas — 'La Caverne' (16 Feb. 1793), 'Paulin et Virginie', based on Bernardin de Saint-Pierre's novel (13 Jan. 1794) and 'Télémaque dans l'île de Calypso, ou Le Triomphe de la sagesse' (11 May 1796), all produced at the Théâtre Feydeau.¹ The brilliant success of 'La Caverne' procured his appointment as professor in the École de la Garde Nationale (21 Nov. 1793), and he was also nominated one of the inspectors of instruction at the Conservatoire from its foundation in 1795. In this capacity he took part with Méhul, Gossec, Catel and Langlé in drawing up the 'Principes élémentaires de musique' and the 'Solfèges du Conservatoire'.

Lesueur's 'Chant de la paix dans le genre gallique' was sung at the Opéra on 14 Apr. 1802, and he was looking forward to the production of two operas which had been accepted by the Académie. When these were set aside in favour of Catel's 'Sémiramis' his indignation knew no bounds, and he vehemently attacked not only his colleague but the director of the Conservatoire, Catel's avowed patron. His pamphlet, 'Projet d'un plan général de l'instruction musicale en France' (1801), had also been ill received, and Lesueur was dismissed from the Conservatoire on 23 Sept. 1802. Having a family to support, he was severely crippled by the loss of his salary and saved from utter indigence only by his appointment in Mar. 1804 as maître de chapelle to the First Consul, on the recommendation of Paisiello, who retired on account of his health. As the occupant of the post most coveted by musicians in France Lesueur had no difficulty in securing the production of 'Ossian, ou Les Bardes' (five acts, 10 July 1804). The piece was the first to be produced by the Opéra under its new name of "Académie Impériale de Musique". Its success was extraordinary, and the emperor, an ardent admirer of Celtic poems, rewarded the composer with a decoration of the Legion of Honour, intended also as an acknowledgment for a 'Te Deum' and a Mass performed at Notre-Dame on the occasion of his coronation (2 Dec. 1804).

During the next five years Lesueur undertook no work of greater importance than a share in Persuis's intermède 'L'Inauguration du Temple de la Victoire' (2 Jan. 1807) and in the same composer's three-act opera 'Le Triomphe de Trajan' (23 Oct. 1807), containing the once well-known 'Marche solennelle'; but on 21 Mar. 1809 he produced 'La Mort d'Adam et son apothéose' in three acts — the original cause of his quarrel with the management of the Académie and the Conservatoire. The scenery and dresses of the new opera excited the greatest admiration; when complimented on his work, Degotti the scene-painter replied quite seriously: "Yes, it certainly is the most beautiful paradise you ever saw in your life, or ever will see".

In 1813 Lesueur became a member of the Institut (Académie des Beaux-Arts). After the Restoration he was appointed, in spite of his long veneration for Napoleon, surintendant and composer of the chapel of Louis XVIII. On 1 Jan. 1818 he was appointed professor of composition at the Conservatoire, a post which he retained till his death. His lectures were largely attended and very interesting for the brilliant remarks with which he interspersed them. Of his pupils no less than twelve gained the Prix de Rome — namely, Bourgeois, Ermel, Paris, Guiraud, Berlioz, Prévost, Ambroise Thomas, Elwart, Boulanger, Besozzi, Boisselot (who married one of his three daughters) and, lastly, Gounod. Lesueur also wrote 'Notice sur la mélodie, la rythmopée et les grands caractères de la musique ancienne', published with Gail's French translation of Anacreon (Paris, 1793). Ancient Greek music was a favourite subject with him, and he would with perfect seriousness expound how one mode tended to licence and another to virtue; unfortunately, however, some wag in the class would occasionally mislead his ear by inverting the order of succession in the chords and thus betray him into taking the licentious for the virtuous mode and vice versa.

Lesueur died at a patriarchal age and in universal respect. He left three operas which had never been staged, 'Tyrtée', three acts, composed in 1794, 'Artaxerce' (1797), written for the Théâtre Feydeau, and 'Alexandre à Babylone', of which the score was engraved and considerable portions were given at the Conservatoire concerts. Of his numerous oratorios, masses, motets, etc., the following have been published:

'L'Oratorio ou Messe de Noël.'

3 'Messes solennelles'.

Mass with 'Domine Salvum'.

3 'Oratorios pour le couronnement des princes souverains'.

'Te Deum' (3 settings).

'Domine Salvum' (2).

2 'Oratorios de la Passion'.

'Stabat Mater.'

Oratorios 'Débora', 'Rachel', 'Ruth et Noémi'.

'Ruth et Boaz'.

Cantata for the marriage of the Emperor Napoleon.

Motet for the baptism of the King of Rome.

Prayer for the Emperor on airs of Languedoc.

'O Salutaris.'

Psalms and Motets, including a 'Super flumina Babylonis'.

The five operas previously mentioned and all this sacred music furnish ample materials for forming an estimate of Lesueur's talent. His most marked characteristic is a grand simplicity. No musician ever contrived to extract more from common chords or to impart greater solemnity to his choruses and ensembles; but in his boldest flights and most original effects of colour the ear is struck by antiquated passages which stamp the composer as belonging to a past school. "His biblical characters are set before us with traits and colours so natural as to make one forget the poverty of the conception, the antique Italian phrases, the childish simplicity of the orchestration."¹ By another critic he was said to have taken the theatre into the church and the church into the theatre. Thus, looking at the matter from a purely musical point of view, it is impossible to consider Lesueur the equal of his contemporaries Méhul and Cherubini; though the novelties he introduced derive a special interest from the fact that he was the master of Berlioz, who loved and honoured him to the last.

LESUR, Daniel (Jean Yves) (b. Paris, 19 Nov. 1908).

French organist, pianist and composer. He studied at the Paris Conservatoire, where he was a pupil of Charles Tournemire for organ and composition. He was assistant organist at Sainte-Clothilde (1927-37) and professor of counterpoint at the Schola Cantorum from 1935 to 1939. In 1936 he founded, with Yves Baudrier, Olivier Messiaen and André Jolivet, the group "Jeune France". From 1937 to 1944 he was organist at the Benedictine Abbey and in Feb. 1939 he joined the musical staff of Radiodiffusion Française. On the outbreak of war in 1939 he served as a volunteer in the French army, as a sapper, and, after being demobilized the following year, he rejoined the French broadcasting service in the free zone. After the liberation Lesur created a new broadcasting feature, 'Nouvelles Musicales', which has been continued ever since; he is also responsible for the musical information services on the French radio. He is known as a pianist as well as an organist, having appeared as soloist with the Colonne and Pasdeloup orchestras and abroad, and is a member of the following: Juries of the Paris Conservatoire and Radio, Société Nationale de Musique, French section of the I.S.C.M., Société des Musiques Oubliées, Senate of the musical Olympics, Salzburg, and the Franco-Norwegian Alliance Artistique. Since 1951 he has been on the managing board of the newly created Centre de Documentation de Musique Internationale.

Lesur's output as a composer is considerable and varied, ranging from songs and short pianoforte pieces to full-length orchestral works, such as the 'Ricercare' inspired by the tragic events of 1939-40 and the Overture to Musset's 'Andrea del Sarto', which was produced under Charles Munch at the Aix-en-Provence Festival in 1950. Some of his smaller works reveal him as a delicate and subtle harmonist; others are vigorously contrapuntal (e.g. the 'Passacaglia for pianoforte and orchestra'), but in all he appears as a musician of refined sensibility whose art is distinguished by its lyrical and poetic qualities.

LESZCZYŃSKI, Aleksander Władysław (b. ?, 1616; d. Częstochowa, 24 Sept. 1680).

Polish composer. His father, Izydor Leszczyński, a painter by profession, when a widower, entered the monastery at Jasna Góra. There on 8 Sept. 1632 he was joined by his son Aleksander, who became a monk. The latter conducted the monastic choir and composed much church music, of which only two Masses remain:

- 'Missa per octavas' in 4 parts (incomplete, only 3 voices remain, A.T.B.); this copy was made by G. G. Gorczycki.
 'Missa 4 voc. cum Credo per octavas' (complete).

LETELIER, Alfonso (b. Santiago de Chile, 4 Oct. 1912).

Chilean composer and teacher. A pupil of Allende at the Conservatorio Nacional, he also qualified as an agricultural engineer in order to look after his lands personally. One of the founders of the Escuela Moderna de Música, he has trained its mixed choir and given many concerts of Chilean and contemporary choral music. In 1938 and 1946 Letelier was sent to Europe on a special mission by the University of Chile. In 1947 he became professor of harmony at the Conservatorio Nacional. His pianoforte Variations were performed at the I.S.C.M. Festival at Salzburg in 1952.

Among his compositions are a Mass for chorus, string orchestra and organ, a symphonic poem 'La vida del campo' for pianoforte and orchestra (which won a prize at the competition during the fourth centenary celebrations at Santiago), a string Quartet, which also won a prize on the same occasion, 4 cradle songs for female voice and chamber orchestra, 'Los sonetos de la muerte' for female voice and full orchestra, besides short choral and pianoforte pieces and songs. Letelier is also engaged on an opera, 'Maria Magdalena'.

LÉTOURNEAU, Omer (b. Quebec, 13 Mar. 1891).

Canadian organist and composer. He studied with A. Bernier at Quebec and later with Decaux and Fourdrain in Paris. On his return to Canada he became organist of St.

Saviour's Church at Quebec. As a composer he specializes in church music. His compositions include many sacred songs, motets and masses. He also wrote much for organ, pianoforte and voice.

LEUTGEB (Leitgeb), Ignaz (b. ?; d. Vienna, 27 Feb. 1811).

Austrian horn player. He was first horn in the Archbishop of Salzburg's private band and visited Paris in 1770, appearing as soloist on 1 Apr. at the Concert Spirituel, when, says the critic of the 'Mercure de France' "... il a reçu les applaudissemens dûs au talent supérieur avec lequel il a donné un concerto de chasse de sa composition". Shortly afterwards he again performed, and this time is even more warmly praised ('Mercure', May 1770):

... a donné deux concertos avec tout l'art possible. Il tire de cet instrument des intonations que les connoisseurs ne cessent d'entendre avec surprise. Son mérite est surtout de chanter l'adagio aussi parfaitement que la voix la plus moëlleuse, la plus intéressante et la plus juste pourroit faire.

From this it is evident that he was a player of exceptional qualities, though, according to Otto Jahn, wanting in higher cultivation.

He and Mozart became acquainted at Salzburg, and, on Mozart's arrival in Vienna, he found him settled there, in the Altlerchenfeld, No. 32, keeping a cheesemonger's shop and playing the horn. Mozart wrote four concertos for him (K. 412, 417, 447, 495), a Quintet (407), which he calls "das Leitgebische", and probably a Rondo (371). Neither the four concertos nor the Rondo offer any special technical difficulty and are well within the powers of any competent horn player. The Quintet, however, is exceedingly difficult, even on the modern valve horn: only a genuine virtuoso could have mastered it on the old hand horn.

There must also have been something attractive about Leutgeb personally, for with no one does Mozart appear to have played so many tricks. When Leutgeb called to ask how his pieces were getting on Mozart would cover the floor with loose leaves of scores and parts of symphonies and concertos, which Leutgeb must pick up and arrange in exact order, while the composer was writing at his desk as fast as his pen could travel. On one occasion he was made to crouch down behind the stove till Mozart had finished. The margins of the concertos are covered with droll remarks—"W. A. Mozart has taken pity on Leutgeb, ass, ox and fool, at Vienna, 27 March 1783...". The horn part is full of jokes—"Go it, Signor Asino"—"take a little breath"—"wretched pig"—"thank God here's the end" — and much more of the like. One of the pieces is written in coloured inks, black, red, green and blue, alternately. Leutgeb throve on his cheese and his horn, and died richer than his great friend.

LEVA, Enrico de (b. Naples, 19 Jan. 1867; d. ?).

Italian composer. In early youth he studied the pianoforte under Pannain and Rosso-mandi, receiving lessons in composition from Puzone and d' Arienzo, professors at the Naples Conservatory. Ricordi, after the extraordinary success of his Neapolitan canzonetta, 'Non mi guardà', entered into a contract with the young composer to write for them five songs each year. De Leva's celebrity was still further increased in 1890 when Queen Margherita commissioned him to write a vocal piece for an open-air festivity at the royal palace of Capodimonte. This work, a serenata entitled 'A Capomonte', was directed by the composer, whose songs enjoyed, thenceforward, the advantage of being interpreted by the foremost singers of the day.

Of the hundreds of songs written by Leva it must suffice to mention only a few of the most successful, such as 'E spingole frangese', 'Triste aprile', 'Voi siete l' alba', 'Ultima serenata', 'Voce fra i campi', 'Ammore piccerillo', 'Ho sognato' and 'Lacrime amare'. Some of his best were written for popular local festivals. In these the composer skilfully preserved the spirit of the old Neapolitan folksong, adapting it to the requirements of modern harmony with admirable spontaneity. Among his larger works may be mentioned his 'Sirenitta', a setting of some verses from d' Annunzio's 'Gioconda', and an opera in four acts, 'La Camargo', produced in Turin on 2 Mar. 1898 at the Teatro Regio and in another version at Naples, at the Teatro San Carlo on 23 Apr. following.

De Leva was widely known as a teacher of singing in its higher branches and as a successful advocate of improved methods in the cultivation of choral singing in elementary schools throughout Italy. In 1907 he succeeded d' Arienzo as director of the Istituto dei SS. Giuseppe e Lucia at Naples.

LEVADÉ, Charles Gaston (b. Paris, 3 Jan. 1869; d. Paris, 27 Oct. 1948).

French composer. He was a pupil of Massenet at the Paris Conservatoire, where he took the Prix de Rome in 1899. By that time he had already written music for a mime-play, 'Cœur de Margot' (1895). During his stay at the Villa Medici in Rome he occupied himself mainly with operatic compositions, and he had two operas ready soon after his return to Paris: 'L'Amour d'Héliodore' in 1903 and 'Les Hérétiques' in 1905. But his two great operatic successes, perhaps partly because they were based on famous works, were 'La Rôtisserie de la Reine Pédauque' (libretto by Georges Ducquois, after Anatole France), produced at the Opéra-Comique, 12 Jan. 1920, and 'La Peau de chagrin' (Pierre Dacourcelle and Michel Carré, jun., after Balzac), Opéra-Comique, 24 Apr. 1929.

Among Levadé's other works are a 'Prélude religieux' for string orchestra, orchestral suites, chamber music, pianoforte pieces and songs.

LEVANT, Oscar (b. Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, 27 Dec. 1906).

American composer. He studied composition with Schillinger and with Schoenberg. At the pianoforte he worked with Stojowski. He is one of those figures in American music who hover somewhere between the "serious" and "popular" territories; he was for several years a pianist for jazz bands, appearing in Gershwin's pianoforte Concerto and other Gershwin works at the New York Stadium and in the Hollywood Bowl. He was a successful composer of popular songs before he turned his attentions to the "serious" field.

Levant has written a pianoforte Concerto and one or two pieces for orchestra; and there are 2 pianoforte sonatas, a string Quartet and scores for several films.

LEVASSEUR, Jean Henri (called "le jeune") (b. Paris, c. 1765; d. Paris, 1823).

French violoncellist and composer. He was a pupil of Cupis and Duport. He joined the Paris Opéra orchestra in 1789, was professor at the Conservatoire and a member of the imperial (afterwards royal) private music. He was a collaborator in the official cello tutor for the Conservatoire, and composed sonatas and duets for his instrument.

LE VASSEUR, Nazaire (b. Quebec, 6 Feb. 1848; d. Quebec, 8 Nov. 1927).

Canadian pianist, organist and violinist. He held the rank of Major and was organist of the church of Saint-Roch at Quebec in 1873-1881. He was also a writer on music and an authority on Canadian folksong, writing regularly for 'La Musique' and frequently for most Quebec and Montreal newspapers.

(Grétry's 'La Caravane'), on 14 Oct. 1813 and as Œdipus (Sacchini's 'Œdipe a Colone') on 15 Oct., and was engaged there. According to Fétis he was successful only in the former; the repertory was either too high for his voice or unfavourable to the Italian method which he had acquired.

In London he made his début at the King's Theatre in Mayr's 'Adelasia ed Alderano' on 10 Jan. 1815, and played there two seasons with success in Mozart's 'La clemenza di Tito', in Cimarosa's 'Gli Orazi', as Pluto (Winter's 'Ratto di Proserpina'), in Paer's 'Griselda', Farinelli's 'Rite d'Efeso', Ferrari's 'Heroine di Raab' and Portugal's 'Regina di Lidia'. He reappeared there with some success in 1829, and again in French as Bertram on the production of Meyerbeer's 'Robert' on 11 June 1832.

Levasseur reappeared at the Paris Opéra about 1816 and remained there as an understudy, but obtained much reputation at concerts with his friend Ponchard. He made his début at the Théâtre des Italiens as Figaro (Rossini) on 5 Oct. 1819, and remained there until about 1827, where he sang in new operas by Rossini, in Meyerbeer's 'Crocato' and Vaccai's 'Romeo'. He sang at Milan on the production of Meyerbeer's 'Margherita d'Anjou' on 14 Nov. 1820. He reappeared at the Opéra as Moses on the production of Rossini's opera there, 26 Mar. 1827, a part which he had previously played at the Italiens, 20 Oct. 1822, returned there permanently the next year and remained until his retirement on 29 Oct. 1853. He created the part of Zacharie in the 'Prophète' at the request of Meyerbeer, who admired his talent as much as his noble character. He was appointed head of a lyric class at the Conservatoire on 1 June 1841 and on his retirement in 1869 was made a Chevalier of the Legion of Honour. He became blind a short time before his death.

A. C.

LEVASSEUR, Rosalie (actually Marie Claude Joseph) (b. Valenciennes, 8 Oct. 1749; d. Neuwied o/Rh., 6 May 1826).

French soprano singer. She was the natural daughter of Jean-Baptiste Levasseur and Marie-Catherine Tournay, and went young to Paris, where her parents married (2 Feb. 1761). She first appeared in a fragment of Campora's 'L'Europe galante' (1766) and until about 1775 she only took secondary parts under the name of Mlle Rosalie, that of l'Amour in Gluck's 'Orphée', among others. Her real gifts, her beautiful voice, her recognized talents as a singer and an actress, would not have served her without the protection of the Austrian ambassador, Count Mercy-Argenteau, who became her lover about this time. In 1775, after the comedy by Palissot, 'Les Philosophes', of which the heroine was called

Rosalie, she retook her own name of Levasseur, which made Sophie Arnould say of her: "Cette Rosalie, au lieu de changer de nom, elle aurait bien fait de changer de visage", making allusion to her ugliness, which, it seems, was not without charm.¹

At the production of Gluck's 'Iphigénie en Aulide' (1774), by Sophie Arnould, Rosalie still played a small part, as she did in 'Orphée' in the same year. But at the revivals of these works (1776) she took the principal parts. In 1776 she created the part of 'Alceste', then 'Armide' (1777) and 'Iphigénie en Tauride' (1779). Gluck chose her as his interpreter (he stayed with her at two revivals). She sang further in 'Ernelinde' (Philidor, revived 1777); created 'Roland' (Piccinni, 1778), 'Amadis' (John Christian Bach, 1779), 'Persée' (Philidor, 1780), 'Électre' (Lemoine, 1782) and 'Renaud' (Sacchini, 1783). She had only a short career as a singer entrusted with principal parts, between the retirement of Sophie Arnould and the début of Saint-Huberti, who succeeded her in 'Roland' and in 'Armide'.

Rosalie Levasseur had obtained special terms of 9000 livres; her patent of pension (14 Jan. 1788) was for 2000. She left France at the Revolution, consorting with the émigrés, and returned about 1801. She married, again left France and died at Neuwied, aged seventy-six. J.-G. P.

LEVERIDGE, Richard (b. London, c. 1670; d. London, 22 Mar. 1758).

English bass singer and composer. His name first appears as that of one of the vocalists in Blow's 'Te Deum and Jubilate' for St. Cecilia's Day 1695. In the same year he sang a song by Purcell in Robert Gould's tragedy 'The Rival Sisters' at Drury Lane, and his first appearance in English opera was some months later (Nov. 1695) in the third part of 'The Comical History of Don Quixote'. He had an extraordinarily deep and powerful voice.

Leveridge continued to sing every season at Drury Lane until 1708 and later on he appeared occasionally in Italian opera at the Haymarket (e.g. as Tirenio in Handel's 'Il pastor fido', 1712), then under Rich at Lincoln's Inn Fields until 1732 and for another twenty years at Covent Garden, where he took his last benefit on 24 Apr. 1751, bringing to a close a stage career of fifty-six years. According to Hawkins, Leveridge "had no notion of grace or elegance in singing; it was all strength and compass". Hawkins also relates the well-known anecdote that when sixty years old he offered for a wager of 100 guineas to sing a bass song with any man in England. About 1726 he opened a coffee-house in Tavistock Street, Covent Garden.

As a composer Leveridge was best known by his songs; he published a collection, in two octavo volumes, in 1727. 'All in the Downs' and 'The Roast Beef of Old England' were special favourites for a long time. This collection contains none of his numerous songs for the stage, which mostly appeared in single sheets (see list below). Of his more ambitious works for the stage the vocal and instrumental music for 'Macbeth' deserves special mention. It was first heard at Drury Lane on 21 Nov. 1702, and remained popular until about the middle of the century. Leveridge, who usually sang the part of Hecate when he appeared in the play himself, is mentioned as the composer of the witches' scenes in Acts II, III and IV in numerous 18th-century editions of Shakespeare's play; so far, however, his music has not been identified beyond doubt, and the relationship between the various settings of the time, by Purcell, Eccles and Leveridge, and the edition published by Boyce in 1750 as "by Locke" (but almost certainly not by Locke), still remains to be settled.

Apart from 'Macbeth', Leveridge wrote the following masques and operatic pieces:

- 'Cinthia and Endymion, or The Loves of the Deities' (Durfey), with Daniel Purcell, 1697.
- 'The Island Princess, or The Generous Portuguese' (Motteux, from Fletcher's tragi-comedy), with other composers, 1699.
- 'Britain's Happiness' (Motteux), 1704.
- 'The Mountebank, or The Humours of the Fair' (Motteux; musical interlude in his comedy 'Farewell Folly, or The Younger the Wiser'), with Daniel Purcell, 1705.
- 'The Beau Demolished' (anonymous "entertainment of music"), 1715.
- 'Pyramus and Thisbe' ("comick masque", taken by the composer from the clowns' scenes in 'A Midsummer Night's Dream'), 1716.
- 'Jupiter and Europa, or the Intrigues of Harlequin' (anonymous "masque of songs"), with Colston and Galliard, 1723.

Single incidental songs of his are in the following plays:

- 'Aesop' (Vanbrugh), 1696.
- 'Woman's Wit, or The Lady in Fashion' (Cibber), 1696.
- 'The Roman Bride's Revenge' (Gildon), 1696.
- 'A Plot and No Plot' (Dennis), 1697.
- 'Caligula' (Crowne), 1698.
- 'Love and a Bottle' (Farquhar), 1698.
- 'The Famous History of the Rise and Fall of Massaniello' (Durfey), 1699.
- 'The Constant Couple' (Farquhar), ? 1703 (revival).

LEVEY (real name O'Shaughnessy). Irish family of musicians.

(1) Richard Michael Levey, sen. (b. Dublin, 25 Oct. 1811; d. Dublin, 28 June 1899), conductor and composer. He was apprenticed to James Barton in 1821, with whom he continued till 1826, when he entered the Dublin Theatre Royal orchestra. Balfe, Wallace and Levey were intimate friends. Levey's earliest recollection was seeing Horn's opera 'Lalla Rookh', and he had pleasant memories of G. A. Lee and G. F. Stansbury as conductors of the "old" Royal, at which he himself became leader in 1834. His accounts of the "stars" between 1827 and 1847 make capital reading (a summary of them is given in his 'Annals of the Theatre Royal'), and he often told stories of the two Keans, Alfred Bunn, Tyrone Power, Macready, Cooke, Harriet Smithson (who married Berlioz), Taglioni, Paganini, Ole Bull, Bochsa, Lablache and Grisi.

From 1836 to 1880 (the Royal was burnt on 9 Feb. 1880) Levey composed fifty overtures, and he arranged the music for forty-four pantomimes. His first pantomime was 'O'Donoghue of the Lakes', the book of which was written by Alfred Howard ("Paddy Kelly"). In 1839 he toured with Balfe's opera company in Ireland and in 1840 he conducted the first performances in Dublin of 'The Maid of Artois' (with Balfe himself in the cast) and 'The Siege of Rochelle'.

Among Levey's pupils were Robert Stewart and Stanford. The latter's first appearance in public as a composer, at the age of eight, was as the writer of music for the pantomime of 'Puss in Boots', performed at the Theatre Royal during the Christmas season of 1860, under Levey's baton.

In 1850 Levey was one of the founders of the Royal Irish Academy of Music. In 1852-55 he was leader of the Dublin Quartet Concert Society; in 1859-62 he formed and led the Classical Quartet Union. In spite of the short duration of these enterprises, he helped to start the Monthly Popular Concerts in 1868, when the quartet was led by Joachim, and the concerts lasted till 1871. He had a jubilee benefit on 20 Apr. 1876 and was presented with 250 guineas. Sir Robert Stewart conducted a new comic opera, 'The Rose and the Ring', for Levey's benefit, on 23 Mar. 1878.

Levey lived to see the opening of the "new" Theatre Royal on 13 Dec. 1897. Among his published pieces are two volumes of old Irish airs. He married three times. Two of his sons were musicians. The youngest, John (b. c. 1840; d. 1891), was an author and comedian.

(2) Richard Michael Levey, jun. (b. Dublin, 1833; d. ?, 1904), violinist, son of the preceding. He became a famous player and appeared at Musard's concerts in Paris in 1851-58. He then played in London in an entertainment called 'Paganini's Ghost', in which he was made up to represent that player and performed his most difficult feats of virtuosity. In 1865-85 he gave concerts, etc., under the name of Paganini Redivivus, and after 1888 he appeared at the music-halls.

(3) William Charles Levey (b. Dublin, 25 Apr. 1837; d. London, 18 Aug. 1894), conductor and composer, brother of the preceding. He studied in Paris under Auber, Thalberg and Prudent, and was elected a member of the Société des Auteurs et Compositeurs. He was conductor at Drury Lane Theatre in London from 1868 to 1874 and held the same post at Covent Garden, Adelphi, Princess's, Avenue and Grecian Theatres, etc. His compositions include two operettas, 'Fanchette', Covent Garden, 4 Jan. 1864; 'Punchinello', Her Majesty's, 28 Dec. 1864; 'The Girls of the Period', musical burletta, libretto by Burnand, Drury Lane, 25 Feb. 1869; incidental music for Shakespeare's 'Antony and Cleopatra', 1873, 'King o' Scots', 'Amy Robsart', 'Lady of the Lake' (both adapted from Scott), 'Rebecca', 'Esmeralda' (adapted from Hugo) and several pantomimes; 'Robin Hood', cantata for boys' voices; 'Saraband' for pianoforte on a theme by Henry VIII; several drawing-room pieces and many songs. LEVI, Hermann (b. Giessen, 7 Nov. 1839; d. Munich, 13 May 1900).

German conductor. He studied with Vincenz Lachner at Mannheim from 1852 to 1855, and for three years from that time at the Leipzig Conservatory. His first engagement as a conductor was at Saarbrücken in 1859; in 1861 he became director of the German Opera at Rotterdam, in 1864 Hofkapellmeister at Carlsruhe. Finally, in 1872, he was appointed to the Court Theatre of Munich, a post which he filled with great distinction until 1896. He attained to a prominent place among Wagnerian conductors, and to him fell the honour of directing the first performance of 'Parsifal' at Bayreuth, on 28 July 1882, Wagner being so impressed with his work as to engage him for his "Christian" music-drama in spite of his anti-Semitic feelings. In 1895 Levi visited England, but conducted only one concert, on 25 Apr., in the London Queen's Hall. He was debarred from conducting in his last years by gout. In 1898, he rearranged — unnecessarily, in the modern view — the libretto of Mozart's 'Così fan tutte'.

LEVIDIS, Dimitri (b. Athens, 8 Apr. 1886; d. Athens, 30 May 1951).

Greek composer. He studied music first at the Athens Conservatory for five years (1900-5) and afterwards at Lausanne (1906-7) with A. Denéréaz and at Munich (1907-8), where he was a pupil of F. Klose and Felix Mottl; he also had lessons from Richard Strauss. In 1910 he settled in Paris and remained there for twenty-two years. Many of his works had their first performance at the Colonne, Straram and Padeloup concerts. Among others, mention should be made of his ballet 'The Shepherd and the Fairy' (Paris, 24 Apr. 1924), also performed at the Athens Lyric Theatre (1935 and 1943), his symphonic poem 'The Siren' (1926) and the 'Poem' for violin and orchestra (1927). Interested in the radio-electric instrument "Ondes Musicales Martenot", he was one of the first to compose special works for it, namely a 'Symphonic Poem' for solo "Ondes" and orchestra (1928) and 'De profundis' for 2 solo "Ondes", tenor and orchestra (1929).

After his return to Greece Levidis was appointed to the Ministry of Education and he has been President of the Union of Greek Composers for some years. He wrote an unpublished 'Treatise on the Technique of the Art of Music based on the Principles of the Natural Laws governing Sounds and Colours'. The following are his outstanding compositions:

BALLETS

'The Shepherd and the Fairy' (1924).
'The Talisman of the Gods.'

CHORAL WORKS

'The Iliad', oratorio, after Homer, for solo voices, chorus & orch.
'Funeral Procession' (dedicated to the memory of the heroes of the second world war).

ORCHESTRAL WORKS

Symph. poem 'Nazmi' (1922).
'Divertissement' for English horn & "Aeolian" orch. (harps, stgs., celesta & perc.) (1925).
Symph. poem 'The Siren' (1926).
2 Preludes.
'Impromptu.'

SOLO AND ORCHESTRA

Poem for vn. & orch. (1927).
Various works for "Dixtuor æolien d'orchestre" (1925-29).
Symph. poem for solo of "Ondes Musicales" & orch. (1928).
'De profundis' for two solo "Ondes", tenor & orch. (1929).
'Chant payen' for oboe & stgs.
Also a string Quartet & pf. Sonata (1918), many songs with orchestra, including 'Trois Roubayyat persans' (1925), &c.

LEVITSKY, Misha (b. Kremenchug, 25 May 1898; d. Avon-by-the-Sea, N.J., 2 Jan. 1941).

Russian pianist and composer. He studied with Michałowski in Warsaw (1905-6) and from 1907 to 1911 with Sigismund Stojowski at the Institute of Musical Art in New York. He then had a further course in pianoforte playing under Dohnányi at the Berlin High School for Music until 1915, when he obtained the Mendelssohn Prize there. By this time, however, he was well launched on his career as a virtuoso, having made his first appearance at Antwerp as early as 1906, played there and in Brussels in 1912 and then toured Germany, Austria, Hungary and Scandinavia. His American début, on the other hand, was deferred until after his course in Berlin: it took place at the Aeolian Hall in New York on 17 Oct. 1916. He settled in the U.S.A., but toured Australia and New Zealand in 1921 and 1931, and the East in 1925.

Levitsky's compositions include 'Valse de concert' (Op. 1), 'Valse' (Op. 2), 'Gavotte' (Op. 3), 'Arabesque valsante' (Op. 6) and 'The Enchanted Nymph', all for pianoforte, and he wrote a cadenza for Beethoven's C minor pianoforte Concerto.

LÉVY, Lazare (b. Brussels, 18 Jan. 1882).

Belgian pianist and composer of French parentage. He first studied the pianoforte in Brussels with an Englishwoman, Miss Ellis. In 1894 he entered the Paris Conservatoire under Diémer, leaving it in 1898 with the first prize for pianoforte, awarded unanimously. He studied harmony with Lavignac, counterpoint and composition with Gédalge.

Lévy has played with the principal symphony orchestras of Europe and toured Europe and the East, giving numerous recitals. In 1920 he succeeded Alfred Cortot as professor at the Paris Conservatoire. His compositions include two string quartets, a Sonata for cello and pianoforte and numerous studies, sonatinas, preludes, etc., for his instrument.

M. P.

LEWANDOWSKI, Leopold (b. ?, 1833; d. Warsaw, 22 Nov. 1896).

Polish conductor and composer. For many years he acted as one of the conductors of the Warsaw Opera. He published numerous compositions, such as polonaises, mazurkas and polkas which, owing to their sparkling rhythms and simplicity, enjoyed great popularity among his countrymen.

Lewis, Alan. See Tippet ('Heart's Assurance', song cycle).

LEWIS, Anthony (Carey) (b. Bermuda 2 Mar. 1915).

English musicologist and composer. He was educated at Wellington College and at Cambridge, where he was an organ scholar at Peterhouse College and held the John Stewart of Rannoch Scholarship in sacred music and the Barclay Squire Prize for musical palaeography. He took the Cambridge B.A. and Mus.B. in 1935 and was given a special grant by his College to extend his studies in France under Nadia Boulanger. In 1935 he joined the music staff of the B.B.C., where he organized the Foundations of Music series and others of a similar kind, and was later made responsible for all broadcast chamber music and recitals. After doing war service in 1939-45 (Egypt and Palestine, 1942-45), he returned to Broadcasting House and was charged with the planning and later the organization and general direction of all music on the Third Programme. In 1947 he was appointed Barber and Peyton Professor of Music in the University of Birmingham in succession to J. A. Westrup.

During his years with the B.B.C. Lewis was responsible for the broadcasting of many unfamiliar works, such as Lully's 'Acis et Galathée', Purcell's 'Come ye sons of art', Handel's 'Haman and Mordecai', C. P. E. Bach's 'Israelites in the Desert', Haydn's 'Return of Tobias', etc. While on war service he was active in providing music for troops in the Middle East under the auspices of E.N.S.A., the British Council, etc., and he conducted the Palestine and other orchestras.

As a scholar Lewis has done valuable work in editing old English songs by Lawes, Locke, Johnson, Blow and others (Lyrebird Press, 1936-39), 'A Restoration Suite' (Universal Ed., 1937) and Blow's 'Venus and Adonis' (1939) from the original sources; and he has written numerous articles in musical periodicals as well as a chapter on Handel's songs and cantatas in the 'Music of the Masters' books and chapters in the N.O.H.M. He is general editor of 'Musica Britannica'. His compositions include a 'Choral Overture' for voices a cappella (1938) and an 'Elegy and Capriccio' for trumpet & orch. (1947).

LEWIS, Richard (b. Manchester, 10 May 1914).

British tenor singer. His parents were Welsh. He worked for some years in the office of a cotton firm at Manchester, while studying singing privately with T. W. Evans. He then studied at the Royal Manchester College of Music in 1939–40, and after serving in the second world war he spent a year at the R.A.M. in London, where he was a pupil of Norman Allin. As a boy soprano he had won many prizes at various competitions and music festivals, and in 1947 he fulfilled his first important engagement, singing the Male Chorus in Britten's 'The Rape of Lucretia'. This was followed by his engagement to take the part of Peter in 'Peter Grimes' during three seasons at Covent Garden, and in 1948 he sang Albert in 'Albert Herring' for the English Opera Group. Other operatic parts he has undertaken include those of Don Ottavio with the Glyndebourne Opera at the Edinburgh Festival, Idomeneo, Tamino, and Alfred in 'La Traviata'. In the 1953 season there he was very successful in Gluck's 'Alceste' and Strauss's 'Ariadne'. He has sung at numerous concerts both in London and the provinces, in works such as Beethoven's Mass in D, 'The Dream of Gerontius', 'Messiah' and 'Das Lied von der Erde', in which he sang with the Concertgebouw Orchestra under van Beinum in Amsterdam, as well as in London. Besides appearing in Brussels and Paris, he has given recital tours in Austria, Norway, Belgium, Switzerland and Yugoslavia, and he has broadcast frequently. As an unusually versatile artist he has taken part in a number of new, unfamiliar and difficult works. M. K. W.

LEWIS, Thomas C. (b. ?; d. ?).

English 19th-century organ builder. He was originally an architect, but started business as an organ builder in London about 1861. He built the organs of the Anglican and Roman Catholic Cathedrals at Newcastle-on-Tyne, Ripon Cathedral, and in London those of St. Peter's, Eaton Square, Holy Trinity, Paddington, and the People's Palace. But his largest work is the organ of St. Andrew's Hall, Glasgow.

Most of these instruments have now been rebuilt or have altogether vanished, though those in Eaton Square and Southwark Cathedral are little altered. The firm is now absorbed by that of Henry Willis & Sons.

LEY, Henry George (b. Chagford, 30 Dec. 1887).

English organist and composer. He was educated at St. George's, Windsor (1896), Uppingham School, and the R.C.M. in London (under Parratt). He won the organ scholarship at Keble College, Oxford, and while still an undergraduate was appointed organist of Christ Church Cathedral there (1909) in succession to Harwood. His remarkable skill and taste as a performer were quickly recognized, but like most English organists of the first rank he devoted himself to his cathedral work and refused the temptation to gain notoriety by touring as a recitalist. He was appointed Choragus of the University and joined the staff of the R.C.M. as teacher of the organ. He resigned his Oxford appointments in 1926 in favour of that of Director of the Music at Eton College. H. C. C.

LEYGRAF, Hans (b. Stockholm, 7 Sept. 1920).

Swedish pianist and composer. At seven years of age he studied pianoforte with Gottfrid Boon, at nine appeared in public as soloist in Mozart's A major Concerto and at thirteen gave his first recital in Stockholm. From 1936 to 1940 he studied composition and conducting at the Stockholm Conservatory and pianoforte with A. Hirzel-Langenhahn in Switzerland during the summers. He took part successfully in the Vienna International Piano Competitions in 1936 and 1938. He was awarded a state stipend in 1941–43 and went to study at the Munich High School for Music. There he passed the state examination in composition, conducting and pianoforte in 1942, and from 1943 to 1944 he taught in the master-class for piano playing at the Innsbruck Conservatory. He is considered one of the finest Swedish pianists and has appeared as soloist at the Stockholm Concert Society and elsewhere in Sweden, and has given recitals in Germany, Switzerland and Denmark. In June–July 1952 he played as soloist with the Stockholm Philharmonic Broadcasting Orchestra in London and gave a recital for the B.B.C.

Among Leygraf's compositions are a Concertino for pianoforte and orchestra (performed in Germany and Sweden), a Suite for cello and orchestra, a string Quartet and sonatas and pieces for pianoforte. K. D.

LEZGHINKA (Rus.). A slow, elegiac dance of the Lezghy, a Mahomedan tribe on the Persian border of Russia. It has given Russian composers an excuse for their favourite indulgence in music of an Oriental cast. L'Herbier, Marcel. See Baudrier.

L'HÉRITIER, Jean (b. ?; d. ?).

French 16th-century composer. He was a pupil of Josquin des Prés. His works appeared in the collections published between 1519 and 1555, and even as late as 1588 a Mass of his was published at Venice with several by Lassus. Only one work bears his name on the title-page, 'Moteti de la fama', a 4 (Venice, 1555), but even here his works appear only along with those of other composers. Ambros classes him with Antoine Fevin and Jean Mouton, and describes his works as characterized by a peculiar refinement and grace, uniting something of the solidity of the Netherland school proper with the elegance of the French. Aron in his 'Toscanello' refers approvingly to L'Héritier, because in his earliest published motet, 'Dum complerentur' in Petrucci's 'Motetti della Corona' (1519) he had expressly marked the E \flat in the melodic progression from B \flat to avoid the tritone.

LHOTKA, Fran (b. Vožice, 25 Dec. 1883).

Yugoslav conductor and composer. He studied at the Prague Conservatory under Dvořák, Janáček and others. He went to Russia with an appointment as professor at the music school of Ekaterinoslav, but later returned to Yugoslavia to become conductor at the Zagreb Opera. Later he became professor and in 1938 director of the Academy of Music there, also conductor of a choral society.

Lhotka's works include the operas 'Minka' and 'The Sea', the ballets 'The Devil in the Village' and 'A Medieval Love', a Symphony, a Scherzo, a 'Yugoslav Capriccio' and 'Reveille of the Trenks Soldiers' for orchestra, chamber music, songs and choruses, etc.

LIADOV, Anatol Konstantinovich (b. St. Petersburg, 11 May 1855; d. Novgorod, 28 Aug. 1914).

Russian composer. His grandfather and father had been professional musicians, the latter at the Maryinsky Theatre in St. Petersburg from 1850 to 1868; and it was he who gave his son his first musical instruction. Afterwards Anatol went through a course — including composition under Rimsky-Korsakov — at the St. Petersburg Conservatory. He left with a brilliant record in 1877, returning the following year as assistant teacher in the elementary classes for theory, and later holding a professorship at this institution, taking special classes for harmony and composition. He also held a similar post in the imperial court chapel. Together with Balakirev and Liapunov he was charged by the Imperial Geographical Society to make researches into the folksongs of various districts.

As a composer Liadov wrote much of his best work for the pianoforte. His compositions for this instrument are delicate and graceful in form. The influence of Chopin is clearly evident in them; at the same time their distinctively Russian colouring, and gay — frequently humorous — character, saves them from the reproach of servile imitation. Some of Liadov's pianoforte music has been orchestrated and used for ballets in the repertory of the Diaghilev company. In particular there was the ballet 'Russian Fairy-Tales', for which the 'Eight Russian Folksongs' for orchestra were used together with pianoforte pieces scored by Arnold Bax.

Liadov was often reproached with indolence by his friends, who thought so highly of his gift that they wished to see it employed on large-scale works; but he knew his limitations and preferred to do good work within them, and perhaps his busy life as a teacher also did something to prevent his undertaking large compositions and completing the ballet he had begun. He made three attempts at opera and in 1877 began a string Quartet.¹ But his orchestral works, though not extensive, are beautifully finished and scored with mastery.

LIAPUNOV, Sergey Mikhailovich (b. Yaroslav, 30 Nov. 1859; d. Paris, 8 Nov. 1924).

Russian pianist and composer. He attended the classes of the Imperial Musical Society at Nizhny-Novgorod and in 1878 went to Moscow, where he studied the pianoforte under Klindworth and Pabst, composition under Hubert, Tchaikovsky and Taneyev, at the Conservatory. He left this institution in 1883. From 1884 to 1902 he was assistant musical director of the court chapel in St. Petersburg. In 1893 he was appointed by the Imperial Geographical Society to collect folksongs in the governments of Vologda, Viatka and Kostroma. The result was the publication of nearly 300 folksongs with pianoforte accompaniment in 1897, thirty of which were arranged by Liapunov. On leaving the imperial chapel in 1902, he became inspector of music of St. Helen's Institute, a post he kept until 1910, when he was appointed professor at the St. Petersburg Conservatory.

But after the 1917 Revolution he could not fit in with the new régime, and he left the Conservatory the following year. The last six years of his life were spent mainly in Paris. During the period of his activity in Russia he made some appearances as pianist and conductor in Germany and Austria. He edited the correspondence between Tchaikovsky and Balakirev, which was published in 1912.

As a composer Liapunov shows the twofold influences of the eclectic school in which he was brought up and of the interest in folk music which the expeditions had awakened in him. The latter is seen, for instance, in the suite 'Fêtes de Noël' for pianoforte, though it had already appeared earlier in the 'Solemn Overture' on Russian themes for orchestra, and the former in much of his pianoforte music, which often has the brilliant polish of the Moscow school of his time. The two elements are sometimes found combined in pianoforte works, which show a close resemblance to those of Balakirev and Liadov, though he is less original than either. His training as a concert pianist also brought him close to Liszt, an influence reflected not only in the Lisztian title of the Studies, Op. 11, and their dedication to Liszt's memory, but in the style of their keyboard writing in general.

The following is a representative list of Liapunov's compositions:

ORCHESTRAL WORKS

- Op.
2. 'Ballade' (1883).
 7. 'Solemn Overture' on Russian themes (1886).
 12. Symphony No. 1, B m. (1887).

 37. Symph. poem 'Zhelasova Vola'.
 - Symph. poem 'Hashish'.

LIATOSHINSKY, Boris Nikolayevich
 (b. Zhitomir, 10 Jan. 1895).

Russian composer. He was the son of a teacher of history. As a child he had lessons in violin and pianoforte, and made his first attempts at composition, writing songs and chamber music which were performed by local musicians. In 1913 he began to study at Kiev under Glière, whose course at the Conservatory he completed in 1918, also graduating the same year from the Law faculty of the Kiev University. When still a student at the Conservatory he wrote a number of compositions, including a string Quartet, first Symphony (which was his diploma work) and others; on completing his course of study at the Conservatory he wrote within a short space of time two further string Quartets, a pianoforte Trio, several sonatas, a set of pianoforte pieces, 'Reflection', and many songs. In 1927 at the musical contest of the Soviet Republics, on the occasion of the tenth anniversary of the October Revolution, he won the first prize for his 'Overture on Four Ukrainian Popular Themes'; in 1929 he completed his first opera, 'The Golden Hoop', about the heroic struggle of the Ukrainian people against the Mongolians in the 13th century, and in 1938 his second opera, 'Shchors', about Commander Nikolay Shchors, one of the heroes of the Civil War in 1918. In subsequent years he composed the tripartite second Symphony, cantata 'Zapovit' (words by Taras Shevchenko), 'Solemn Cantata' on the occasion of the sixtieth anniversary of Joseph Stalin, and several cycles of ballads.

His early works reflect the influence of Russian classical music, in particular of Borodin, and to some extent of Skriabin, Wagner and Liszt. In his later compositions there are also traces of the influence of French impressionism and of west-European expressionism.

His activity as a teacher, which began in 1920, has been continuous to this day (1954). As a professor at the Kiev and Moscow Conservatories he has been responsible for the training of more than one generation of Soviet composers. At the same time he has played a leading part in the work of the Union of Soviet Composers, in his capacity as member of the Presidium of its Organizing Committee, and as Chairman of the Ukrainian Union of Composers since 1939.

In 1938 the Soviet Government conferred upon him the Order of Merit.

In the course of the second world war he wrote several dozen vocal compositions, a suite for pianoforte, '1941', and started to work on his third Symphony for the twenty-fifth anniversary of the October Revolution.

Liatoshinsky's principal works are summarized below:

OPERAS

- 'The Golden Hoop' (1924-29).
 'Shchors' (1937-38).
 Orchestration of Lisenko's opera 'Taras Bulla' (with L. N. Revutsky).

CHORAL WORKS

- Cantata 'Zapovit' (Shevchenko).
 'Solemn Cantata' for chorus & orch., for the 60th birthday of Joseph Stalin (Rilsky) (1938).
 Arrangements of Ukrainian folksongs.

- Symphony No. 1.
 Symphony No. 2.
 'Fantastic March.'
 'Overture on Four Ukrainian Themes.'
 Symphony No. 3 (1943).

CHAMBER MUSIC

- 3 String Quartets.
 Trio for vn., viola & pf.
 Sonata for vn. & pf.
 Pf. Quintet (c. 1945).

PIANOFORTE MUSIC

- 2 Sonatas on Ukrainian themes.

LIBAN, Jerzy (b. Lignica, 1464; d. Cracow, c. 1546).

Polish teacher. About 1501 he went to Cracow and the next year he became baccalarius at the University. He then went to Cologne and returned after nearly ten years to Cracow. He lectured on Greek and Hebrew philology. Of all his writings two are connected with music:

- 'De accentuum ecclesiasticorum exquisita ratione' (Cracow, 1539).
 'De musicae laudibus oratio seu adhortatio quaedam ad musicae studiosos' (Cracow, 1540).

C. R. II.

LIBER, Anton Joseph (b. Sulzbach, 1732; d. Ratisbon, 1809).

German violinist and composer. He was a pupil of Joseph Riepel, and, like his teacher, a violinist in the Thurn and Taxis orchestra at Ratisbon. Six pianoforte trios of his were published by Goetz of Mannheim about 1775 (copy in B.M.; thematic catalogue of them, and of a Divertimento for 9 instruments, in D.T.B., Vol. XV, 1916). His son, Wolfgang (b. Donauwörth, 31 Oct. 1758; d. Ratisbon, 23 July 1840) was an organist and composer of church music.

LIBERATI, Antimo (b. Foligno, ?; d. Rome, ?).

Italian 17th-century theorist and composer. He was a pupil of Gregorio Allegri and Orazio Benevoli, and became in 1661 a singer in the papal chapel. He was also, for some time, choirmaster and organist to two other churches in Rome. He died after 1685. He is known chiefly as the author of an open letter addressed to a musical friend ('Lettera scritta . . . in risposta ad una del Sig. Ovidio Persapegi . . .'), printed and published in Rome in 1685, which was relied on by Baini and others as the main authority for various statements with regard to the early life and works of Palestrina. Besides this letter, Liberati wrote another work, 'Epitome della musica', which exists only in manuscript, also two letters in defence of a passage in one of Corelli's sonatas. Baini mentions madrigals, arias and oratorios by Liberati in Roman archives.

J. R. M.

LIBERT, Henri (b. Paris, 15 Dec. 1869; d. Paris, 14 Jan. 1937).

French organist and composer. At the Paris Conservatoire he was a pupil of Marmontel, Diémer, César Franck, Widor and Massenet, and won the first organ prize in 1894. He became regular organist of the basilica of Saint-Denis in Paris and professor of the organ at the American Conservatory at Fontainebleau.

Libert wrote numerous organ pieces in a grand style: 'Variations symphoniques', 'Chorals', 'Préludes et fugues', some pianoforte pieces, songs, motets and some remarkable didactic works, suggesting a new basis for the formation and perfecting of the technique of pianists and organists.

F. R. (ii).

LIBERT (Liebert), R. (Reginaldus) (b. ?; d. ?).

French (?) 15th-century composer. A "Reginaldus" Libert was in 1424 choirmaster (Magister puerorum) at Cambrai. A Mass in three parts and a Kyrie are preserved in Trento 92. The Mass is published in D.T.Ö. (see Bibl.). Two chansons are preserved at Oxford, Bodl. Can. misc. 213.

LIBRARIES AND COLLECTIONS.

The compilation of this article has been beset by many difficulties. Many music libraries were completely destroyed during the second world war, and even of those which have survived many have lost much of their stock or suffered its dispersal in fresh centres. Other libraries formerly easily accessible are now in countries from which it is very difficult to obtain reliable information, owing to the political situation. Besides these difficulties, it has been found hard to obtain replies to repeated letters of enquiry, and in such cases it has been necessary to print information derived from secondary sources, which in themselves are not always as accurate as one could wish, or even to reprint the data given in the fourth edition of this Dictionary or its supplementary volume.¹

The most important post-war event, so far as music libraries are concerned, has been the founding of the Association Internationale des Bibliothèques Musicales (A.I.B.M.), with its headquarters at 12 rue de Madrid, Paris VIII^e). This association was founded at the second World Congress of Music Libraries held at Lüneburg in 1950; another meeting was held in Paris in 1951. Under its auspices committees have been formed to deal with such matters as the revision of Eitner's 'Quellenlexikon', the promotion of large-scale union catalogues of source material, the international facilitation of research by means of such aids as microfilms, photostats, etc., and the specialized needs of radio music libraries and libraries of recorded music.¹

Another event of major importance to music librarians and musicologists alike is the foundation of the British Union Catalogue of Music printed before 1800, in which it is hoped to list all such music preserved in the public libraries of the British Isles.

The following entries are arranged as formerly, according to continents, with countries and cities, etc., in alphabetical order. Some new groups have been included for Asia, Latin America, etc., but it must be made clear that the compilers realize not only that their information is far from exhaustive, but that there may be many other music libraries, some of them no doubt important, which may have been omitted, although every effort has been made to secure reliable and up-to-date information.

The following additions can be made to the works of reference mentioned in the introduction to this article in [4] & [S]:

AUSTRIA

EISENSTADT. a. Library of Prince Esterházy. Though the greater part of the Esterházy collections were transferred to Budapest before the outbreak of the second world war, about 1900 pieces dating from 1740 to 1860 remain at Eisenstadt. Among these is church music of Albrechtsberger, Bonno, Caldara, Fux, Joseph and Michael Haydn, Hummel, Kreutzer, Mozart and many others, some in autograph.

b. Stadtpfarrkirche. In the archives of the Parish Church there is a rich collection of MS church music of the 18th and 19th centuries by M. Haydn, Albrechtsberger, etc.

GOTTWEIG. Library of the Benedictine Abbey. Two important MS collections of songs by Mastersingers of the 16th century, a MS collection of organ music by C. Merulo and a Haydn collection. [4.]

GRAZ. University Library. Rare early printed books on music, some treatises in a MS of 1460 and 2-part compositions of 14th century. [4.]

KLAGENFURT. Library of the Historical Society (Geschichtsverein). Two MS lute books. [4.]

KLOSTERNEUBURG. Monastery of Austin Canons. The Library contains liturgical compositions of the 12th, 13th and 15th centuries, in addition to some printed music of the 16th century. See 'Catalogus Codicum manusccriptorum qui in Bibliotheca Canoniorum Regularum S. Augustini Claustroneobergi asservantur' (Vienna, Vol. I, 1922; Vol. II, 1931). Librarian: Dr. B. Cernik.

KREMSMÜNSTER. Benedictine Monastery. Legendarium of 11th century, with neumes; printed theoretical works; about 1000 masses, 300 symphonies and several operas (mostly 18th century), including much music by J. Haydn. See Huemer, 'Die Pflege der Musik im Stifte Kremsmünster' (Wels, 1877). [4.]

MELK. Benedictine Monastery. The Library contains liturgical MSS of the 13th and 14th centuries, a number of MS masses by Lassus, Scandelli and other 16th-century composers, and an important Haydn collection. Librarian: Dr. W. Schier.

REIN. Cistercian Monastery. Printed music of early 17th century. [4.]

ST. FLORIAN near ENNS. Monastery of Austin Canons. Library of over 100,000 vols., including some MS music and early printed editions. See A. Czerny, 'Die Handschriften der Stiftsbibliothek S. Florian' (Linz, 1871). [4.]

ST. PAUL, LAVANT TAL, CARINTHIA. Benedictine Monastery. The Library was severely disorganized during the second world war. It contained a valuable MS collection of French troubadour songs of the 13th century, besides treatises by Huchbald and J. de Muris.

SALZBURG. a. Benedictine Abbey of St. Peter. Church music of late 18th and early 19th centuries, including compositions by M. Haydn. [4.]

b. Cathedral Chapter Library. MS music of early 16th century by Victoria, Palestrina, etc., and some compositions by M. Haydn. [4.]

c. Mozart Museum. The most important MSS have now been transferred to the Mozarteum. [4.]

d. Mozarteum. Valuable collection of Mozart MSS, books about Mozart and printed editions of his works. [4.]

e. Museum Carolino-Augustaeum. The Library has the score of O. Benevoli's famous Mass in 53 parts, of 1628, which was published in D.T.O., X, and also an interesting collection of MSS by Mozart and his predecessors at Salzburg. Director: Prof. R. Funke.

VIENNA. a. Nationalbibliothek (formerly Hofbibliothek). Founded c. 1826-29, from the archives of the court chapel, etc., this extremely rich collection has been continually augmented and now includes upwards of 35,000 MSS, 16,000 items of printed music, some 18,000 books and c. 50,000 photostats, together with the splendid Estensian collection of instruments and chamber music, now deposited there on permanent loan. The Library is very rich in autographs, especially those of the great Austrian composers, from Haydn to Hugo Wolf, as well as in ancient MSS. Of special interest to British musicians is a volume of J. Bull's organ music, in tablature. The Nationalbibliothek also includes the Ambros and Kiesewetter collections, as well as the librettos, etc., from the archives of the Staatsoper, the Theater an der Wien, the Kärntnertheater and the invaluable photostats of the large and still growing Hoboken collection of photographic copies of the autographs of the great masters. There is also a very fine range of early printed editions from Petrucci onwards. See J. Mantuani, 'Tabulae codicum manuscriptorum in Bib. Palatina Vindobonensi asservatorum', Pts. ix & x (Vienna, 1897-99) and lists of acquisitions in Z.M.W., 1924, 1926-27. Also in the handbook of the Library: L. Nowak, 'Die Musiksammlung', which includes a good bibliography, especially R. Haas, 'Die Estensischen Musikalien' (Ratisbon, 1927). Director: Dr. L. Nowak.

b. Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde. This collection consists of a Library, an Archive and a Museum, its possessions having gradually increased to their present enormous extent. The Library was founded in 1819, when the Society acquired the valuable collection of E. Gerber, and it quickly developed in importance through gifts and legacies. The society came into possession of the Spaun-Witteczek Schubert collection, of Köchel's Mozart collection and of Brahms's library, and it inherited the precious collection of autographs in the possession of its first patron, the Archduke Rudolph, and the original MSS of the Schubert symphonies, bequeathed by N. Dumba. The Library contains some 12,300 books, the Archive nearly 52,000 pieces of music, printed or MS, divided into seventeen classes and 10,000 bound vols. The valuable Museum contains some MS fragments of Bach's works; Haydn's 'Ten Commandments', Mass in Bb, a cantata and six string quartets of 1771; Mozart's Concerto in D minor, a quintet and his last cantata; Beethoven's first violin concerto (a fragment), many of his songs, the Sonata Op. 81a (in part), a quantity of sketches and the "Eroica" Symphony; works by Gluck and Handel; Schubert's 'Alfonso und Estrella', Singspiele, chamber music, symphonies and many songs. The Museum also possesses a large collection of letters, portraits and engravings of celebrated musicians; musical instruments, medals busts, etc., from all countries. See K. Geiringer, in 'Anbruch', No. 19; also 'Notes' (Sept. 1946). Director: Dr. H. Krauss.

c. University Library. This was damaged during and even after the second world war and is still being reorganized. It still possesses some printed theoretical works of the 16th and 17th centuries and some lute-books. Director: Dr. J. Gans.

d. Stadtbibliothek. This Library is not, as previously stated, part of the Städtische Sammlungen, but a separate collection which includes about 250 original MSS of Schubert, a great deal of Viennese dance music and a collection of documents concerning musical life in Vienna during the 19th century. Director: Dr. F. Raczek.

e. Städtische Sammlungen. These collections of material by Schubert, Mozart, Haydn and Beethoven are housed respectively in Schubert's house, the so-called Figaro house, Haydn's house and the Pasquali house, together with a general collection in the City Historical Museum.

f. Kunsthistorisches Museum. The 15th-century codex of masses by Netherlands composers was transferred to the Nationalbibliothek in 1936.

g. Benedictine Abbey of our Lady of the Scots (Schottenkloster). The Library possesses some valuable early liturgical MSS and a small collection of MS and printed works of the 16th century. See A. Hübl, 'Catalogus codicum manuscriptorum qui in bibliotheca Monasterii B.M.V. ad Scotos Vindobonae servantur' (Vienna, 1899) and 'Die Inkunabalen der Bibliothek des Stiftes Schotten in Wien' (1901).

h. St. Peter's Church. See C. Roulland, 'Katalog des Musik-Archives der St. Peterskirche in Wien' (Augsburg & Vienna, 1908).

i. Monastery of the Minorites. MS and printed organ music of 17th and 18th centuries, including works by Frescobaldi; G. B. Frasoli's 'Annali' (Venice, 1645), vocal music of 17th century. [4 & S.]

k. The private library of A. van Hoboken is now at Lausanne (see Switzerland).

l. Akademie für Musik und darstellende

Kunst. No details available, but the collection is mentioned in J.M.W., 1949-50, p. 316.

BELGIUM

The music libraries of the Netherlands have been very fully described by J. G. Prod'homme in S.I.M.G., 1913-14. A general catalogue of great value is C. van den Borren's 'Inventaire des manuscrits de musique polyphonique qui se trouvent en Belgique', in Acta Mus. (1933-34); also S. Clercx, in 'Alumni', Vol. XVI, Nos. 5-6 (1947).

ANTWERP. a. Koninklijk Vlaams Muziek-conservatorium. The Library of the Royal Flemish Music Conservatory possesses a collection of some 40,000 volumes covering the theory and technique of music, and particularly theatre music, with some autographs of Flemish composers. Librarian: Dr. P. Nuten.

b. J. A. Stelfeld (d. 1952) possessed an extremely fine private library, which is particularly rich in early editions of all kinds, especially of Flemish music, and in 18th-century music generally. There is a card-catalogue. He also had a collection of musical instruments. See J. M. Kerr, 'The Stelfeld Library in Antwerp', in 'R.C.M. Magazine' (July 1938). It is hoped (1954) that the library will be purchased either by the Antwerp Conservatory or the Royal Library of Brussels.

BRUSSELS. a. Royal Library. The Printed Books Department contains the important collections of C. J. F. van Hulthem (purchased 1837) and F. J. Fétis (purchased 1872), the latter alone having over 7000 works. The contents include some 4500 theoretical works, about 500 liturgies, nearly 200 French operas and many rare items. See C. A. Voisin, 'Bibliotheca Hulthemiana' (Ghent, 1836-37); for the Fétis collection L. J. Aloin, 'Catalogue de la Bibliothèque Fétis' (Brussels, 1870). The Royal Library also has a large MSS department, containing about 2000 works from the libraries of the Dukes of Burgundy and the monasteries of the Low Countries. Among these is a 10th-century missal of St. Hubert, an album formerly belonging to Margaret of Austria, some works by Pierre de La Rue and an autograph of J. S. Bach's pieces for the lute. There are also many valuable documents on musical theory, including the works of Boethius, Hucbald and Tinctoris. See J. van den Gheyn, 'Catalogue des manuscrits de la Bibliothèque Royale de Belgique', Vol. I (Brussels, 1901); C. van den Borren, op. cit.; A. Tirabassi, 'Catalogue des manuscrits musicaux de la Bibliothèque Royale de Belgique' in preparation. Conservateur-en-Chef: Fr. Lyna.

b. Conservatoire Royal de Musique. This extremely rich Library, which now numbers some 42,000 items, and is full of treasures of every period, is less than half-covered by Wotquenne's four-volume catalogue; there is as much again entered up on the card catalogue. In 1929 456 volumes from the Collegiate Church of St. Michael and St. Gudule were acquired; these include works by Fux, Reutter, Hasse, local chapelmasters (including Fiocco) and many composers of the royal chapel. See C. van den Borren, 'Les Fonds de musique ancienne de la Collégiale SS. Michel et Gudule à Bruxelles', in 'Annuaire du Conservatoire Royal de Musique' (Brussels, 1930). Another valuable collection, that of Holtenfeltz, has recently been acquired. See 'Annuaire du Cons. Royal' (1946-47). Four volumes of a catalogue by Wotquenne (hardly "excellent", as stated in earlier editions of this Dictionary!) were issued between 1898 and 1912, with an elaborate supplement of 'Libretti d'opéras et d'oratorios italiens du XVIII^e siècle' (Brussels, 1901). Librarian: A. van der Linden.

GHENT. The Town and University Library and Archives. This collection contains liturgical MSS of the 10th to the 12th centuries, a copy of Monteverdi's 'Lamento d'Arianna' (Venice, 1623), early theoretical works, printed music from the presses of Phalèse and Gardano, and various MSS dating from 1661 to 1890 of pieces composed for and played on the Ghent Belfry Carillon. The former library of the Grand Théâtre, including over 300 operas and ballets in score, and a large number of librettos is also housed there. See C. A. Voisin, 'Bibliotheca Gandavensis' (Ghent, 1839); J. de Saint-Genois, 'Catalogue méthodique . . . des manuscrits de la bibliothèque de la ville et de l'université de Gand' (Ghent, 1849-52); M.f.M. (1873); P. Bergmans, 'Une Collection de livrets d'opéras italiens (1669-1710) à la bibliothèque de l'Université de Gand' in S.I.M.G. (1910-11). Archivist: H. Nowé. Head Librarian: R. Apers.

LIÈGE. a. Conservatoire Royal de Musique. The Library, which may be used on application to the Director of the Conservatory, contains a good collection of books and music, including the Grétry collection and the collections of the singer L. Terry, in which are many works by local composers of the 17th and 18th centuries. See C. van den Borren in Acta Mus. (1934). The Debroux bequest has provided many pieces of violin music. A catalogue made in 1862 is being superseded by a new general catalogue, the first sections of which were due to appear shortly. Librarian: E. Monseur.

b. Société Libre d'Émulation. This society is still flourishing, but its Library was destroyed in the German invasion of 1914. See 'Catalogue de la Bibliothèque musicale de la Société Libre d'Émulation de Liège' (Liège, 1861).

MECHLIN. City Library. The complete city archives from the 14th to the 19th centuries are housed in this Library, and provide much interesting information on the history of musical life in the Netherlands. There is also an illuminated MS containing masses by Pierre de La Rue, formerly in the possession of Margaret of Austria, as well as a collection of about 500 scores at present unclassified. Archivist: G. Goossens.

NAMUR. Archaeological Museum. The Library of this institution contains a number of liturgical MSS, including several fragments dating from the 11th and 12th centuries. See P. Faider, 'Catalogue des manuscrits conservés à Namur' (Gembloux, 1934).

OUDENARDE. Church of St. Walpurga. Church music of the 18th century. See 'Liste générale de la musique appartenant à l'église paroissiale de St. Walpurga à Audenarde' (n.d.). [4.]

TOURNAI. Chapter Library of Cathedral. Contained a 3-part mass of the 13th century, published by Coussemaker in the 'Bulletin de la Société Historique de Tournai', and reprinted separately in 1861. [4.]

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

It has proved very difficult to obtain reliable up-to-date information concerning the music libraries of this country, but for the sake of completion much of the old pre-war information from the 4th edition is included, although it is possible that in some cases the libraries themselves no longer exist.

BARTFELD. Church of St. Aegidius. Small collection of printed vocal music of 16th–17th-century date. [4.]

KREMSIER. Archiepiscopal Archives. These contain some of the most important sources of 17th-century Baroque music in Bohemia and Moravia, in the collections of Bishop Carol Lichtentstern (1664–95) and of the Archduke Rudolph, Archbishop of Olomouc from 1819 to 1831, a pupil of Beethoven. This latter collection also includes some autograph sketches by Beethoven. See A. Breitenbacher, 'Hudební archiv kolegiatního kostela sv. Morice Kroměříž' in Z.M.W. (1926).

OLOMOUC. Studienbibliothek. Printed music of early 17th century, including Schmid's 'Tablaturbuch' (1607) and MS graduals of 13th–14th centuries. [4.]

PRAGUE. a. Cathedral Chapter Library. Masses by Luyton (Prague, 1609, etc.); sacred music of 16th–17th centuries. Catalogues by A. Podlaha (Prague, 1904, 1910). [4.]

b. Library of Count von Nostitz-Rieneck. Various printed works of 16th–17th centuries [4.]

c. Premonstratensian Monastery of Strakow. Small collection, chiefly of 16th–17th centuries.

d. St. Thomas's Church. Contains a copy of Uberti's 'Contrasto musico' (Rome, 1630). [4.]

e. University Library. MS treatises of 11th and 15th centuries; Bohemian songs of 14th and 15th centuries; two Easter mystery plays of 15th and 16th centuries; printed theoretical works of 16th–17th centuries and lute books by Caroso, Negri and Schmid, and the large general collection of the famous Czech violinist J. Kubelík. [4 & S.]

f. The Conservatory of Music. Library of c. 20,000 vols. See R. Procházka, 'Aus fünf Jahrhunderten: Musikschätze des Prager Konservatoriums' (Prague, 1911). [S.]

g. The Smetana Music Library. Attached to the Municipal Library of Prague, this collection contains about 78,000 printed works, mostly by Slav composers. Director: Dr. J. Dostab.

RAUDNITZ. Lobkowiczky Archiv a Knihovna. (Library of the Lobkowitz family.) This contains some rare MSS and printed music of the 17th and 18th centuries. Of special interest are a number of 17th-century MSS of music for lute, guitar and mandoline, in tablature. See P. Nettl, 'Musicalia der fürstlich Lobkowitzschen Bibliothek in Raudnitz' in 'Mitt. des Vereines f. Geschichte der Deutschen in Böhmen', LVIII, i (1919); and A. Tessier, 'La Rhétorique des Dieux et autres pièces de luth de Denis Gaultier', publ. by Société Française de Musicologie (Paris, 1933).

SAAZ. Capuchin Monastery. Sacred and secular music by Lassus, Scandelli, Joachim, Burck, etc. [4.]

TEPL. Premonstratensian Monastery. The Library contains a number of liturgical MSS, the earliest being a Penitential of the 8th or 9th century, with neumes. A catalogue of the MSS was made by a former librarian, M. Nenturich, and a short description of some of the more important of these is given by W. Vacek in 'Zum 700-jährigen Todestage des S. Hroznata' (Marienbad, 1917).

DENMARK

AARHUS. Statsbibliothek. There is a large collection of music and musical literature, chiefly modern, in this Library, of which a series of class-catalogues have been issued. It is a "copyright" library, and receives a copy of every work printed in Denmark. In 1922 the publishing firm of W. Hansen presented a large collection, consisting of its own library of old music and the stock of two defunct music lending libraries. This collection is particularly rich in chamber music of the 18th and early 19th centuries.

COPENHAGEN. a. The Royal Library. This contains a collection of MS organ music, in tablature, by German composers of the 17th century; Italian printed music of the late 16th and early 17th centuries; and some rare printed music from Copenhagen and Antwerp presses. The medieval MSS include the famous Chansonnier publ. by K. Jeppesen in 1927; a MS vol. of keyboard pieces of the early 17th century is described by P. Hamburger in Z.M.W., XIII (1930-31). The library also contains the extensive collection of C.E.F. Weyse (1774-1812), one of the founders of modern Danish music. [4 & S.]

b. The Musikhistorisk Museum possesses a number of theoretical works relating to musical instruments and a few liturgical works, printed and MS. See A. Hammerich, 'Musik-historisk Museum, Beskrivende Illustreret Katalog' (Copenhagen, 1909; Ger. trans., 1911). [4.]

EIRE

DUBLIN. a. The National Library of Ireland. The most important works are contained in the 23,500 vols. collected by Dr. J. Joly and presented by him to the Library. The musical portion of this collection consists mostly of 18th-century works, comprising Irish and Scottish songbooks with a number of collections of country dances, some of great rarity. In all there are 683 vols., 175 of Irish music, 176 of Scottish, 84 of English, 17 of Welsh and 231 of a miscellaneous character. This latter class includes rare works by Campian, Playford, Durfey, etc., early ballad operas and 18th-century songsheets. The latter class was greatly enriched by the presentation in 1942 of the library of the late George Noble, Count Plunkett, of 400 vols., including 100 songsheets. Librarian: R. J. Hayes.

b. The Royal Irish Academy of Music. The Library has a good collection of scores and orchestral parts, and a general working collection of printed music, with some collected editions. The library of the defunct "Antient Concerts" society (of Dublin) is also housed here. Librarian: Miss A. MacCarthy; Secretary: S. Jeffares.

c. Archbishop Marsh's Library. This collection contains much printed and MSS music of the late 16th and 17th centuries. The partbooks include a complete set of Adson's 'Courtly Masquing Ayres' (1621); the C.T.B.Q. parts of 'Prima stella di madrigali' by Lassus and others (Venice, 1570); 9 partbooks of 'Gratulationes Marianae' (Antwerp, 1636); Masses by G. Messaeus (Antwerp, 1633), Willems (Antwerp, 1639), Viadana's 'First Book' (Antwerp, 1625) and many other partbooks, chiefly by English and Italian composers. The MSS consist largely of instrumental fantasies, lute pieces, etc., by English and Italian composers of the 17th century. Two of the most interesting are a book of madrigals arranged for lute, probably Italian, in tablature, c. 1590; and a score of Handel's 'Messiah', c. 1761. See N. J. D. White, 'An Account of Archbishop Marsh's Library, Dublin, with a Note on Autographs by N. B. White' (Dublin, 1926). Librarian: The Rev. N. B. White.

d. Trinity College. The Ebenezer Prout Library is kept in the Long Room and besides a miscellaneous collection of modern music received under the Copyright Act contains a few liturgical MSS and some 16th-18th-century music, among which are the lute books of W. Ballet and T. Dallis. The latter volume also contains a few keyboard pieces. See T. K. Abbott, 'Catalogue of the Manuscripts in the Library of Trinity College, Dublin' (Dublin, 1900). Librarian: H. W. Parke.

ENGLAND (see Great Britain)

FINLAND

HELSINGFORS. a. University Library. Collection of fragmentary MSS, recovered from old bindings, containing many fragments of missals, etc. See T. Haapanen in 'Universitetsbiblioteks Skrifter', Vol. IV (1922-), also the same author's 'Die Neumenfragmente der Universität Helsingfors' (1924). [4.]

b. Sibelius Academy. The Library contains some 25,000 pieces of music and 2500 books on music. Librarians: H. Leiviskä and M. Rautio.

c. Library of the State Orchestra. Some 2000 scores and sets of parts. Librarian: N. E. Ringbom. See J.M.W. (1949-50), p. 310.

d. Radio Helsinki. Some 6000 scores and parts. Librarians: E. Linko and V. Aho. See J.M.W. (1949-50), p. 310.

FRANCE

A most useful addition to our knowledge of French library resources is M. François Lesure's 'Richesses musicologiques des bibliothèques provinciales', of which Pt. i appeared in 'Revue de Musicologie', XXXII, new ser. 95-96 (Paris, Dec. 1950). This deals mainly with 'Impressions italiennes du XVI^e siècle', but also contains a most valuable list of the municipal libraries of France with a brief indication of their musical contents, which list is indicated below by [L.]. For the MS material the main authority is still the 'Catalogue général des manuscrits des bibliothèques publiques' (C.G.M.). For general information see 'Répertoire des bibliothèques de France', 3 vols. (Paris, Bibl. Nat., 1950-51).

AOEN. Bibliothèque Municipale. Collection of the Dukes of Aiguillon, consisting mainly of 18th-century vocal and instrumental music. See 'Inventaire-sommaire' of the Archives Départementales. [L.]

AIX-EN-PROVENCE. Bibliothèque Méjanes. Contains a 14th-century MS of French troubadour songs and an early 17th-century collection of nearly 100 songs with lute accompaniment. See C.G.M., Vol. XVI (1894) and supplement to Vols. XL (1902) and XLV (1915). [4.]

AMIENS. Bibliothèque Municipale. A few early printed treatises, a number of French psalters of the 17th century, operas and songs of the 18th century, works by local composers, including 17 vols. of sacred music and 5 of operas by Lesueur. For the printed music see 'Catalogue méthodique de la Bibliothèque de la ville d'Amiens', 'Sciences et arts', 1859. Among the MSS are many interesting liturgies, etc., and a collection of sequences. See 'The Ecclesiologist', Oct. 1859. For the MSS in general see C.G.M., Vol. XIX (1892) and supplement in Vol. XL (1902) [4 and L.].

ANGERS. Bibliothèque Municipale. Early theoretical works, music of the 17th-18th centuries and works by local composers. See catalogue by A. Lemarchand (1873). [L.]

ANNECY. Bibliothèque Municipale. The Martin collection of classical music. [L.]

AUXERRE. Bibliothèque Municipale. The Leblanc-Duvernoy and Claude collections of chamber music. [L.]

AVIGNON. Bibliothèque Municipale. Contains 13,000 items of music, comprising the collection of the Académie de Musique of Avignon, very rich in 17th- and 18th-century material; and also part of the former library of Castil-Blaze, the whole being catalogued on slips. It includes some fine early missals and liturgical works. See C.G.M., Vols. XXVII-XXIX (1894-1901) and supplements in Vols. XL (1902) and XLIV (1911). [4 and L.]

AVRANCHES. Bibliothèque Municipale. Collection of English operas. [4.]

BERNAY (Eure). The local library contains some 17th- and 18th-century works.

BESANÇON. Bibliothèque Municipale. Contains a 9th-century MS of Boethius, 'De Musica', also religious works of the 16th century and much music of the 17th and 18th centuries, including works by local composers. See Catalogue ('Arts', 1885) and C.G.M., Vols. XXXII-XXXIII and XLV (1907-15). Librarian: M. Piquard.

BORDEAUX. Bibliothèque de la Ville. Important collection of 18th- and 19th-century music, the bequest of the Académie des Sciences, etc., of the city, also of the widow of Spontini; and others. It contains some symphonies by F. Beck, the Mannheim composer who died at Bordeaux in 1809. See J. Delas, 'Catalogue des livres composant la Bibliothèque de la ville de Bordeaux, musique' (Bordeaux, 1856) and for the MSS C.G.M., Vols. XXIII and XL (1894 and 1902). [4 and L.]

CAEN. Bibliothèque Municipale. See Carlez, 'Liste des œuvres musicales et des œuvres relatives à la musique' (Caen, n.d.), also C.G.M., Vols. XIV (1890) and XLI (1903), also M.G.G., XIII-XIV, p. 634, art. Caen.

CAMBRAI. Bibliothèque Municipale. Collection of MS church music by early Flemish and Burgundian musicians and part-songs of the 14th century. See Coussemaker, 'Notice sur les collections de la Bibliothèque de Cambrai' (1843) and A. J. L. Glay, 'Catalogue des manuscrits... de Cambrai' (Cambrai, 1831); also M.G.G., XIII-XIV, p. 710 ff., art. Cambrai.

CARCASSONNE. Bibliothèque Municipale. Italian madrigals of the 16th century. [L.]

CARPENTRAS. Bibliothèque Municipale. Some 2700 items of vocal and instrumental music, of the 17th and 18th centuries, including the Bonaventure and Laurens collections. Among the MSS are Kepler's 'Principium musicæ'; autographs of Schumann, Brahms, Gounod, Bach, etc. See partial catalogue by R. Caillet (1901); also C.G.M., Vols. XXXIV-XXXVI (1899-1903); also M.G.G., XIII-XIV, p. 865 ff. Librarian: L. Bouysson.

CHANTILLY. Musée Condé. Numerous collections of 16th-century music, including partly that of Cigogne. [L.]

CHARLEVILLE. Bibliothèque Municipale. Some 2000 musical items. [L.]

CLERMONT-FERRAND. Bibliothèque Municipale. The Grenier-Hayn collection, consisting mainly of scores by composers of the Second Empire, with many dedications. [L.]

COLMAR. a. Bibliothèque Municipale. The C. Sandherr collection of works on the history and theory of music. [L.]

b. Consistoire Protestant. A fine series of psalters in all languages, with music, of early 16th-century date. [L.]

DIEPPE. Bibliothèque Municipale. The Saint-Saëns collection.

DIJON. a. Bibliothèque de la Ville. This Library possesses a MS songbook of the 15th century, which is one of the largest and best collections of its kind. See S. Morelot, 'Notice sur un manuscrit de musique ancienne de la Bibliothèque de Dijon' ('Mémoires de la Commission du Dépt. de la Côte d'Or', Vol. IV, 1856); Pirro, Thibault and Rokseth, 'Trois Chansonniers français du XV^e siècle', Vol. I (Paris, 1927). There is also a copy of Rameau's 'Traité de l'harmonie' with autograph notes by the author.

b. Conservatoire. The Bibliothèque Kervéguen contains 11,000 items bequeathed by Count Kervéguen in 1895. [L.]

DOUAI. Bibliothèque Municipale. A 12th-century MS with 2-part vocal music; Hymnarium of the 12th century; some printed theoretical works of the 16th century. See Coussemaker's work quoted under CAMBRAI, also C.G.M., Vol. VI (1878). [4.]

DUNQUERQUE. Bibliothèque Municipale. It is not known if any of the 16th-century printed works noted in Grove [4] still survive.

ÉPERNAY. Bibliothèque Municipale. 17th- and 18th-century scores. See Catalogue by L. Paris, Vol. II, pp. 270-76 (1884). [L.]

PARIS. a. Bibliothèque Nationale. The collections, now united (since 30 Oct. 1935) under this general heading, constitute one of the richest collections not only in France but in the whole world. They comprise:

- (i) The Bibliothèque Nationale itself, including the Department of MSS and the Department of Music, which is united with the two following:
- (ii) The Conservatoire Library.
- (iii) The Library of the Paris Opéra.

These three collections are undoubtedly the most complete in France, especially in works of reference, musical literature, periodicals, dictionaries, etc., to say nothing of MSS of all kinds and a wonderful array of printed editions of every period.

(i) The Bibliothèque Nationale itself. In the Department of MSS are collected series of MSS of the middle ages, thanks to which this library holds a place of prime importance for the study of the origins of European music. One notices in particular the important series of theoretical works; an extremely precious collection of liturgical works; MSS of the 9th century with notation; a rich collection of troubadour songs of the 13th century; of French and Italian music of the 14th century; of chansonniers of the 15th and 16th centuries. Since 1950 the Department has been enriched by the celebrated James de Rothschild collection, which also contains chansonniers of the 15th century and editions of the 16th century. The Department of Music, which was formed in 1942 by the administrative union of the music formerly incorporated in the Department of Printed Books, with that of the libraries of the Conservatoire and Opéra, includes not only a very rich collection of printed music, but also of music MSS of post 16th-century date. The actual Bibliothèque Nationale section of this united collection has been largely formed and is continually being enriched by virtue of a copyright law far older than the English one, dating in principle from the mid-16th century. The earlier periods are unfortunately far from complete, but even so constitute an invaluable source of early printed source material. This "copyright" collection has been continually augmented by acquisitions, donations and exchanges; altogether it comprehends some 300,000 vols. The rarest items are to be found in the Sébastien Brossard collection of MSS and printed books of the 16th and 17th centuries, which came to the library in 1726; the 28 autograph volumes of M. A. Charpentier's works; the autographs of Rameau, J.-J. Rousseau, Gluck, Haydn, Berlioz, etc. There are also a great many printed books on musical subjects in the various sections of the Department of Printed Books. See J. Écorcheville, 'Catalogue du fonds de musique ancienne de la Bibliothèque Nationale de Paris', 8 vols. (Paris, 1910-14).

(ii) The Conservatoire Library. This was created at the same time as the Conservatoire itself, by the decree of 16 Thermidor, Year III of the Republic, and was originally formed from the musical works formerly in the possession of the kings and aristocrats of the ancien régime. These works, both MS and printed, often magnificently bound and ornamented with the resplendent coats-of-arms of their former owners, form a precious and important nucleus around which has gathered an enormous collection, acquired in various ways, including the spoils of war of the First Empire; by copyright deposition (since 1834); by purchase; and by donation. Since 1947 a system of international exchange has brought a considerable contribution of the contemporary music of other countries. The collection comprises altogether some 500,000 works, and is made up as follows:

1. A Reserved Class of (a) some 10,000 autographs, mostly belonging to the Charles Malherbe collection, bequeathed in 1911 and including such items as Mozart's 'Don Giovanni', Beethoven's 'Appassionata', major works by Berlioz, Bizet, Chopin, Debussy, etc., and a complete set of the "cantates de Rome" since 1803. (b) Some 5000 rare works, including the 'Odhecaton', works by Aaron, Agricola, Gafuri, etc., original editions of the works of the great masters; the Blancheton collection of 18th-century instrumental works; Bottée de Toulmont collection of 85 vols. of copies of 14th-16th-century works, from the original MSS sources in Munich, Vienna and Rome; Schoelcher Handel collection; and 20,000 autograph letters of musicians. Of special interest to English musicians is a large folio MS of compositions by Copernicus, Lawes, Jenkins, etc.

2. A General Class, consisting of the old royal and aristocratic music, enlarged in the manner indicated above. Besides the actual music, it includes French and foreign musicological publications, musical periodicals and a complete collection of papers in fugue, harmony and counterpoint submitted at the annual students' examinations; also collections of librettos (mostly opéra-comique) and concert programmes. There are also collections of prints, portraits and musical criticisms, mainly contemporary (the Montpensier collection) formed by the Association Française d'Action Artistique and deposited in the Conservatoire in 1948. The card catalogues are formed on the same principles as those of the Bibliothèque Nationale itself: authors (alphabetical), anonymous, analytical, subjects, titles, authors of words, illustrators. Catalogues of prints (by subjects) and of librettos (by titles, with cross-references to authors and composers) are in progress. The old printed catalogue, by J. B. Weckerlin (1885) is still useful for certain works in the Reserved Class. In 1930 L. de La Laurencie published a 'Catalogue critique du Fonds Blancheton' ('Publications de la Société Française de Musicologie, série Documents').

(iii) The Library of the Paris Opéra. This was founded in 1866, and contains the scores and orchestral material of works performed since 1671, including numerous autograph MSS of Rameau, Gluck, Spontini, Chopin, Rossini, Wagner, Massenet, Chabrier, Fauré, etc. There is also a very rich collection of librettos (Fonds Silvestri) and of stage and costume designs, together with works dealing with the history of the lyric theatre and the ballet. See T. de Lajarte, 'Bibliothèque musicale du Théâtre de l'Opéra. Catalogue', 2 vols. (Paris, 1878).

b. Bibliothèque de l'Arsenal. The Library of the Arsenal contains many interesting MSS, such as the 'Mazarinades'—songs sung under the Fronde—with their airs; collections of airs by M. Lambert and other little-known composers of the 17th and 18th centuries. The best-known treasure in the Library is the so-called 'Chansonnier de l'Arsenal' or sometimes 'Chansonnier du Roi de Navarre', a unique collection of secular songs dating from the first half of the 13th century. See H. Martin in C.G.M., Vols. IV-XII (1885-1894), also in C.G.M., Vol. VII (1888) and supplementary lists in Vols. XLIII (1904) and XLV (1915). See also L. de La Laurencie and A. Gastoué, 'Catalogue des livres de musique (manuscrits et imprimés) de la Bibl. de l'Arsenal à Paris' (Paris, 1936) and A. Gastoué, 'Catalogue du fonds musical de la Bibl. de l'Arsenal' (MSS only, 1942). Keeper: F. Calot.

c. Bibliothèque Historique de la Ville de Paris. This Library, in the Musée Carnavalet, is valuable for its MSS and printed-works on the theatres of Paris and the instrument makers of the city. Chief Librarian and Keeper: J. de la Monneraye.

d. Bibliothèque Sainte-Geneviève. This Library, which forms part of the University of Paris, contains a large number of rare works on music; a fine collection of songs and dramatic works, especially of the 16th century, with the music; and many curious MSS, including a valuable MS of the 11th century. See E. Porée and G. Lamoureux, 'Les Éléments d'une grande bibliothèque — catalogue abrégé de la Bibliothèque de Ste-Geneviève' (Paris, 1897-1910). See also C.G.M. (1893 & 1896). Conservateur: G. de Valons.

e. Bibliothèque Mazarine. This contains a small collection of early liturgical MSS, including a Roman Antiphoner with neumes. See A. Molinier, Catalogue in 4 vols. (Paris, 1885-92). There are also some rare printed works. [4.]

f. The Pincherle Collection. The private Library of the musicologist Marc Pincherle contains a fine collection of music for strings; books about the violin family; and many autographs, including letters or compositions by Tartini, Vivaldi, Viotti, Mozart, Beethoven, Berlioz, Weber, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Wagner, Debussy and Ravel. Some of the letters have been published in M. Pincherle's work 'Musiciens peints par eux-mêmes' (Paris, 1939).

g. Conservatoire National des Arts et Métiers. The Library contains few musical works, but is rich in material for the history of the music trade, such as patents, trade registers, etc. Librarian: Mlle L. Mollet.

i. Cortot Collection. See Lausanne, Switzerland.

k. Centre de Documentation de Musique Internationale; 2 bis rue Vivienne (II^e). All kinds of documentation, etc., concerning both old and new music; microfilms, etc.; works on music; periodicals of all nations; extensive catalogues.

l. Société des Auteurs et Compositeurs Dramatiques. There is a music section in the Library of this Society, which was founded in 1777 on the initiative of Beaumarchais; the Library has grown with the Society.

m. Radiodiffusion Française. Practical working collection for broadcasting purposes, with large reference Library, collections of scores, biographies, etc. Librarian: M. E. Straram.

n. Institut de Musicologie, 3 rue Michelet (VI^e). Library for study of musicology, under the auspices of the University of Paris. Formed from the collection of P. Aubry (d. 1910) given by his widow to the University of Paris. Director: M. P. Masson.

o. The Prunières Collection, formed by Henri Prunières, the musicologist, editor of Lully's works, is still in the possession of his family. It includes many scarce examples of early French and Italian editions, also lute tablatures, 17th-century chansons, motets and operas by Campra, Lully, Lalande, etc.

k. The André Meyer Collection, 147 Boulevard Malesherbe, contains many rare works in music and musical literature, also autographs of Lully, Beethoven, Wagner, Berlioz, etc., as well as musical instruments and paintings, etc., relating to music. It is constantly being augmented.

g. Comtesse de Chambure has a very interesting collection of old music and instruments at Neuilly.

r. Mme Gouin also has a very interesting private collection.

ROANNE. Bibliothèque Municipale. 18th-century scores. See Catalogue by J. Augagneur (1856). [L.]

ROUEN. Bibliothèque Municipale. 8000 items, from the 16th to the 19th centuries, including the Baudry collection of operas and orchestral material; the Bachelet collection of scores and the Sanson Boieldieu Collection. See Catalogue (very incomplete) by T. Licquet (1883). [L.]

ROYAUMONT. The Abbey. Very interesting collection, with many rarities.

SAINT-QUENTIN. Bibliothèque Municipale. Jumentier collection of scores by the great masters from the end of the 18th century and the beginning of the 19th. [L.]

SELESTAT. Bibliotheca Alcediana. 3000 items bequeathed by the Abbé Vogeles. [L.]

STRASBOURG. a. Bibliothèque de l'Institut de Musicologie de la Faculté des Lettres. This collection, which includes part of those of O. Jahn and G. Jacobsthal, possesses a very good collection of old and new printed books and music, including theoretical treatises by Gafurio, Glareanus, Zarlino, etc., in 16th-century editions; early editions of Schein, Praetorius, Lully, Rameau, Piccinini, Gluck and many others. The autographs include Gabrieli, Scarlatti, Galuppi, Gluck and Haydn. See F. Ludwig 'Die älteren Musikwerke der von G. Jacobsthal . . . begründeten Bibliothek des Akademischen Gesangvereins, Strassburg' (Strasbourg, 1913).

b. University Library. Includes a small collection of early printed musical works, including items by Tritonius (1507) and Besard (1617). [4.]

c. The Seminary. See J. Victori, in 'Kirchliche Rundschau' (1901), also in M.f.M.

d. Cathedral Library. 100 MSS of church compositions by F. Richter, who was maître de chapelle from 1769 to 1780. See F. X. Mathias in 'Riemann Festschrift' (Leipzig, 1909).

TOULOUSE. Conservatoire de Musique. Contains the former municipal library collection of music. [L.]

TOURS. Bibliothèque Municipale. Possesses a Sacramentarium of the 9th–10th centuries with neumes; mystery plays of the 12th century; liturgies of the 15th to 18th centuries; 17th-century motets; organ music, including autographs by N. Le Bègue; an MS of J. de Muris, and much else of interest. See A. J. Dorange, 'Catalogue . . . des manuscrits de la bibliothèque de 'Tours' (1875), also C.G.M., Vol. XXXVII (1900), and S.I.M.G. (1905). [4.]

TROYES. Bibliothèque Municipale. Early printed works in this Library include a copy of Praetorius's 'Syntagma'; some Phalèse publications, from 1573 onwards; some early lute books; a good deal of instrumental music of the 18th century. See E. Socard, 'Catalogue de la Bibliothèque de la Ville de Troyes', Vol. XIV (1875); also 'Sciences et arts', Vol. III (1887). Librarian: Mlle F. Bibolet.

VALENCIENNES. Bibliothèque Municipale. Among the books in this Library are several early MS treatises of the 9th century by Hucbald, Isidore of Seville and the French monk Aurelien, the last being very rare and interesting. See C.G.M., Vol. XXV (1894) and Coussemaker, 'Notices sur les collections musicales de la Bibliothèque de Cambrai et des autres villes du Département du Nord' (1843).

VERSAILLES. Bibliothèque Municipale. The City Library has about 200 music MSS of the 17th and 18th centuries, consisting of part of the Philidor collection (of which the greater part is at Tenbury) and some songs from the School for Young Ladies at Saint-Cyr. It is rich also in printed books and music of the 16th century (the Goujet collection), of the 17th and 18th centuries (from the old royal collections) and of the 19th century (the Augusta Holmès collection), of which a special section is devoted to the history and criticism of music. See C.G.M., Vol. IX (1888), with MS corrections in the library's own copy; also A. Tessier, 'Un Catalogue de la Bibliothèque de la Musique du Roi' (in 'Revue de Musicologie', May 1931); also E. H. Fellowes, 'The Philidor Manuscripts: Paris, Versailles, Tenbury' in M. & L., Vol. XII (1931). There are 2 MS catalogues of the complete collections and a card index in the Library. Librarian: P. Breillat.

VESOUL. Bibliothèque Municipale. Miscellaneous French and Italian collections of the 16th century. [L.]

GERMANY

It has proved extremely difficult, and in many cases impossible, to obtain reliable information about the formerly numerous and extensive German music libraries, especially for those now in the eastern zone of Germany [SZ]. In doubtful cases the information given in the 4th edition [4] is reprinted, because even where the Library buildings were destroyed during the war the books themselves were often saved by evacuation and are gradually being reassembled. The 'Jahrbuch der Musikwelt' (J.M.W., 1949–50 ed.) has been of great assistance in the case of German libraries, and is often the only source of information available in England. See also 'Notes' (1947); R. Schaal, 'Deutsche Musikbibliotheken', Mitt. 2 of Gesellschaft der Musikforschung (Cassel, 1947); 'Jahresbericht' 1946–47 of Arbeitsgemeinschaft Berliner Bibliotheken; P. Butler in 'Library Quarterly', Vol. XVIII (1948); G. Leyh, 'Die deutschen wissenschaftlichen Bibliotheken nach dem Krieg' (Tübingen, 1947).

ANSBACH. Regierungsbibliothek. This Government Library contains a small collection of printed music of the 16th century, including the 'Cantiones' of Lassus (1565) and Luther's 'Geistliche Lieder'. There are also MS copies of Ziani's 'Annibale in Capua' (1661) and Cavalli's 'Pompeo' (1666). Librarian: L. von Rudolph.

ARNSTADT. Kurrendebibliothek. This Library, which is that of the church and corporation of choristers, possesses some 500 vols. of 16th-century vocal music. The MS volume of motets by Bach, Telemann, etc., quoted in earlier editions of this Dictionary, unfortunately disappeared during the second world war.

AUGSBURG. a. Staats- und Stadtbibliothek. A valuable collection of early printed and MS music, chiefly from the suppressed monasteries of the city, is housed in the City Library. See H. M. Schletter, 'Katalog der in der Kreis- und Stadtbibliothek, dem städtischen Archiv und der Bibliothek des historischen Vereins zu Augsburg befindlichen Musikwerke' in M.f.M., Vols. XI & XII, Apps. (Leipzig, 1878). Librarian: Dr. P. Geissler.

b. Bibliothek des bischöflichen Ordinariats. Although the building was severely damaged during the second world war, the interesting early MSS have all survived. See B. Kraft, 'Die frühmittelalterlichen Handschriften der bischöflichen Ordinariats-Bibliothek in Augsburg' in 'Das Schwäbische Museum', No 4 (1930).

AUGUSTUSBURG, SAXONY. [SZ.] Parish church library. Some music of the 16th-17th centuries. [4.]

AURICH, EAST FRIESLAND. Staatsarchiv. 17th-century collection of songs. As this collection was evacuated during the war, these may have survived.

BAMBERG. [SZ.] The public library contained some liturgical MSS, with neumes, and some printed music of late 17th-century date. See F. Leitschuh and H. Fischer, 'Katalog der Handschriften der Kgl. Bibliothek zu Bamberg', 3 vols. (Bamberg, Leipzig, 1887-1912). [4.]

BAYREUTH. Haus Wahnfried. Wagner Archives. Autographs of Wagner's works and a large collection of letters. [4.]

BERLIN. a. Preussische Staatsbibliothek. The contents of the music section of this library, one of the foremost collections of the world, were divided in 1939, for evacuation, and are now in three other libraries. (See also Berlin, b. Öffentliche Wissenschaftliche Bibliothek, Marburg, a. Westdeutsche Bibliothek, and Tübingen, University Library). See M. Gremer in 'Zweiter Weltkongress der Musikbibliotheken, 1950' (Cassel, 1951).

b. Öffentliche Wissenschaftliche Bibliothek. As far as can be ascertained, about 200,000 of the 400,000 vols. of music and musical literature formerly in the Prussian State Library are now housed in the Public Library. These are reputed to include all the books on music, the collected editions and the German 'Denkmäler' series. For particulars of the pre-war collections see W. Altmann in Z.f.M. (1919-20, 1920-21, 1923 and 1926) and the volumes of the 'Jahresbericht der Preussischen Staatsbibliothek'; also J.M.W. (1949-50), p. 306; for war damage, etc., see R. S. Hill in 'Notes' (Sept. 1946); also P. Wackernagel in 'Musica', Vol. I (1947). Head of Music Dept.: Dr. P. Wackernagel.

c. Hochschule für Musik. The Library of this institution, formerly a state school, possesses the former library of J. A. P. Spitta; also some rare printed music of the 17th and 18th centuries, with a number of scores of 18th-century French operas.

d. Bibliothek zum Grauen Kloster. Destroyed, with its contents, during the second world war.

e. Kgl. Hausbibliothek. This Library is said to have been destroyed during the second world war, but there is reason to believe that some items at least have survived. See J.M.W. (1949-50), p. 306. For former collection see G. Thouret, 'Die Musiksammlung auf der Kgl. Hausbibliothek im Schlosse zu Berlin' (Berlin, 1895).

f. Joachimsthalisches Gymnasium, formerly in Berlin, now in the Landesschule des Kreises Templin, at Templin in the Soviet Zone. Severe losses have been sustained in the library, but exact details are wanting.

g. Kaiserin-Augusta-Gymnasium (Charlottenburger Gymnasium). The Library, which had been evacuated to western Germany, has now been returned to Berlin and is in the Charlottenburger Gymnasium. So far as can be learned, nothing appreciable has been lost. See F. Schultz, 'Der ältere Notenschatz des Kaiserin-Augusta-Gymnasiums' (Charlottenburg, 1900).

h. Akademie für deutsche Schul- und Kirchenmusik. The sacred music has been removed to the Soviet Zone. The "School Music" collection has been attached to the Hochschule für Musik Library (see c.). The catalogue is being reconstructed.

i. Internationales Musik-Brief-Archiv, Berlin-Charlottenburg 2. A collection of some 5000 autograph letters, etc., c. 3000 published letters, and other books on music literature, catalogues of autographs and some 10,000 photo-copies, 500 portraits, etc., and more than 50,000 index cards for the 'Gesamt-Katalog der Musiker - Briefe'. Director: Dr. Mueller von Asow.

k. Interalliierte Musikleihbibliothek, Charlottenstr. 39-41, Berlin, N.W.7. Lending Library of 10,000 vols. of music of all nations, opened in 1946. See J.M.W. (1949-50), p. 306. Director: M. Peterka.

BOCHUM. Stadtbibliothek. A music section of c. 4500 vols. of music and books on music.

BONN. a. University Library. The music section contains chiefly 19th-century music, but among the few early works are copies of Ornithoparcus's 'Micrologus' (1517) and Lassus's 'Magnum Opus Musicum' (1604). Director: K. Lebach.

b. Beethoven House. This collection contains many original MSS, old and new editions of his works, and many other publications, both German and foreign, concerning his life and work. Some of the MSS have been published in critical editions. See G. Schmidt-Görg, 'Katalog der Handschriften des Beethovens-Hauses und -Archivs, Bonn' (Bonn, 1935). Director: J. Schmidt-Görg.

BRANDENBURG. [SZ.] Church of St. Catharine. Part-books and vocal music of 16th-18th centuries. See J. F. Täglichsbeck, 'Die musikalischen Schätze der St. Katharinen-Kirche zu Brandenburg a/H', in the 'Gymnasiums-Programm' (1857). [4.]

BREMEN. Stadtbibliothek. Details are lacking concerning the 74 musical works belonging to this Library; before the war these were in the care of the Tonkünstler-Verein. [4.]

BRESLAU. See Poland (Wrocław).

BRIEG. The musical collection formerly in the Kgl. Gymnasium had been transferred to Breslau before the second world war. See M.f.M., App. (1897).

BÜCKEBURG. Notenarchiv der Stadt. Orchestral works, oratorios, etc. See J.M.W. (1949-50), p. 307.

CARLSRUHE. Badische Landesbibliothek. The music section contains, among some 1100 MSS, a number of medieval treatises, a good collection of 16th- and 17th-century hymnals and some 18th-century chamber music, and many printed operatic vocal scores. See H. Ehrenberger, 'Bibliotheca liturgica manuscripta: nach Handschriften der grossherzoglichen Badischen Hof- und Landesbibliothek' (Carlsruhe, 1889). Director: F. Lautenschlager.

CASSEL. Landesbibliothek. Said to have been destroyed in the second world war, but part of it at least is now in Marburg o/Lahn, according to J.M.W. (1949-50), pp. 310 & 312. For former collections see C. Israel, 'Übersichtlicher Katalog der ständischen Landesbibliothek zu Cassel' (Cassel, 1881).

CELLE. Kirchenministerial-Bibliothek. The Italian works formerly in this Library have been sold; there remains a collection of 18th- and 19th-century choral and organ music, the legacy of H. W. Stolze, a former organist of Celle (d. 1863). Superintendent: Dr. Hoppe.

CHARLOTTENBURG. See Berlin.

COLOGNE. a. Historisches Archiv der Stadt Köln. The 12th-century MS copy of 'Musica Enchiriadis' formerly in the University Library is now in these archives. Archivist: Dr. W. Kahl.

b. Staatliche Hochschule für Musik. This institution, formerly the Conservatory, possesses a good collection of books. It was severely damaged during the war and the Catalogue made by F. Bolsche in 1909 is accordingly incorrect. A new catalogue is in preparation. Librarian: Dr. Mies.

c. Universitäts- und Stadtbibliothek. It is understood that this Library still contains a few partbooks printed in Venice and Antwerp during the 16th century. The 12th-century MS of the 'Musica Enchiriadis' has been transferred to the Historisches Archiv (see a.)

d. Jesuitenbibliothek. The music books of this collection are also said to be in the Historisches Archiv (see a.)

e. The Heyer Museum collection has now been dispersed.

CRAYN near LIEGNITZ. [SZ]. Nothing is known of the 17th-century works formerly in the Library at Crayn.

DARMSTADT. Hessische Landes- und Hochschulbibliothek. Only about a fifth of the fine collection formerly in this Library remains, as a result of the second world war. A new catalogue is in preparation. For the former collection see P. A. F. Walther, 'Die Musikalien der Gross-herzogl. Hofbibliothek in Darmstadt' (Darmstadt, 1874); also F. W. E. Roth in M.f.M. (1888); F. Noack, 'Christoph Graupner als Kirchenkomponist' (Darmstadt, 1926). Director: Dr. H. Rasp.

DESSAU. [SZ.] Hoftheaterbibliothek. Nothing is known of the extensive collection of theatre, church and instrumental music mentioned in A. Seidl's 'Ascania' (Regensburg, 1913). [4.]

DONAUESCHINGEN. Library of Prince Fürstenburg. This collection contains 13 MS antiphoners and graduals, including two of the 14th century; a 15th-century treatise, 'Regula musicae', and a 15th-century collection of secular songs. There is also a transcript of Acts 1-2 of Mozart's 'Figaro', which appear to represent an early stage of its composition; also some autographs by K. Kreutzer, Kapellmeister in 1818-22. See C. A. Barack, 'Die Handschriften der fürstlich-Fürstenburgischen Hofbibliothek zu Donaueschingen' (Tübingen, 1865). Director: Th. Müller.

DRESDEN. [SZ.] a. Sächsische Landesbibliothek (formerly Kgl. Öffentliche Bibliothek), now at Marienallee 12. This Library was severely damaged during the second world war, and there is as yet no definite information regarding any surviving works. For catalogue of former collection of MSS see 'Katalog der Handschriften der Sächsischen Landesbibliothek', Vol. IV (Dresden, 1923). Director: F. Kremer.

b. State Archives. The MS and printed music here is mainly of the early 17th century. See M.f.M. (1888). Director: Dr. H. Kretschmar.

c. The City Library. Some MSS, as yet uncatalogued, from the estate of F. Draeseke, are now in this Library.

d. Tonkünstlerverein. The Library of this music club contains about 3000 works, chiefly chamber music of the 18th and 19th centuries. President: A. Tröber; Librarian: Dr. Virneisel.

e. Dreikönigskirche. The church and its library were destroyed during the second world war.

f. Municipal Music Library. No details are known of this collection, but it is possible that it may contain material from libraries now destroyed.

DÜSSELDORF. Musikbücherei der Stadt, Kasernstrasse (Haus der Kreissparkasse). Practical working library.

EICHSTATT, Bavaria. Staatsbibliothek. Liturgies, works printed by Attaignant, etc., and music of the 17th–18th centuries. For former collection see M.f.M. (1870). [4.]

EISENACH. a. Bach Museum. In the house, formerly believed to be that of J. S. Bach's birth, this museum contains a large collection of MSS and first editions of his music; many books concerning his family, his life and times; some old musical instruments.

b. Richard Wagner Museum. This house contains autograph music, letters and newspaper cuttings concerning Wagner and possesses a library of some 6000 vols. Director: Dr. Gremer.

ELBING. Town Library. The few rare books which were in this Library were completely destroyed during the second world war. Nothing is known concerning the Marienkirche collection. For former collections, see T. Carstenn in 'Kirchenmusikalisches Jahrbuch' (1896) and G. Doring, 'Die musikalischen Erscheinungen in Elbing' (Elbing, 1868); L. Neubaur, 'Katalog der Stadtbibliothek zu Elbing' (Elbing, 1893).

ERFURT. [SZ.] No details are available concerning the Town Library there; the Michaeliskirche collection was transferred to the Preussische Staatsbibliothek. For bibliographical details see Grove [4].

ERLANGEN. The University. There is a good general working library in the Music School, and a library in the Institute for Church Music.

ESSEN. a. Bibliothek der Folkwangschule. Practical working library. See J.M.W. (1949–1950), p. 308.

b. The Town Library also has a considerable music section. See J.M.W. (1949–50), p. 308.

FRANKFURT O/M. a. Stadt- und Universitätsbibliothek. This title is given to the building which since 1945 has housed all the libraries that have survived at Frankfurt. There is a Music Department which contains the collections formerly housed in the Bibliothek für neue Sprachen und Musik, the Stadtbibliothek and the Archives of the Churches of St. Paul, St. Catharine and St. Peter. Within the "neue Sprachen" collection is that of N. Manskopf, which consists of some 10,000 items, including autographs of Buxtehude, Telemann, Weger, Spohr, Cornelius, Schumann and Wagner. See C. Israel, 'Die musikalischen Schätze der Gymnasialbibliothek und der Peterskirche in Frankfurt a.M.' (1872); also C. Valentin, 'Musikbibliographisches aus Frankfurt a.M.' (1900–2); C. Süss, 'Stadtbibliothek Frankfurt a.M. Kirchliche Musikhandschriften des 17. und 18. Jahrhunderts' (1926). For present-day details see J.M.W., (1949–50), p. 309. Director of the Library: Dr. H. W. Eppelsheimer. Director of the Music Department: Dr. W. Schmieder.

b. The Paul Hirsch collection, formerly at Frankfurt, is now part of the British Museum collections. (See Great Britain, London, a.) FREIBURG, SAXONY. [SZ.] Nothing is known of the present condition of the collections formerly given under this heading, and listed in O. Kade in M.f.M. (Suppl. for 1888).

FULDA. The Landesbibliothek contains some 25 liturgical MSS dating from the 9th to the 15th century, some 18th-century autographs and about 3000 other items. Director: Dr. H. Lemper.

GELENAU. Parish Church. The archives contain some vocal music by German composers of the second half of the 17th century. Director: K. Böhme.

GOtha. Landesbibliothek. As a result of the second world war there is very little left of the small collection of 16th- and 17th-century theoretical works and hymnals which were formerly in this Library. Librarian: B. Voigt.

GÖTTINGEN. The University Library contains 145 musical works mostly of the 15th and 16th centuries, many of great rarity; about 1000 songbooks of the 17th century; some 4000 books on music. There is an alphabetical catalogue system in use, started in 1860 by the late Professor of Music, E. Krüger. See A. Quantz, 'Die Musikwerke der Kgl. Universitätsbibliothek in Göttingen' in M.f.M. (Suppl. for 1883). Director: K. J. Hartmann. Music Librarian: W. M. Luther.

GRIMMA, SAXONY. [SZ.] The Landesbibliothek Collections were transferred to Dresden, and may now have been destroyed. For bibliographical details of former collection see Grove [4].

GREIZ, THURINGIA. Musikbibliothek der Stadtbücherei Greiz. See J.M.W. (1949–50), p. 309.

GÜSTROW, MECKLENBURG-SCHWERIN. Domschule. Small but valuable collection of rare early printed musical works, chiefly of the 16th century, which were described in the School Programme for 1865. [4.]

HALLE. a. The University Library possesses a collection of music formerly in the Marienkirche and about 124 religious works from the collections of K. Zeller and K. Klanert.

b. The University Music School. The Library is rich in 18th-century scores and also possesses a special Robert Franz collection.

See M.f.M. (1894). Librarian: Dr. B. Weissenborn.

c. Pedagogic Institute, formerly the Waisenhausbibliothek. This contains an important collection of hymnals, theoretical works and practical music of the 18th century. Librarian: Dr. F. Zimmermann.

d. Kirchenmusikalischenbibliothek. Contains some 7000 vols. on church music. See 'Verzeichnis der Bücherei' (1925); 'Ergänzung' (1930); 'Werkverzeichnis' (1936); also J.M.W. (1949-50), p. 309.

HAMBURG. a. Staats- und Universitäts-Bibliothek. The second world war brought much damage to this Library. Many of the theoretical works of the 16th and 17th centuries, the Italian music and nearly all the works by English composers, including those of W. Brade and T. Simpson mentioned in previous editions of this Dictionary, have been lost. See 'Library Quarterly', Vol. XVIII (1948). Director: Dr. Tiemann.

b. Forschungsabteilung für vergleichende Musikwissenschaft. This departmental University Library was founded in 1930 and was closely connected until 1946 with the Library of Phonetics. It is now part of the Musikwissenschaftliches Institut (founded 1933), containing about 4000 books and 2500 gramophone records. Librarian: Dr. H. Husmann.

c. Völkerkunde-Museum. The Library has a small music section devoted to exotic and primitive music and musical instruments, and an invaluable collection of articles on the same subjects, from anthropological and ethnological periodicals all over the world.

d. Landeskirchliche Musikbücherei. See J.M.W. (1949-50), p. 309.

HEIDELBERG. The University Library has an ordinary working collection of music, except for a copy of 'Musica Enchiriadis' of the 10th century. The catalogue of J. Krug is now out of date, but see H. Müller, 'Huchalds echte und unechte Schriften über Musik' (Leipzig, 1884). Librarian: Dr. Hannemann.

HEILBRONN. Gymnasialbibliothek. See E. Mayer, 'Mitteilungen aus der Bibliothek des Heilbronner Gymnasiums', No. 2 (Heilbronn, 1893).

HELMSTEDT. a. Gymnasialbibliothek. Theoretical and practical works, mostly by German musicians of the 16th and 17th centuries. [4.]

b. Church of St. Stephen. 17th-century German music by M. Praetorius, J. H. Schein and A. Hammerschmidt. [4.]

JENA. The University Library contains many musical treasures, the chief of which is the 'Jena Liederhandschrift' of 14th- and 15th-century songs, which have been published in facsimile, with an introduction by C. C. Müller (Jena, 1896), and in a critical edition by G. Holz, etc. (Leipzig, 1901). The Library also contains liturgical MSS; the printed collections of songs by Ott (1544), Forster (1539-56) and others. See A.M.Z. (1828) and K. E. Rödiger, 'Die geistlichen Musikhandschriften der Universitäts-Bibliothek Jena' (Jena, 1935). Librarian: A. Predeck.

KAMENZ, SAXONY. Nothing is known of the collection formerly in the Town Library and catalogued in 'Serapeum' (Leipzig, 1853). [4.]

KARLSRUHE. See Carlsruhe.

KÖNIGSBERG. The Staats- und Universitätsbibliothek was completely destroyed during the second world war. For former collections see J. Müller, 'Die musikalischen Schätze der Königlichen und Universitäts-Bibliothek zu Königsberg i. Pr.' (Bonn, 1870) and J. Müller-Blattau in Z.f.M. (1944).

LEIPZIG. [SZ.] According to 'Notes' (Dec. 1947) the following Libraries, although damaged, were all functioning once more.

a. Musikbibliothek Peters. This valuable collection was founded by the firm of C. F. Peters in 1894, and a catalogue by E. Vogel was published the same year. A new catalogue was published by R. Schwarz in 2 vols. in 1910-11. Additions are noted in the Library's famous 'Jahrbuch'. There are at present about 11,000 books and 9000 musical items, including many rare editions from the 15th to the 18th centuries, many MSS and some autographs. There is also a good collection of modern printed music and of opera librettos, and some 1600 portraits, etc. The affairs of the Library are still in the hands of the publishing-house of Peters, but under the supervision of the municipal authorities. Librarian: Dr. E. Schmitz.

b. Town Library. No further information is to hand concerning this Library, nor concerning the present state of the 10th-century treatise by Regius, or the Bach and Wagner collections formerly preserved here, but it is said to have been reopened.

c. University Library. No information available concerning the theoretical works, librettos and St. Thomas Church Archives noted in earlier editions of this Dictionary, but it is said to be open.

d. The Breitkopf & Härtel archives, dating back to 1719, are reported to have been destroyed during the second world war.

LIEGNITZ. See Poland.

LÜBECK. a. Stadtbibliothek. In this Library there was much valuable early German and Italian music, both printed and MSS, and some early theoretical treatises on music. Since 1931 the Library had built up a considerable collection of first editions, also of books about music. During the second world war many of the most valuable works were removed for safety, and it has not been found possible to trace them. There is still a large collection there, however. For former collections see W. Stahl, 'Musik-Bücher der Lübecker Stadtbibliothek' (Lübeck, 1927); and 'Die Musikabteilung der Lubecker Stadtbibliothek in ihren älteren Beständen . . .' (Lübeck, 1931); also J.M.W. (1949-50), p. 311. Chief Librarian: Dr. P. Karstedt.

b. Landesbibliothek Schleswig-Holstein. This institution was severely damaged during the second world war, and most of its stocks were lost. See J.M.W. (1949-50), p. 312. Librarian: Dr. W. Stahl.

LÜNEBURG. Ratsbücherei. The music section of this Town Library still possesses many important works, despite severe war damage. The present stock includes MSS and printed editions from the 16th to the 19th centuries, including a copy of 'Le Paragon des chansons' (1539), Scheidt's 'Tabulatura nuova' (1624), many 17th-century organ tablatures by north German composers; motets and theatrical works. Chief Librarian: Dr. Winter; Librarian in charge of music catalogue: Dr. Welter.

MAIHINGEN. See Schloss Harburg.

MAINZ. The Town Library contains some theoretical works of the 16th to 18th centuries and some part-books of the 15th and 16th centuries. See M.f.M. (1889). Principal Librarian: Dr. A. Ruppel.

MANNHEIM. The Court Theatre Archives were destroyed in the second world war. For former collections see F. Walter, 'Archiv und Bibliothek des Grossherzoglichen Hof- und Nationaltheaters in Mannheim, 1779-1839', 2 vols. (Leipzig, 1899).

MARBURG O/LAHN. a. Westdeutsche Bibliothek. This Library, formerly the Hessische Bibliothek, has now in its possession about 170,000 vols. of the former Prussian State Library music collection. These include part of the earlier MSS and many autographs from Bach to Busoni. No detailed catalogue has yet been made, so it is impossible to tell exactly which part of the Berlin library is there, but according to J.M.W. (1949-50), p. 312, much of the copyright section is also at Marburg, and the modern music section is particularly large. Unfortunately the gaps are apparently serious, and the very works most wanted are often not to be found. The collected editions, 'Denkmäler' series, etc., are in Berlin. Provisional arrangements for the use of the books are in operation. (See also Berlin, a). Director: Dr. Cremer. See M. Cremer, 'Zweiter Weltkongress der Musikbibliotheken, 1950' (Cassel, 1951).

b. The University Library and Music School. These two collections have, between them, a large working library of music, but nothing particularly rare or valuable. Di-

c. Musiksammlung der Landesbibliothek Cassel. According to J.M.W. (1949-50), p. 312, this collection was then at Marburg o/Lahn.

MEININGEN. Thüringische Landesbücherei. The contents of this Library are understood to have been removed to the Soviet Zone in 1946 and their whereabouts are now unknown. Formerly known as the Herzogliche Öffentliche Bibliothek; for former collection see Z.f.M. (1916).

MÜNICH. a. Stadtische Musikbibliothek. Founded in 1905 and containing some 90,000 volumes, this is primarily a general lending library of music and music literature, but it also possesses a valuable folksong collection and a number of autographs by composers specially connected with Munich or Bavaria, for example R. Strauss and M. Reger. Librarian: Dr. R. Ott.

b. University Library. This was severely damaged during the second world war, and many early works were lost. The MS collection of compositions by Obrecht, Josquin, Senfl and others in the autograph of Glareanus, written at Basel in 1527, was saved. Director: Dr. W. Plöbst.

c. Staatsbibliothek. The musical collections of this Library are among the most important on the Continent. There are MSS of Lassus, Dufay and Binchois, while the printed books section is rich in early works from the presses of Italy and Germany, and in first editions of the works of the classical and romantic composers. See J. J. Maier, 'Die musikalischen Handschriften der Kgl. Hof- und Staatsbibliothek in München' (Munich, 1879); also Z.f.M. (Nov. 1927). General Director: Dr. G. Hoffmann; Chief of music collection: Dr. H. Halm.

d. Frauenkirche. Nothing is known of the present condition of the former collection of 17th-century music and MS choirbooks, c. 1600, containing masses, etc., by Lassus, Reiner, Croce, J. C. Kerl, etc. [4.]

e. Staatstheater. Library of theatre music, librettos, etc., chiefly dating from early 19th century. See J.M.W. (1949-50), p. 313.

MÜNSTER. The University Library. The famous Santini collection is at last back again in this Library, after many perilous removals during the second world war; unfortunately the catalogues were burnt. It consists of 4461 MSS and 1228 printed works. For literature see F. Santini, 'Catalogo della musica esistente presso F. Santini in Roma' (Rome, 1820); V. (Ratisbon, 1931). Director: Dr. H. Fansen.

b. Städtische Musikbibliothek des Orchesters der Provinzialhauptstadt und der Westfälischen Musikschule. Practical working library. See J.M.W. (1949-50), p. 313.

NÜREMBERG. a. Germanisches Nationalmuseum. This building houses some important liturgies, including missals and antiphoners of the 12th and 13th centuries, and some rare hymnals of the 16th century. There are also examples of the chief Nuremberg music presses; some valuable books on tablature and the autograph score of Wagner's 'Meistersinger'. Departmental Director: Dr. L. Rothenfelder.

b. Stadtbibliothek. Theoretical works, some music printed at Nuremberg between 1500 and 1700, and a collection of theatre programmes from 1751 to date form part of the general collection. Librarian: Dr. F. Beck.

PIRNA. [SZ.] Stadtkirche. Collection transferred to Dresden. For details of former collection see Grove [4].

POMMERSFELDEN near ANSBACH. The Library of Count Schönborn is said to be very rich in musical works. See J.M.W. (1949-50), p. 314.

QUEDLINBURG. See T. Echardiues, 'Codices manuscripti Quedlinburgenses' (Quedlinburg, 1723).

RATISBON. a. Staatliche Bibliothek. Founded in 1819 from the 15th-century Stadtbibliothek, the Monastery and Episcopal Libraries, this district Library took its present name in 1937. In 1876 the MSS were transferred to the Munich Staatsbibliothek and a catalogue of the remaining vols. is available at the Library. See K. Wermann, 'Die Proskesche Musikbibliothek' in 'Kirchenmusikalisches Jahrbuch' (1911); T. Trenkle, 'Die Kreisbibliothek in Regensburg' in 'Beiträge zur bayerischen Kirchengeschichte', Bk. xxxii (Erlangen, 1925); B. Stäblein, 'Die Choralhandschriften der Regensburger Bibliothek' in 'Cäcilienvereinsorgan', Vol. LXIII (Ratisbon, 1932).

b. Court Library of Prince Thurn and Taxis. The music section has about 2000 items, chiefly in MSS, consisting of the music of the prince's court in the second half of the 18th century. There are also some liturgical and other music MSS dating from the middle ages, as well as some early printed music, mostly from the Benedictine Monastery of Neresheim. See S. Färber, 'Verzeichnis der vollständigen Opern, Melodramen und Ballette, wie auch der Operntextbücher der fürstlichen Thurn und Taxis Hofbibliothek' (Ratisbon, 1936). Librarian: Dr. G. Stal.

c. Bibliothek des Instituts für Musikforschung. No definite details known, but see J.M.W. (1949-50), p. 314.

ROSTOCK. University Library. It is not known if this collection of 16th-century MSS and printed works of the 16th-18th centuries has survived. The Rostock 'Liederbuch' was published in 1927 by F. Ranke and J. Müller-Blattau. [4 & S.]

SCHLOBITTEN CASTLE, EAST PRUSSIA. The private Library of Prince Alexander zu Schlobitten. This very valuable collection was practically unknown to scholars. It was brought to the notice of the late Dr. E. H. Fellowes by Dr. O. Mies of Kiel, in 1937; an extract from the catalogue gave the titles of nearly 70 rare music books published in the late 16th century, including several English works. It was fortunate that Fellowes was able to obtain all the information he wanted about these, as the castle and its entire contents were destroyed by fire during the second world war, although the British ambassador to Moscow had secured the interest of the Russian military authorities to protect the treasures if possible.

SCHLOSS HARBURG. The private Library of Prince Oettingen-Wallerstein. This collection was moved from Maihingen in 1947, and is now known as the Fürstliche Bibliothek und Kunstsammlung. There have been no special additions to the Library since 1938, except for the acquisition of a first edition of a Handel cantata. The Library contains much MS music, chiefly by composers of the late 18th century, including 390 symphonies, 214 cantatas and oratorios, 114 masses and 11 works for strings, with 120 books on theory, including some 16th-century works. Librarian: Count Gustav Wedel.

SCHWARZENBURG, SAXONY. [SZ.] The church contained some German vocal music of the 17th century. [4.]

SCHWERIN. Mecklenburgische Landesbibliothek. This large collection is of great importance to the student of 18th-century music and is well known by virtue of its handsome catalogue volumes, with their lavish quotation of themes. See O. Kade, 'Die Musiksammlung des grossherzoglich Mecklenburg-Schweriner Fürstenhauses aus den letzten zwei Jahrhunderten', 2 vols. (Schwerin, 1893); O. Kade and C. Meyer, 'Die Musikalien-Sammlung des grossherzoggl. Mecklenburg-Schweriner...', etc., Vol. III; also C. Meyer, 'Geschichte der Schweriner Hofkapelle' (Schwerin, 1913); 'Mecklenburgische Monatshefte' (Nov. 1938) and in MS in the Library, C. Meyer, 'Geschichte des Mecklenburgischen Staatsorchesters'.

SONDERSHAUSEN. Thüringische Landesbibliothek. In 1913 the Libraries of Sondershausen were united, being housed in the castle from 1924 onwards. The most important part of the collection is that formerly in the Schlosskirche, which consists of MS music, mostly cantatas, of the early 18th century.

SORAU. Hauptkirche. The Library was destroyed during the second world war. For particulars of the former contents see M.f.M. (Suppl., 1902).

STUTTGART. Württembergische Landesbibliothek. There are about 2500 MSS and 7500 vols. of printed music in this Library; the only losses suffered during the war were of books published between 1930 and 1944. Among the MSS are some 500 scores of operas, etc., of the 18th century, including 13 by Jommelli; a catalogue of 900 of the MSS was prepared by A. Eisenmann in 1926; for the earlier MSS see A. Halm, 'Katalog über die Musik-Codices des 16. und 17. Jahrhunderts auf der K. Landesbibliothek in Stuttgart' in M.f.M. (Suppl., 1902) and H. Marquardt, 'Die Stuttgarter Chorbücher...' (Tübingen, 1936). Director: Dr. W. Hoffman.

THORN, PRUSSIA. [SZ.] Gymnasialbibliothek. It is not known what has happened to the collection mentioned in the School Programme for 1871.

TORGAU. Johann-Walter Cantorei. The Library contains choral music of the 18th and 19th centuries. Librarian: Cantor Mohring.

TÜBINGEN. a. The University Library has a good collection of printed works, which has remained intact. Recently 7 pp. of a very early printed Gradual were found. There is also said to be a number of MSS of the former Prussian State Library stored in this Library. Director: Dr. W. Standacher. See M. Cremer, 'Zweiter Weltkongress der Musikbibliotheken, 1950' (Cassel, 1951).

b. The Music School also possesses a good general collection of music.

c. J.M.W. (1949-50), p. 315, mentions also a Musikbibliothek des evang.-theol. Stifts, which specializes in church music.

ULM. Stadtbibliothek. This Library contains about 142 vols. of printed music, chiefly vocal works dating from the end of the 16th and early 17th centuries. Librarian: Dr. Huber.

WEIMAR. a. Landesbibliothek. The collection of the Duchess Anna Amalia, made during her visit to Italy with Goethe, includes interesting operas of the Neapolitan school. There are also a valuable 14th-century MS of Mastersinger compositions, the score of Haydn's 'La vera costanza', the autographs of part of Gluck's 'Orfeo' and of a Mozart pianoforte Concerto in B \flat major. Director: B. Kärische.

b. The Liszt Museum contains a collection of Liszt's autographs, a score of Wagner's 'Lohengrin' and the autograph of Cornelius's 'The Barber of Baghdad'. Keeper: Dr. Wahl.

WERNIGERODE. [SZ.] Nothing is known of the present situation of the very extensive library of Count Stolberg, which contained c. 130,000 vols., including 5000 hymnals, and the world-famous 'Locheimer Liederbuch', published in a wonderful facsimile by Röder in 1925. See E. W. Förstemann, 'Die Gräfl. Stolbergsche Bibliothek zu Wernigerode' (Nordhausen, 1866), also M.f.M. (1872). [4.]

WIESBADEN. Nassauische Landesbibliothek. Besides some MSS there is also a unique vol. of masses by Senfl and Josquin, privately printed between 1557 and 1560 by Anton von Ysenberg, Graf zu Büdingen, at his castle Ronnenburg near Gehrhausen. See M.f.M. (1888) and G. Zedler, 'Die Handschriften der Nassauische Landesbibliothek zu Wiesbaden' (Leipzig, 1931). Director: Dr. F. Götting.

WOLFENBÜTTEL. Herzog-August-Bibliothek. The MSS, which include a 14th-century collection of motets, have been catalogued. See O. von Heinemann, 'Die Handschriften der Herzoglichen Bibliothek zu Wolfenbüttel', 4 vols. (Wolfenbüttel, 1884-?).

WÜRZBURG. a. The University Library. This contains some liturgical MSS of the 12th to 14th centuries, besides theoretical works (from 1497) and some early operas of the 17th century. Director: J. S. Keeler.

b. Bayerisches Staatskonservatorium der Musik. The Library was destroyed during the second world war and all the MSS were lost.

c. Episcopal Seminary. This too was destroyed.

d. Stadtarchiv. The autograph score of E. T. A. Hoffmann's 'Aurora', sometimes regarded as the first German romantic opera, is still in the city archives.

ZITTAU. [SZ.] Stadtbibliothek. Said to have been destroyed.

ZWICKAU. a. Ratsschulbibliothek, incorporated in the Stadtbibliothek, contained 20,000 vols., including 200 music MSS. See R. Vollhardt, 'Bibliographie der Musikwerke in der Ratsschulbibliothek' (Leipzig, 1896); also M.f.M. (Suppl., 1893-96). [4.]

b. Robert Schumann Museum. Founded by the people of his birthplace in 1910 as a memorial to Schumann, the museum has reached its present status by the work of the first Keeper, M. Kreisig (1856-1940), who, with the skill of the practised collector, gathered together almost all the museum's treasures, which comprise some 12,000 exhibits of autograph MSS, letters, sketches, books, pictures, newspaper cuttings, etc., covering the life of Schumann and his family. A rich collection of books on the romantic period generally makes the Library of great importance to students of 19th-century music. Keeper: Dr. G. Eismann.

GREAT BRITAIN

ABERDEEN. The University Library contains about 3000 musical works, mostly acquired by the copyright privileges possessed by the University in the early part of the 19th century. In 1910 the Library acquired the extensive collection of psalm books of W. L. Taylor. A catalogue of this collection was issued in 1921. Librarian: W. D. Simpson.

ABERYSTWYTH. The National Library of Wales, which is one of the "copyright libraries", contains a good and rapidly increasing collection of general musical literature, but is at present chiefly noteworthy for its collection of music by Welsh composers. Among the rarities is a volume of lute pieces by F. Pilkington.

BASINGSTOKE. The Earl of Malmesbury possesses an interesting Handel collection.

BATH. Municipal Library. Contains a small but interesting collection of music by composers connected with the west country, such as Chilcott, Linley, etc. Librarian: R. W. Wright.

BIRMINGHAM. a. The University Library possesses a large and carefully chosen collection of music and books on music, in which Elgar, who was the first Professor of Music in the University, is well represented. There are a few MSS, including some compositions by Boyce, and the autograph score of Bantock's 'Hebridean Symphony'. Two important 17th-century MSS were added in 1952; these contain songs, odes and anthems with string accompaniments by Purcell, Blow, Cooke, etc. Professor of Music: Anthony Lewis.

b. Public Library. This also contains an excellent and extensive general collection.

BOURNEMOUTH. Public Library. The collection of orchestral scores and other music formed by John B. M. Camm, was presented by him to the Borough in 1912. The collection is housed in a large room specially designed as a music library. Consisting originally of about 4000 volumes, it now numbers nearly 7000 and is continually being added to. Librarian: D. S. Young.

CAMBRIDGE. The music collections are of considerable range and interest. For good general accounts see J. Vlasto in M. Rev., Vol. XII, No. 1 (Feb. 1951) and V. Duckles in 'Notes' (July 1952).

a. Caius College. The Library of Gonville and Caius College is famous among musical historians for its large MS. volume dating from the early 16th century and containing masses and motets for 5 and 6 voices by Fayrfax, Ludford, Cornysh, Turgis, Prentes and Pasche. There are also several autographs by Charles Wood, Professor of Music in the University in 1924-26. Librarian: P. Grierson.

b. Clare College. The Library contains the original MSS of C. Sharp's folksong collections; in the college chapel is a small but interesting collection of old English organ music, chiefly of the 18th century, all that survives of the collection of the Rev. Dr. T. H. Coles. Librarian: Dr. A. B. Pippard.

c. Corpus Christi College. The Library contains the unique MS of Walter de Odington's 'De speculatione musicis' and a 10th-century MS containing two treatises by Hucbald and the 'Enchiridion' of Odo of Cluny, also the famous 'Winchester Troper'. See catalogue of the MSS in the Library, by Dr. M. R. James (1912). Librarian: J. P. T. Bury.

d. Fitzwilliam Museum. Founded in 1816 by the will of Richard, 7th Viscount Fitzwilliam of Merrion, who bequeathed his collections of works of art, including autograph, MS and printed music to the University of Cambridge. The principal works are the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book, the 15 volumes of autograph music by Handel and autographs of Purcell, Paradisi and Haydn (Symphony No. 89). The MSS also include operas, cantatas, madrigals, songs and religious music by English, French and Italian composers of the 16th-18th centuries and some instrumental music of the 18th century. The printed music includes opera scores by Lully, Rameau, etc., the rare motets of Lalande and scarce harpsichord music of the 17th-18th centuries.

In recent years the Museum has been enriched by a number of important accessions. Thanks to the generosity of various donors it now possesses autograph MSS of J. S. Bach (the cantatas 'Mache dich, mein Geist, bereit' and 'War Gott nicht' and the chorale prelude 'Allein Gott in der Höh'); by Beethoven (musical sketches and letters), Bertoni (Symphony in D), Bliss ('Madame Noy'), Blow (anthems), Brahms (songs, etc.), F. Bridge, J. Bull (vol. of compositions), Busoni (musical parody), Chopin (the song 'Spring' and a letter), P. Hayes (church compositions), Macfarren (large number of compositions in full score), Moscheles ('Sonate symphonique'), Mozart (K. 166^b, K. 271^c, K. 416^f, K. 497, K. 521, K. 562^e, and some exercises in harmony), O. Nicolai (overture to an opera), Purcell (vol. of transcripts of other composers), A. Scarlatti (opera and cantatas), Schubert (4 songs, and some fragments), Schumann (a letter), R. J. S. Stevens (complete set of his works in rough draught and fair copy), Wagner and Weber (letters), S. Wesley ('O sing unto the Lord', also preludes and ballet music), and the splendid set of 67 vols. of J. C. Smith's MS copies of Handel's works. There have also been numerous additions of MS copies and printed editions of other works, some very rare. See J. A. Fuller Maitland and A. H. Mann, 'Catalogue of the Music in the Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge' (London, 1893). A revised catalogue incorporating later additions is in preparation. The music library of Richard Pendlebury which was formerly part of the Museum collection was transferred in the academic year 1925-26, with other modern works, to the Music School of the University. Director of the Fitzwilliam Museum: Carl Winter; Librarian: Miss Phyllis Giles; Hon. Keeper of the Music: P. F. Radcliffe.

e. King's College. Rowe Music Library. This fine collection, named after L. T. Rowe, whose collection was acquired in 1928 and forms the nucleus of the present Library, is not only a general working library for members of the college, but is also becoming increasingly well known as a repository of rare and valuable original editions, with a few very interesting MSS. Part of the collection of the late Dr. A. H. Mann is also incorporated in this Library. See J. Vlasto in M. Rev., Vol. XII, No. 1 (Feb. 1951). Librarian: (Mrs.) J. Vlasto.

f. Magdalene College. The Pepysian Library contains a few early works on music by Butler, Holder, Morelli, Victorini, Wallis and Alstedius; valuable MS collections of vocal music of the time of Edward IV, Henry VII and Henry VIII (English, French, Scottish and Latin psalters) compositions by Blome, de Bacilly, Kircher, Mersenne, Morley, Salmon, Dering, Merbecke, Coperario, Lawes, King, Purcell and Finger; ballads, songs and other compositions adjusted to the compass of Pepys's voice, and solos, duets and trios for stringed instruments. A MS of special importance is the 'Remède d'amour' by G. de Marchant, containing musical settings of several of the lyrics. A catalogue is in preparation. Librarian: R. W. Ladbrough.

g. Pembroke College. The Library contains a small but interesting music collection, including some 18th-century chamber music, and some medieval part-music.

h. Peterhouse. In the College Library is a valuable collection of MS anthems, services, masses, motets, etc., both Latin and English, in separate part-books. The anthems and services are of the early 17th century and were probably collected when Dr. Cosin was Master (1634-70). They are in various handwritings and contain some autograph compositions by Cambridge organists of the period. The masses and motets (in four part-books) date from the early part of the 16th century and contain many rare and valuable compositions of the time of Henry VII and Henry VIII, including four masses by Fayrfax, a 'Stabat Mater' by Hunt, three masses by Ludford and eleven compositions by Taverner. The collection contains works by upwards of 80 different composers, as well as a variety of anonymous compositions. There is a catalogue by the Rev. Dr. Jebb, in 'Ecclesiologist', Vol. XX (1859), but this has been found to be at times incomplete and at times inaccurate. See also R. C. Hope in 'Antiquarian Magazine and Bibliographer', Vol. III (1883). Dom Anselm Hughes has compiled a new catalogue, now (1954) in the press. Librarian: The Rev. J. N. Sanders.

i. Trinity College. The Library contains a small collection of musical works and treatises, including Wilson's 'Psalterium Carolinum' (1657) and his 'Cheerful Ayres' (1660); Locke's 'Present Practice of Music Vindicated' (1673); Carr's 'Vinculum Societatis' (1687); four vols. of Zarlino's works (1589); and early editions of works by Byrd, Watson, Morley, Playford, Simpson, Bannister, Wilson, Gamble, Lawes, Mace, etc. Among the MSS the most valuable is a 15th-century roll of English carols, etc., which was published by J. A. Fuller-Maitland and W. S. Rockstro (London, 1891). Other MSS of interest are the collection of lute music (in tablature) by R. Taylor, R. Johnson, D. Bacher and T. Greaves; a vol. of 'Ayres to be sung to ye lute and base vyole' by G. Handford (1609), the medius of some anthems by G. Loosemore (1664), and two 15th-century Greek MSS, with music. The Library also possesses the autograph scores of H. Parry's 'Blest Pair of Syrens' and compositions by T. A. Walmisley and Alan Gray, and arrangements made by E. Fitzgerald, and of Stanford's treatise on 'Musical Composition'. See M. R. James, 'Catalogue of Western Manuscripts in the Library of Trinity College, Cambridge' (1901-4). Librarian: H. M. Adams.

k. The Union Society. This club possesses a good library, with a special music section of c. 4000 vols., including the Erskine Allan collection. It was unfortunately damaged during an air raid in 1942, about 100 vols. being lost.

l. The University Library. This Library contains a large collection of MS and printed music, the latter being continually augmented by works received under the privileges granted to the University under the Copyright Act, and to a lesser degree by donations, bequests and purchases. The MSS include some liturgical works of the 13th, 14th and 15th centuries, among them the Ely Pontifical, a Sarum Missal, Antiphoner and Hymnary, and a Springfield Antiphoner. The 15th-century MSS include English and French songs; the famous mass 'O quam suavis', etc. There is a remarkable collection of 16th-century lute and lyra-viol tablatures, in which F. Cutting, J. Dowland, A. Ferrabosco, A. Holborne, R. & J. Johnson, Pilkington, Reade and Robinson are all represented, and which for sheer bulk leaves the famous Fitzwilliam Virginal Book far behind. So far from consisting merely of well-known airs and dances, as was previously stated in this Dictionary, these tablature books consist principally of original compositions which have been inexcusably neglected. Later MSS include a Vivaldi oboe or flute Sonata, Installation Odes by Boyce and Walmisley, a large and varied collection of autographs by James Hook (originally in Dr. Mann's library) and Stanford's Symphony No. 7, Op. 124.

The earlier printed music includes rare part-books of works by Morley, Ward, Weekes, Wilbye and Yonge, and a volume formerly belonging to Dr. John Bull, in which three rare printed items are bound together, i.e. Sebastiani (1563), Holborne (1597) and the 'Orchésographie' (1596). In 1944 the extensive collection of 17th- and 18th-century chamber music and contemporary treatises on thorough-bass, previously stated as being at Cardiff, in the possession of F. T. Arnold (d. 1940), were received by the University Library. Among many rarities this collection, now known as the Arnold Bequest, holds an impressive array of early editions and issues of Corelli, Maschitti, Leclair and Senaillé. The theoretical section contains many of the exceedingly rare works quoted in the benefactor's celebrated work on thorough-bass. Apart from the Arnold Bequest the 18th-century music includes a copy of J. S. Bach's 'Clavier-übung' and a number of first editions of Handel, Hook and Arne, including the latter's organ concertos, with the instrumental parts. The later music includes a number of first editions of Beethoven and Brahms, and many of the large collected editions of the great composers, as well as a fine collection of modern English scores.

With the exception of periodicals and certain very rare items, the greater part of the literature of music has been placed in the Music Room of the Library; the MSS can be consulted in the Anderson Room. There are no published catalogues, but there is a card index of music, in the Music Room, and the books are catalogued in the Catalogue Room. University Librarian: H. R. Creswick; Chief Assistant in the Music Room: G. de Fraine.

N.B. The Paul Hirsch Music Library, which found a temporary home in the Cambridge University Library just before and during the second world war, now forms part of the British Museum collection. (See London.)

m. The University Music School, Downing Place. There are three libraries in this building, as follows:

- (i) The Pendlebury Library of Music. This is the departmental library of the Faculty of Music. It was founded in the late 19th century by Richard Pendlebury, M.A., of St. John's College, and was at first housed in the Fitzwilliam Museum, but was transferred to the care of the Faculty of Music in the academic year 1925-26, and since then has been much augmented by gifts and purchases. It is primarily a practical working library for the use of the lecturers and students of the University Music Faculty, and now contains some 10,000 items of music and music literature, with some early editions, and a large number of gramophone records. Professor of Music: Dr. P. A. S. Hadley. Departmental Sub-Librarian: C. L. Cudworth.
- (ii) The Cambridge University Music Society. This very well-known music society possesses a collection of orchestral scores and parts, mostly in 19th-century editions, for the use of its members. Librarian: Dr. M. Lobban.
- (iii) The Cambridge University Musical Club. This Club, which exists for the encouragement of chamber music, possesses a small but extremely useful library of chamber music, etc., with a few books on music.

CANTERBURY. a. The Cathedral Library. This contains a number of vols. of music and works on music, including an incomplete copy of the contratenor cantoris of the rare Barnard's 'Church Music' (1641). Canon-Librarian: The Rev. Canon A. O. Standen; Keeper of the Manuscripts: W. Urry.

b. The Royal School of Church Music: The Colles Library. This was formed from the library of Sir Sydney Nicholson, with gifts from others, and includes the collection of hymnals and psalters left by Lady Mary Trefusis to the C.M.S., and some MSS by Stanford, Harwood, Bairstow, etc. See Mus. T., Jan. 1952.

CARDIFF. a. The Public Library. This institution has collected Welsh music and music by Welsh composers for many years. There is also a general collection of over 6000 vols., including c. 600 miniature scores, and a few special collections, of which the most interesting are the Aylward collection of English sacred music and organ music and the Bonner Morgan collection of 17th- and 18th-century music, which was originally brought together by Sir Henry Mackworth at Gnull Castle (1766-90) and includes 10 MS vols. of early Italian operas. City Librarian: J. E. Thomas.

b. The Arnold collection is now incorporated in the Cambridge University Library and Pendlebury collections.

CHATSWORTH, DERBYSHIRE. The Library of the Duke of Devonshire, though not very rich in music, contains a few works of interest, the chief rarities being a volume of altus parts printed by Petrucci, comprising the masses of P. de La Rue (Venice, 1503), A. Agricola (Venice, 1504), A. de Fevin (Fossombrone, 1515), J. Mouton's Bk. i (do., 1515) and Josquin's Bk. i (do., 1516); there are also some theoretical works, besides such works as 'The Maske of Flowers' (1613); Coperario's 'Funeral Tears' (1606) and Campian and Coperario's 'Songs of Mourning' (1613), and a number of single part-books of Italian and English madrigals, among which are a bassus part of E. Bonnizoni's 'Primo libro delle canzoni a quattro voci' (Venice, 1569) and a canto part of the 'Lieti amanti' (1586). Librarian: F. W. Thompson.

CHESTER. Cathedral Library; a good collection of modern English church music. [4.]

DUNDEE. The Free Library contains a valuable collection of 421 vols. relating to Scottish music, formed by A. J. Wighton (1802-66), and bequeathed by him to the Library; it contains many very rare books, besides most of the musical works printed in Scotland down to the early 19th century, as well as several scarce English and Irish musical books. Various letters addressed to Wighton by French, German and British composers and music publishers are also preserved in the collection. In the Music Section of the Reference Library there is a comprehensive series of folksongs of all nations; there is also a general Lending Library of music, containing some 1370 scores and about 440 books, to which additions are regularly made. Chief Librarian: J. Duncan Douglas.

DURHAM. Cathedral Chapter Library. This contains a most important collection of rare works by English and foreign composers of the 17th and 18th centuries, unfortunately still uncatalogued.

EDINBURGH. a. University Library. This Library has a small but most interesting collection of music. Among the MSS are the 16th-century Dunkeld music book, containing anthems and the ordinary of the Mass for 5 voices in the Dunkeld use; treble, tenor and bass parts of the Scots Metrical Psalter of T. Wood (1562-?) ; a lute book in tablature, of Sir William Mure of Rowallan and a treble part-book, also his 17th-century MS copies of Scottish and English songs; and some early 18th-century French books. The printed works include a superius of Byrd's 'Psalms, Sonnets and Songs' (East, 2nd ed.); a good collection of English madrigal books by Yonge, Morley, Wilbye, Weelkes, Ward and Tomkins (1588-1624); a smaller collection of Italian madrigal books of the same period; a collection of English song-sheets of the late 17th and early 18th centuries; and a rare volume of 16th-century French masses. The Library also contains the original records of Gaelic song collected in the Highlands by Marjorie Kennedy-Fraser. Hand-written catalogues of both printed and MS music are maintained in the Library. Librarian: Dr. L. W. Sharp.

b. The Reid Music Library. Now the Library of the Faculty of Music in the University, this Library has been formed by bequests and donations, from the Reid Fund, from General Reid, Prof. J. Thomson and M. T. Buder. The last four professors of music (Oakley, Donaldson, Niecks and Tovey) made large additions to the Library, and it is now well supplied with modern full scores, standard editions and theoretical works. There are some interesting MSS, including a 15th-century psalter with neumes; some oratorios by Hasse, an orchestral suite by Telemann and some mid-18th-century Italian sinfonie, etc., in parts. The valuable printed works include Virdung's 'Musica getutscht' (1511); Praetorius's 'Syntagma'; Morley's 'Plaine and Easie Introduction' (1597); Heyden's 'Ars' (1537); Cerone's 'Melopes' (1615) and 5 vols. of the 'Patrocinium musices' (1573-79) of Lassus. The catalogue published in 1941 (see below) does not include the magnificent private collection acquired by the bequest of the late Sir Donald Tovey, the recent additions from the Niecks bequest and the fine collection of Beethoven relics gathered by the late Prof. P. Weiss of Vienna. A card catalogue, intended ultimately to comprise the complete collection of 20,000 vols., is now in active preparation. See H. Gál, 'Catalogue of Manuscripts, Printed Music and Books on Music up to 1850 in the Library of the Music Department of the University of Edinburgh, Reid Library' (Edinburgh, 1941); also J. M. Allan, in 'Library World', Vol. LI (1948). The Library is under the general direction of the Dean and Professor of Music, S. T. M. Newman. Librarian: Jean M. Allan.

c. The Public Library. The Music Department, opened in 1934, possesses over 20,000 items, forming a good general collection. It houses the collection of the late R. A. Marr, consisting of 481 vols., mostly of the 18th century, with a few MSS, including three Antiphoners, a Gradual, a Mass by L. Rossi, and the autograph scores of Costa's 'Eli' and

J. Holbrooke's 'Bronwen'. Among the printed books are three 17th-century editions, Sternhold and Hopkins's 'Psalms', Kircher's 'Musurgia' and Forbes's 'Aberdeen Cantus'. There is also a representative collection of Scottish music. Principal Librarian: E. Butchart.

d. National Library of Scotland (Advocates' Library). This is a "copyright library" and receives copies of all music printed in Great Britain. Its chief musical treasures are the Skene MS and the Scone Antiphonarium (Carver MS) which dates from the early 16th century and contains much sacred music composed by Robert Carver. In 1927 the Glen Collection of works relating to Scottish music, with some MSS, also English country dances, etc., was presented to the National Library by Lady Dorothea Ruggles-Glen. See J. Glen's 'Early Scottish Melodies' (1900). In 1938 the National Library acquired the fine Handel Collection of the Earl of Balfour and in 1952 Mr. Cecil Hopkinson presented his fine Berlioz collection.

e. Library of the Society of Writers to the Signet. This contains some theoretical and historical works on music, with a small collection of Scottish airs. Catalogue with supplements (1871-91). [4.]

ELY. The Cathedral Library has an interesting collection of English church music. See W. E. Dickson, 'A Catalogue of Ancient Choral Services and Anthems preserved among the Manuscript Scores and Partbooks in the Cathedral Church of Ely' (Cambridge, 1861).

ETON. The College Library possesses a very fine and valuable MS vol. of English sacred music of the 16th century. See W. B. Squire in 'Archaeologia', Vol. LVI (London, 1898).

EXETER. The City Library. The Burnett-Morris Index, kept in this Library, is a card-index of all known references, printed and MS, to all public figures who were either Devonians or had connections with Devonshire, including among the musicians Gibbons, Locke, S. S. Wesley, Wale and many others.

GLASGOW. a. The University Library contains several valuable collections; as follows:

- (i) The Euing Collection, comprising over 5000 printed books, apart from MSS, which were bequeathed by W. Euing (1788-1874) to Anderson's University, and in 1936 was transferred to Glasgow University where it is now kept in a separate room. The anonymous catalogue, which was prepared and printed in accordance with Euing's will, is unfortunately altogether inadequate and displays the grossest ignorance. Among the ancient music in this collection the following works merit special reference: seven examples of Gafurio, from 1480 onwards; Burtius (1487); the 'Flores Musice' (1488); a Boethius of 1492; early editions of Byrd's Psalms, etc.; the 'Choralis Constantinus' (1550-57); Faber's 'Melodiae Prudentianae' (1533); 3 vols. of Frescobaldi; N. de La Grotte's 'Chansons' (1575); 47 vols. of Praetorius (1607-18); 9 vols. of G. de Wert (1583-89); and a valuable and extensive collection of English psalters and hymn books, also the 'Gesangbuch' of the Picard brethren referred to in Burney's 'History', III, 31. The MSS include autographs by R. Ramsay (16th-17th century); J. W. Callcott, Webbe and Lord Burghersh, and full scores by Bishop, S. Wesley, Spofforth and M. P. King. There are MS transcripts of works by Palestrina, Pergolesi, M. Asola, S. Mattei, A. Belmonte and J. Knöfel. There is also an early 17th-century lute book in tablature, a 'Scola dal leutino, o sia mandolino alla genovese', also 17th century and a 'Grammar for Thorough Bass' by E. Finch; also papers and a commonplace book by J. S. Smith. See 'Catalogue of the Musical Library of the late Wm. Euing' (Glasgow, 1878); also the select list by A. Hubens, published in R.M.I. (1916).

- (ii) The Stillie Musical Library was collected and bequeathed to the University by Y. L. Stillie, a well-known music critic (d. 1883). It contains 760 vols., including many full scores and operatic works. Many of the books came from the library of G. F. Graham.
- (iii) The Zavertal Collection, which was presented by L. Zavertal in 1930 and includes the Mozart relics described in 'New Mozartiana', by H. G. Farmer & H. Smith (Glasgow, 1935). It also contains autographs of famous composers and the complete works of L., W. H. and J. R. Zavertal.
- (iv) The Drysdale Collection was presented in memory of her brother Learmont Drysdale by Janey C. Drysdale, and contains all his compositions, printed and MS.
- (v) The Scottish Music Collection, originally formed by H. G. Farmer, contains many items not to be found elsewhere, and is especially rich in collections of reels and strathspeys, national songs and rare items of sheet music of the 18th century.
- (vi) The Farmer Collection comprises a unique assembly of printed books, MSS and photostats of MSS on Oriental music, as well as cognate literature. The works of almost every famous Arabic, Persian and Turkish writer on the theory of music from the 9th century are to be found on its shelves.

University Librarian: Dr. W. R. Cunningham.

b. The Mitchell (Public) Library. This Library has several useful collections, besides a special "Music Room", opened in 1930. In all there are some 19,000 vols., about 15,500 being of music and 3500 books on music. The main collections are:

- (i) The Kidson Collection of some 4000 vols., part of the library of the late Frank Kidson of Leeds, which consists mainly of printed music, much of it rare, and contains many valuable bibliographical notes by Kidson, including his MS Index of Aïrs, in 57 vols. (See also Leeds.)
- (ii) The Moody-Manners Collection, which was given by C. Manners and F. Moody, and consists of 2900 vols. of full scores containing directions in the handwriting of famous conductors, as well as that of the impresario himself.
- (iii) The Gardiner Collection of 800 vols., which covers the field of European folk music.
- (iv) The Turnbull and Sheard Collections of c. 5200 vols., which make available the more general type of music book. Among other special items may be mentioned A. Moffat's transcription of Kidson's copy of the tablatures in the 'Straloch Lute Book' (1627-29) and Kidson's own interleaved copy of his 'British Music Publishers' (1900), with his copious notes and additions. City Librarian: R. Bain.

GLOUCESTER. Cathedral Library. This possesses some incomplete choir books containing anthems by Rogers, Tye, Wise, Blackwell, Turner, Pickhaver, Heastridge, Davies, Jefferies, Portman, Parsons, etc., as well as complete services and two anthems by F. Santini; a MS full score of Boyce's 'Blessed is he'; some stray leaves of illuminated MSS and some printed and MS church music of the 17th century. [4.]

GREAT WARLEY, ESSEX. Miss Wilmott's collection was sold in 1926 and 1935.

HEREFORD. Cathedral. a. The Chain Library. This contains a collection of glees, madrigals, pianoforte pieces, etc., formed by Fanny Kemble and others; also two sets of W. Felton's 'Organ Concertos' and a copy of Kircher's 'Musurgia' (1650); also the autograph of Roger North's 'Memoires of Musick' from which Rimbault's edition was prepared. Hon. Librarian: F. C. Morgan.

b. There is another collection of music in the choir school in the cloisters, close to where Felton lies buried. This contains some interesting MS scores of Handel anthems, etc. The 10 vols. of Barnard's 'Church Music' which were formerly there are now in the Library of Christ Church, Oxford.

HINCHINGBROOKE (HUNTS.). The Earl of Sandwich has a small but interesting collection of 18th-century music.

LEEDS. a. The University. The Brotherton Library of Music contains a good working collection and a few theoretical works, including Gafurio's 'Practica Musica' (1497) and Kircher's 'Musurgia' (1650). The MSS include a collection of 70 letters from Mendelssohn to Moscheles, c. 1824-27.

b. Central Public Library. This Library has recently been extended to include the collections of the Reference and Lending Libraries, and all sections have been considerably expanded during the last few years. Apart from many collected editions, the Library possesses a large part of the Taphouse Collections and a considerable proportion of the collection of the late Frank Kidson (see also Glasgow). City Librarian: F. G. B. Hutchings.

LICHFIELD. The Cathedral Library there is said to house nearly 200 vols. of printed and MS music, including MS anthems by Croft, Blow, Purcell, etc., and a large collection of part-books; also 7 printed parts of Barnard's rare 'Church Music' of 1641. [4.]

LINCOLN. Cathedral. In the Chapter Library are a few old MSS, also printed editions of Byrd's 'Sacred Songs, Psalms and Sonnets' in 5 vols. (1588) and 3 books of Dowland's 'Songs and Ayres' (1600, 1613, and 1642). See R. W. Woolley, 'Catalogue of the Manuscripts of Lincoln Cathedral Chapter Library' (London, 1927). Librarian: Canon W. H. Kynaston.

LIVERPOOL. Central Public Library. Practically the whole of the collection was destroyed during the second world war, but replacement has taken place on such a scale that there is now a very good general collection of 11,000 vols., in addition to much sheet-music. A complete catalogue was published in 1933, and various up-to-date hand-lists are in preparation. City Librarian: J. F. Smith.

LONDON. a. The British Museum. The collections of printed and MS music and musical literature now brought together at the British Museum make it one of the most important sources of musical material of the whole world, for it houses not only (i) its own magnificent collections, which alone would make it one of the richest of all music libraries, but also the following loan collections:

- (ii) The Royal Music.
- (iii) The Manuscript Collections of the Royal College of Music.
- (iv) Part of the Royal Philharmonic Society's Library.

(i) The foundation of the B.M. collection itself comprised the music of the Cotton, Sloane and Harley libraries, and the old Royal Library, presented by George II; to this were added a number of treatises presented in 1778

by Sir John Hawkins; the books on music from the library of his rival Charles Burney were purchased in 1814; the Dragonetti collection of operas, etc., was bequeathed in 1846. In 1863 came a notable purchase of duplicates from the Berlin Library, consisting mainly of old German and Italian madrigals and church music, then valued at c. £1000. A large number of printed works from the Phalèse presses was acquired in 1886 from Mr. Cockx of Antwerp. At the dispersal of the Borghese Library in 1892 the B.M. was one of the principal purchasers, and at the second Heredia sale in 1892 the B.M. acquired several very rare Spanish treatises and musical works. Large additions to both MSS and printed music have been made in more recent years; in 1928 the Department of Manuscripts acquired through the generosity of Mr. E. Perry Warren the fine collection of MSS brought together by E. Perabo of Boston, which includes autographs by Mozart, Schubert, etc., and in 1934 the papers of the late F. G. Edwards (former editor of 'The Musical Times') were acquired; these include Mendelssohn autographs and Elgar correspondence. In 1936 purchase was made of many first editions of the Viennese classics from the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde of Vienna, and in 1944 much printed vocal and chamber music from the sale of the Moffat collection; in 1945 came a donation of c. 500 pieces of Italian music from Lord Vernon; in 1946 a few purchases were made of rare items from the Hill Library sale, while 1946 also brought the splendid complete Hirsch Collection to the B.M. from its temporary home in Cambridge. In 1946 also came the donation of a complete set of the Musikaliska Konstforeningen (1860 to date) from the Royal Musical Academy of Stockholm. In 1948 a large donation of modern vocal and instrumental Czech and Yugoslav music came from the Yugoslav embassy; in 1949 18 rare items (totalling over £1000 in value) from the sale of the Landau collection, and in 1950, from Church House, Westminster, a donation of 10,000 English psalm and hymnbooks, including the Julian and A. H. Mann collections, of which about 3,000 contained music. Important MS acquisitions of recent years have been the Chapel Royal and Tregian MSS and a valuable collection of musical autographs bequeathed by E. H. W. Meyerstein.

(i, a) Manuscript Music. The manuscript collection of the British Museum itself is extremely fine, amounting to over 3000 vols., including ancient service books and treatises, but excluding oriental works. The following are among the more noteworthy items: a large vol. of autograph music by Purcell; the Mulliner Book of 16th-century music; services and anthems of the Church of England, down to Queen Anne's reign, collected by Tudway, c. 1715-20; an autograph of Pt. ii of Bach's 'Wohltemperirtes Clavier'; some volumes of autographs by Handel; 37 vols. of transcripts of Handel's works, mainly in the hand of J. C. Smith, formerly in the possession of B. Granville of Calwich Abbey; the original MSS of the last ten string quartets by Mozart; several vols. of rough drafts by Beethoven; 11 vols. of extracts by Burney made for his 'History'; 28 vols. of Italian and English motets, masses, madrigals, etc., copied by H. Needler from Oxford libraries and bequeathed in 1782; J. Barnard's 'Church Music', Bk. i, scored from the part-books by J. Bishop of Cheltenham; many interesting collections of Italian and early English songs of the 16th and 17th centuries; autographs by Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Weber, Wagner, Liszt, Brahms, Gounod, Chopin, Grieg, Dvořák, etc.; J. W. Callcott's 'Collections for a Dictionary of Music'; works by R. L. Pearsall; 39 operas by Bishop, in autograph score; 40 vols. of Balfe's scores; a large collection of Dibdin's music, including songs, operas and overtures. There are many operas in contemporary full scores, by Hasse, Piccinni, Paisiello, Meyerbeer, Donizetti, etc., and much Italian church music of the 18th century. Many British composers are represented, including Elgar, by sketches of many of his works and Holst by his unpublished compositions. Other acquisitions of great interest include a collection of Italian frottolo and, more recent, the Chapel Royal MS, Egerton 3307 (see M.Q., Vols. XXXII-XXXIII) and the Tregian MS of madrigals and fancies for strings (see M. & L., July 1951). For catalogues see A. Hughes-Hughes, 'A Catalogue of Manuscript Music in the British Museum', 3 vols. (London, 1906-9), also the 'Catalogue of Additions to the Manuscripts in the British Museum' (London, 1854-60). See entries under 'Music' in index at end of each vol. of this 'Catalogue of Additions'.

(i, b) Printed Music. The Music Room of the British Museum is undoubtedly the richest in Great Britain in rare editions of every kind, so much so that it would be quite impossible to attempt to mention separate items in this short article; instead the reader is referred to Barclay Squire's famous catalogue, to its supplements and to the catalogues of the Hirsch collection for more detailed information. In spite of this wealth of early printed books and music, however, the great bulk of the B.M. printed music consists of music deposited at the Museum from about 1790 onwards in accordance with the provisions of the Copyright Acts. For part of the 19th century this source also provided many valuable French and German first editions. The disposal of this enormous body of material (over 905,000 items in all) has been greatly facilitated by a system whereby the great mass of secondary music (amounting in 1953 to c. 245,000 pieces, accumulated since the 1880s) which the Museum receives and is required to preserve, is not catalogued, bound and placed in the ordinary way, but is simply arranged in parcels alphabetically grouped in ten-year series. Any vocal work of this character can be readily found from a slip index of titles, and the cost is only a fraction of what full cataloguing would entail. The secondary instrumental music is not indexed. All the first-class material is entered in the general catalogue. Until 1884 the general catalogue of all printed music at the B.M. was transcribed by the old system of carbonic copying; since then entries for all accessions have been printed and issued in separate vols., the separate titles from these being cut into single slips and incorporated in the working copies of the catalogue, which thus consists partly of the old carbonic slips and partly of the newer printed ones. In 1951 the working catalogue consisted of some 430 folio vols. There is also a Catalogue of National Music which contains all those entries from the accession parts that are of a specific national character, arranged chronologically by countries, not only of Europe but of the whole world. Published Catalogues: (i) The accessions of modern music, from 1884 to date. (ii) W. Barclay Squire, 'Catalogue of Printed Music, published between 1487 and 1800 now in the British Museum', 2 vols. and 1st suppl. (London, 1912); 2nd suppl. (1940); 3rd suppl. in preparation. For the Hirsch Library see K. Meyer & P. Hirsch, 'Katalog der Bibliothek Paul Hirsch', 4 vols. (Vol. I, Berlin, 1928; Vol. II, Berlin, 1930; Vol. III, Frankfurt, 1936; Vol. IV, Cambridge, 1947), also A. Hyatt King & C. Humphries, 'Catalogue of Printed Music in the British Museum: Accessions, pt. 53 — Music in the Hirsch Library' (London, 1951). This contains a great many entries not included in the Hirsch catalogue itself.

(ii) The Royal Music Library. This splendid collection, which is actually the private property of Her Majesty the Queen, has since 1911 been deposited on permanent loan in the British Museum. Since 1922 it has been housed in a special room. It consists principally of the collection formerly at Buckingham Palace, to which has been added some of the music from Windsor Castle. In the main the Library was formed by George III, but it was largely increased by George IV, whose music, formerly at Carlton House, is included; important additions of printed music were also made by Queen Victoria and the Prince Consort. The Royal Library is chiefly renowned for its priceless Handel MSS, but the collection is also remarkable for its many fine bindings, as well as many rare printed and MS works. Among the chief treasures are an autograph vol. of H. Purcell; a 16th-century MS written by J. Baldwyn of Windsor; the Virginal Books of B. Cosyn and W. Forster¹; a curious vol. of puzzle canons by J. Bull and E. Bevin; a MS vol. of Aires and Phantasies by Coperario; copies of Mendelssohn's 'Oedipus at Colonus' and 'Athalie', both signed by the composer; a valuable and extensive collection of Steffani's music; operas by Lully, Mozart, J. C. Bach, Graun, etc.; twelve autograph symphonies by A. Scarlatti; the compositions of George V, King of Hanover. The printed editions are too numerous to be detailed, but include a fine copy of Monteverdi's 'Orfeo', besides 'Parthenia' and many rare German works such as the Partitas of J. N. Tischer, etc., brought from Germany for Queen Charlotte, wife of King George III: also a rare collection of madrigals, formerly in the possession of Sir J. Hawkins. See W. Barclay Squire & H. Andrews, 'Catalogue of the King's Music Library', 3 vols. (London, 1927-29). The royal music may be consulted without formality, but permission to copy or publish must be obtained from the Queen's Librarian, Sir Owen Morshead, through the Hon. Curator of the Royal Music Library, C. B. Oldman.

(iii) The Royal College of Music MS Collection is at present (1954) on loan in the British Museum. For a full account of it, see Grove [4], IV, 170. It is a very fine collection indeed, with MSS of all periods well represented; there is a rather difficult typescript catalogue, compiled by W. Barclay Squire, which can be consulted in the British Museum Students' Room.

(iv) The Royal Philharmonic Society's Library, which dates from its foundation in 1813, is also deposited on loan in the British Museum, with the exception of the practical library of orchestral parts, which is to be found at the Royal Academy of Music. The portion housed at the B.M. contains many works of unique interest, including compositions by Haydn, Beethoven, Cherubini, Mendelssohn, Clementi, Spohr, etc., many of them commissioned by the Society and most of them autographs.

Director of the British Museum and Principal Librarian: Sir T. D. Kendrick. Keeper of Manuscripts: A. J. Collins. Hon. Curator of the Royal Music Library: C. B. Oldman. Assistant Keeper in charge of the Collections of Printed Music: A. Hyatt King.

See A. Hyatt King, 'The Music Room of the British Museum, 1753-1953: its History and Organization' (Proc. Roy. Mus. Ass., 1952-53).

b. Victoria and Albert Museum. The Science and Art Libraries contain useful collections of works on music and musical instruments, besides some printed editions of German operas of small value, and the autographs of Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer' and Bishop's 'Legends of the Rhine'. The musical works collected by John Ella and formerly in this museum were transferred to the Royal College of Music some years ago. Director: Sir Leigh Ashton.

c. Royal Academy of Music. The Library was formed at the same time as the Academy itself, in 1823, from a number of gifts, including part of the music library of the founder, John Fane, Lord Burghersh, 11th Earl of Westmorland, and ever since then the Library has been continually augmented and enriched by gifts and bequests, until now it has a very representative collection of both music and musical literature. In 1825 King George IV gave Arnold's edition of Handel; in 1865 much of R. J. S. Stevens's library was bequeathed, including both MSS and printed editions; in 1870 the library of the English Bach Society; in 1900 Messrs. Novello & Co. gave many orchestral scores; the Goetz collection; the C. A. Barry collection, with those of A. Prendergast (church music), Kalisch (vocal scores), various collections of chamber music, etc. were all received in 1903 and onwards; large collections of orchestral scores and parts were received from Sir Henry Wood and G. Kimpton. There have been many other generous benefactors who have all enriched the Academy Library from time to time. The MS collection contains upwards of 200 autographs, including many by British composers, such as Purcell, Sullivan ('The Mikado'), etc., and also the Mendelssohn 'Midsummer Night's Dream' music. Transcripts include 18th-century Italian operas and cantatas; a MS full score of Purcell's 'King Arthur'; a large number of glees. There are also many autograph letters, mainly early 19th century. The Printed Music includes many 16th- and 17th-century part-books, as well as first editions of many later works, including some rare 18th-century instrumental music and a large number of Liszt's works. There are also the usual collected editions, which can be consulted, along with the foregoing works, and by duly authorized persons, in the Reference Library, which is open on week-days from 10 A.M. to 5 P.M. during the Academic Year, Sept.-July, Saturdays and special holidays excepted. The Reference Library also includes the Goetz Library and the loan deposits of the Royal Philharmonic Society's library of printed scores, etc. (the MSS of that Society being in the British Museum) and a good collection of periodicals. The Reference Library also contains a large collection of programmes, including a complete set of the Royal Philharmonic Society's concerts from 1813 to date, of the Promenade Concerts to 1927 and many others. The Lending Library comprises more than 50,000 items of music, with c. 1000 vols. of poetry and drama. The Sir Henry Wood Orchestral Library of approx. 3000 scores and 1920 sets of parts, presented by him in 1938 to mark his jubilee as conductor of the Promenade Concerts, is also available to musical societies and conductors; applications to borrow should be addressed to the Secretary, the R.A.M. There is also an extensive working library of choral, orchestral and chamber music for class use. Catalogues: a MS catalogue was prepared by H. Davey (c. 1901); a card catalogue of additions (c. 1901-27) is also in existence. Under the supervision of Dr. W. Wallace, a new comprehensive card catalogue has been in progress from 1939. There is a printed catalogue of the Goetz Library (London, 1903). MS catalogues of the Sir H. Wood and Royal Philharmonic Society's Orchestral Collections are also available. See R.A.M. Prospectus (annual); R.A.M. Magazine, and Club Magazine; also F. Corder, 'A History of the R.A.M.' (London & Oxford, 1922-23); also W. H. Stock, 'Some Papers Read at the Week-End Conference of the London and Home Counties Branch of the Libr. Ass.' (Oct. 1946). Principal: Sir R. S. Thatcher; Sec.: L. Garney Parrott; Clerk to the Library: W. H. Stock.

d. The Royal College of Music. The Library here is one of the richest and most extensive collections in the United Kingdom. Its main sources were the Library of the Sacred Harmonic Society, acquired in 1883; the Library of the Concerts of Ancient Music, presented by Queen Victoria; the collection of Sir George Grove and, in part, those of J. M. Windsor, S. W. Waley, F. Ries, Goring Thomas, E. Dannreuther and L. Benson. Many vols. have been transferred from the Victoria and Albert Museum, and many duplicates from the British Museum. The MS collection, at present (1954) on loan in the British Museum, includes some thousands of items, among them a number of autographs, including examples by Haydn, Mozart, Schubert and many other composers. The present Library of printed music, still retained by the R.C.M., is in three sections: (i) a Reference Library, containing all rare editions, works of historical or critical interest; (ii) a comprehensive collection of complete editions, including the various "Denkmäler" series; (iii) a large working library consisting of practical editions of all kinds, textbooks and general musical literature. The library is not open to the general public, but persons interested in musical scholarship are granted such facilities as can be arranged in term-time on application to the Director. The college also possesses a large collection of some three hundred old instruments; also a series of portraits of musicians in oils, mostly from the collection of A. Hill, and a large number of engravings, busts, etc. The Heron collection of books on the violin and the Sanford Terry Bach collection are deposited in the Oxford University Faculty of Music Library at Oxford. For catalogues see W. Barclay Squire, 'Catalogue of Printed Music in the Library of the Royal College of Music London' (London, 1909); also his typescript catalogue of the MSS, to be seen in the Students' Room at the British Museum. Director: Sir Ernest Bullock; Librarian: Barbara Banner.

e. Trinity College of Music. The Bridge Memorial Reference Library opened in 1924 in commemoration of Sir Frederick Bridge, who was for many years chairman of the Governing Board. It contains, among interesting volumes, old copies in score of works by Piccinni, Sacchini, Gluck, Monsigny, Cimarosa, etc., a fine copy of the first edition of 'Orpheus Britannicus' and two short pieces for pianoforte in the autograph of W. Sterndale Bennett. There is also a comprehensive lending library of music for the use of students. The Benton Fletcher collection of old instruments, chiefly keyboard, is connected with Trinity College, and is at present housed in a house belonging to the National Trust, Fenton House, Hampstead, by an arrangement between Trinity College and the National Trust; visitors are welcomed. Librarian: N. Gristwood.

f. Gresham College. The College possesses a small collection of MS and printed music, mostly of the 18th and early 19th centuries, including the glees formerly belonging to the Conventores Society (1798-1805). The rarest works are 8 masses by H. Fremart (Paris, 1624-45) and MSS by S. Bolio, G. Borghi, C. Burney, T. Carapella, G. B. Casali, Cordicelli, Durante; fantasies by M. Locke, Jenkins and W. Young; masses, etc., by G. Fideli, Galuppi, Paisiello, Pergolesi, and a score of Jommelli's 'Don Trastullo'. There is a catalogue, prepared a few years ago by Wm. C. Smith of the British Museum. Clerk to the Committee: E. Featherstone.

g. The Madrigal Society. This collection is deposited with the R.C.M. collections.

h. The Royal Philharmonic Society. The MS section of this Library is now in the British Museum; the orchestral scores, etc., are in the Royal Academy of Music.

i. Westminster Abbey. The Chapter Library contains a collection of music, chiefly in MS, by Italian and English composers of the 17th and 18th centuries, and a number of madrigals of the late 16th and early 17th centuries. See M.f.M. (Suppl., 1903).

k. Lambeth Palace. The Archiepiscopal Library contains many fine psalters, missals and breviaries, both MS and printed; a good collection of early editions of psalms and hymn-books; MS treatises collected by W. Chelle; a MS vol. of English, French and Italian songs, with lute in tablature), containing songs by C. and E. Coleman, A. Marsh, M. Locke and J. Gulgrum, and an explanation of the tablature; a MS vol. of harpsichord music (dances and airs) by R. Ayleward and others; a copy of Tye's 'Acts of the Apostles'; a MS vol. containing the bass part of services and anthems by 16th-century English composers. See W. H. Frere, 'Bibliotheca Musico-Liturgica', Vol. I, fasc. i (1901); also M. R. James & C. Jenkins, 'A Descriptive Catalogue of the Manuscripts in the Library of Lambeth Palace' (Cambridge, 1930-32). Librarian: The Rev. Dr. C. Jenkins; Assistant Librarian: Dr. Irene Churchill.

l. The Royal Music Library, formerly in Buckingham Palace, etc., is now deposited on permanent loan in the British Museum. N.B.—Permission to copy any of the royal music must be obtained from Her Majesty's Librarian, Sir Owen Morshead, through the Principal Keeper of Printed Books, at the British Museum.

m. The Royal Opera House, Covent Garden. The Library consists of some 250 operas in vocal scores, together with full scores and orchestral parts, chorus parts, etc., for 104 of this total. There are a fair number of rare works, but the majority are standard works still in the present-day operatic programmes. Librarian: R. Temple Savage.

n. Sadler's Wells Theatre. There is a reference library in this theatre of over 1000 operatic scores, vocal, pianoforte and orchestral. Of these about 600 are on permanent loan from Messrs. Novello and Co. Ltd. The rest have been presented by J. B. Gordon (over 400), Rosa Newmarch, Prof. E. J. Dent and others.

o. The Royal College of Organists. The Library here has been formed almost entirely by gifts and includes many rare and interesting works of especial value to those engaged in historical research, as well as collections of church and organ music, orchestral and chamber scores and parts, etc. Some borrowing is permitted. See annual 'Calendar'.

p. The British Broadcasting Corporation.

(i) The B.B.C. Music Library exists to organize the supply of music for broadcasts throughout the whole Corporation. It does not include, to any great extent, the literature of music, nor commercial gramophone records, nor recorded programme disks, these being separately administered by their respective librarians

The Central Library is now housed, after some ten years of war-time dispersal during which severe losses from bombing and fire were sustained, in the same building as the Corporation's Music Department, Yalding House, 152 Great Portland Street, London, W.1. It began with broadcasting in 1922 and now consists of a series of separate sequences, representing, in sum, what is probably the most extensive collection in existence of music for performance.

Reference Library. Most of the Collected Editions are held, together with the outstanding specialist anthologies such as Proske, Commer, Stainer, Maldeghem, Torchi, Expert, 'Denkmäler', etc., many of which latter were added with the purchase of the Fox Strangways library in 1943. The desk-tools of this library include a complete set of the Hofmeister catalogues, virtually all the modern thematic and publishers' catalogues, together with a wide range of music-library catalogues and bibliographies.

Orchestral Libraries. The main stock is of some 25,000 sets of scores and parts supported by duplicate sets as required — many of which are seconded to form local orchestral libraries housed at the various regional stations. A parallel library of orchestral scores, whose main function is to serve the studio managers in their task of balancing the orchestral tone which reaches the listener, also serves as a valuable reference library for miscellaneous internal use. Some 3000 further scores, mainly early or modern, are held, for which the Corporation does not itself hold orchestral parts — these being copied or hired at need. The majority of scores contain valuable information regarding detailed timings, together with conductors' markings (some more embarrassing than valuable).

As large as the main orchestral library is the separate sequence of 30,000 sets of manuscript scores and parts of specially commissioned music incidental to broadcast plays and features. These range from newly composed music, e.g. Walton's for Sackville-West's 'Christopher Columbus' or Britten's for Louis MacNeice's 'Dark Tower', to older music specially edited for integration in such series as 'The Italian Handel' or the various dramatic musics by Purcell. The B.B.C. sectional orchestras (Empire, Theatre, Opera, Midland Light, etc.) have, over the years, developed large libraries of special manuscript arrangements to suit their needs. Similar libraries are held for military and brass bands, the Light Music Unit and the various variety orchestras.

The Libraries of the following have been purchased, in whole or in part: Percy Pitt, Sir Landon Ronald, Sir Adrian Boult, Eldridge Newman, Percy Cross (the Siddell Library, Manchester), A. H. Fox Strangways, F. Bonavia.

Vocal Scores and Partsongs. Some quarter million of these cover the main repertory and a vast amount of specialist material besides. The stocks range from bulk quantities for the large choral bodies to single rare scores. A Choral Reference Library and an Opera Reference Library of master scores, timed and frequently specially cued, reflect the divergence between the needs of conductors, coaches, producers and engineers, and those of soloists and choristers.

Songs. The main song library is of 30,000 items catalogued by composer and title. A similar section of Variety Music Library specializes in collections of vintage music-hall songs, etc., arranged chronologically. Typescripts of Fox Strangways's translations of the complete Schubert, Schumann, Brahms and Strauss Lieder are held for singers' use.

Librettos. The operatic repertory is further served by some 2000 librettos, including a number of scripts specially commissioned for broadcast opera, etc. The Corporation possesses broadcasting rights in a number of modern opera translations by, e.g., Procter-Gregg, Millar-Craig, Dent, Hassall, Dunn and Arundell, many of which are incorporated into working sets of vocal and chorus scores.

Chamber Music. Separate sequences of chamber music are kept in broad divisions according to the resources employed (e.g. piano-forte trios, pianoforte solos, cello and pianoforte, etc.). These include many manuscript works, among them some modern realizations of 17th- and 18th-century figured basses.

Method, Staffing, etc. Some forty assistants administer the various sections of the Central Library as follows: accessions, cataloguing, requisitions (London and regional), hire, copying, orchestrations, shelving and maintenance, etc. Studio needs are served by teams of orchestral and chorus librarians attached appropriately to London and the regions.

Catalogues. The basic orchestral composer-catalogues are duplicated and deposited strategically throughout the Corporation. A set has also been deposited with the Central Music Library, Westminster. These are kept current by the issue of regular Lists of Accessions, which receive a wide circulation to other radio stations and to institutions and individuals at home and abroad. Non-broadcast use: the Library is normally confined to use for broadcasts. It has power to lend or hire its unique material, but music available from publishers and hire libraries is not normally lent or hired. An information service, is, however, widely used by the musical profession and the press, in addition to broadcasting personnel. B.B.C. Music Librarian: J. H. Davies.

(ii) The B.B.C. Gramophone Record Library. This is one of the largest collections of its kind in the world, amounting to over 200,000 records, which are housed in a building separate from the music stocks and cared for by a specialized staff. See 'Libraries Association Record', Vol. XLIX (1947). Librarian: Miss V. Britten.

(iii) The B.B.C. Recorded Programmes Library. This is a more recent development of broadcasting, and one of very specialized interest, and although not of immediate use to musicologists or musicians outside the Corporation, it is obviously bound to develop as broadcasting itself develops. See 'Some Papers Read at the Week-End Conference of the London and Home Counties Branch of the Library Association' (Oct. 1946). Librarian: Miss M. Slocombe.

q. The Central Music Library. This collection is a large public lending-library of music, books on music, musical periodicals and gramophone records, established in 1946 and housed, by the generous permission of the Westminster City Council, in the Buckingham Palace Road branch of the Westminster Public Libraries. It thus became a national collection of music, provided for the free use of musicians and music-lovers, and indeed of any member of the public who is in possession of a public library ticket, not necessarily in the Westminster area, but anywhere in London, and indeed in any part of Great Britain. There is a postal service for borrowers in the country and full use may be made of the general public library interchange service, in such a way that items may be obtained on loan by ticket-holders of any public library. The Library was inaugurated in the Buckingham Palace Road Library—where it occupies the first floor—by Dr. Ralph Vaughan Williams, O.M., on 21 Oct. 1948, when it was formally handed over on a basis of indefinite loan to the Mayor of Westminster by the Chairman of the Council. The formation of a collection of music, books, periodicals and records was first made possible by a munificent gift of £10,000 offered by Mrs. Winifred Christie-Moor. A small Council was gathered with Mr. Eric Blom as Chairman, Sir Steuart Wilson as Hon. Secretary, Mr. C. S. Forsyth as Hon. Treasurer, Mr. J. Fayer Hosken as Hon. Solicitor and, as further members, Mrs. Christie-Moor, Professor Edward J. Dent, Mr. Lionel McColvin, Mr. Cecil B. Oldham and Miss Seymour Whinyates. Miss Dorothy Lawton was appointed curator, but retired in June 1949, after doing much valuable work on a catalogue. This was very ambitiously planned and has so far remained unfinished, but a working card index is in use temporarily which serves well for normal everyday requirements. A Limited Company was formed, known as The Central Music Library Company, and the late Edwin Evans's library was purchased as a nucleus from his widow. It is particularly rich in modern British, French and Russian music, much of which, especially Russian, is no longer obtainable through the music trade, and there are also numerous works of various schools which have long been out of print. This collection was soon augmented by a number of accessions, accepted as gifts or acquired by purchase, and in 1948 a considerable portion of the late Gerald M. Cooper's valuable library came into the Central Music Library's possession through the generosity of Professor Dent, to whom it had been left for use or distribution at his discretion. The Cooper Library consists mainly of old music, especially English and Italian, and it thus very usefully augmented the Evans collection with a minimum of overlapping. The Library grows constantly, and although it is still far from complete, contains much valuable material, including old and modern music as well as English and foreign books and periodicals (over 30,000 items of music and musical literature and over 5000 gramophone records). One item of great interest to musicologists is a Thematic Index to Purcell's works. The generous offer of hospitality made to the Central Music Library by the Westminster Public Libraries was due, in the first place, to Mr. Lionel McColvin, Chief Librarian to the Westminster City Council. It will remain in the Buckingham Palace Road Library, by mutual agreement, probably until it has a building of its own or becomes part of some civic music centre. It receives annual subsidies from the Arts Council of Great Britain, the British Council and other bodies. See Mus. T. (Oct. 1951); 'Who's Who in Music?' (1950). Westminster City Librarian: L. R. McColvin, F.L.A.; G.M.L. Librarian: Miss J. Hickling.

r. The University of London. The Music Library of the University was opened in 1926 and contains a small but rapidly growing general collection of about 4000 volumes of music, and the same number of books on music. It also possesses two gramophones, some 3000 disks, a Steck pianola and about 2000 pianola rolls. In 1932 the Library received from the Carnegie United Kingdom Trust a valuable gift consisting of a number of rare and important works on music which the Trustees acquired at the sale of the Alfred Henry Littleton Library. This collection includes examples of early compositions, mostly English, and some important theoretical works of the 15th, 16th and 17th centuries, including Gafurio (1480); Niger (1480); Marbeck (1550); Day's 'Psalms' (1563);

Tallis, Byrd, Ward, etc., and W. Lawes's 'Choice Psalmes' (1648). In addition the Trustees have presented a unique collection of some 20,000 photostat reproductions of Tudor church music prepared for the use of the editors of the famous edition of that name; there are also many unpublished transcripts made for the same edition by the late Rev. A. Ramsbotham. The Library also contains the collection of music formed by the late Sir George Elvey, which was placed on permanent loan in the University Music Library by his son, the Rev. G. F. Handel Elvey; also various standard editions of the great masters. The Library is primarily for the use of registered music students of the University. Extension and tutorial class music students may also obtain full privileges. Other music students, where applications and recommendations are considered satisfactory by the Librarian, may be admitted. Goldsmith's Librarian: J. H. P. Pafford.

s. The American Library, Grosvenor Square, contains a growing collection of works by American composers, which may be borrowed by conductors, performers, students, etc. Open Mondays to Fridays, 9 A.M. to 8 P.M. There is also a large collection of gramophone records. Hand-lists of the scores and records are issued.

MANCHESTER. a. Henry Watson Music Library. In 1899 Dr. Henry Watson of Salford transferred the ownership of his music library of 16,700 volumes to the Corporation of Manchester, with the stipulation that the collection should remain under his control until his death. The library is now a department of the Manchester Public Libraries and is housed in the Central Library in St. Peter's Square. It contains some 81,000 volumes and about 312,000 separate copies of sheet music, including anthems, partsongs and orchestral parts.

A feature of the service offered by the library is the issue of multiple copies of partsongs, cantatas, anthems and orchestral parts to choral and orchestral societies in all parts of the country. To satisfy the demand for the more popular works large stocks have been built up.

The literature, amounting to about 8000 volumes, includes virtually every standard work in the theory and history of music, biography and the ballet published in English, together with many foreign works. There is also a very valuable reference section, containing, besides about 2100 bound volumes of periodicals, the complete editions of Breitkopf & Härtel, the publications of the more important societies and some 400 books and MSS of a rare, valuable or curious nature. The rarities include two copies of Mace's 'Musick's Monument' (1676), Simpson's

'The Division Viol' (1667), Purcell's 'Orpheus Britannicus' (1st and 2nd editions), 'Parthenia' (1611), Morley's 'A Plaine and Easy Introduction to Practical Musick' (1st and 2nd editions), Dowland's 'Lachrimae'; and a MS collection of viola da gamba music (c. 1660) in tablature, containing unique settings of songs by Shakespeare and works by contemporary composers otherwise unknown. There are also fine collections of 17th- and 18th-century song-books; orchestral parts of symphonies and concertos; and of hymnals and psalters (42 editions of Sternhold and Hopkins).

The library also houses a small collection of musical instruments. These have been given partly by Watson, and later supplemented by a number of instruments presented by J. C. Chapman. See L. Duck in Mus. T. (Apr. 1952). Music Librarian: John F. Russell. Sub-Librarian: L. W. Duck.

b. Chetham's Library. Here a collection of 3100 proclamations, broadsides, ballads and poems, accumulated and presented to the Library by the late J. O. Halliwell-Phillips is preserved. In this collection are many old popular songs ranging through the 16th, 17th and 18th centuries; songs, catches, odes, etc., by Purcell, Eccles, Leveridge, Courteville, Croft, Carey, Weldon and Pepusch; and a large collection of single sheet songs with music, published between 1680 and 1740. Many of the songs in this collection were introduced into operas for special occasions and are therefore not to be found in the printed editions. There is a privately printed catalogue of the collection, prepared by Halliwell-Phillips. Librarian: Hilda Loft-house.

c. John Rylands Library. This Library possesses a certain number of items of musical interest. There are several liturgical MSS which serve to illustrate the development of notation from the 9th to the 15th century, the most important of which are the 'Trier Psalter' (9th cent.); 'Cantica ecclesiastica pro dominicis et festis, cum notis musicis' (10th cent.); the 'Sarum Missal' (first half of the 13th cent.); the 'Colonna Missal' (1517). The collection of early printed books also includes many of the famous missals and items such as Marbeck's 'Booke of Common Praier noted and described' (1550), Sternhold and Hopkins's Psalter (1562) and theoretical works by Gaforio. In the collection of Chinese drawings and paintings there is an interesting volume containing about forty coloured drawings of musical instruments, two of which show the arrangement of an orchestra of 32 instruments.

d. Royal Manchester College of Music. Practical working Library and collection of instruments. Director: R. J. Forbes.

OScott near BIRMINGHAM. St. Mary's

College. The Library of this college contains a collection of masses, sequences, offertories, etc., in 7 vols. by Palestrina, ed. by P. Alfieri (1841-46) and a vol. of masses by him; at the end of this vol. is a 'Miserere' by Casciolini and a 'Salve Regina' by Bonfichi-Barola. Librarian: H. F. Davis.

OXFORD. a. Bodleian Library. The earliest MS material in this Library, containing medieval monody, includes a Winchester Troper (979-80), Proser (after 984) and Sequentiary (mid-11th cent.) (all in MS Bodley 775); from the 11th century the Leofric Missal (MS Bodley 579), the Heidenheim Troper and Sequentiary (MS Selden supra 27), the Novalosa Troper and Proser (MS Douce 222) and parts of a mass and of hymns written for St. Mary of Zara in Dalmatia (MSS Canon. bibl. lat. 61 and liturg. 277); from the late 11th and early 12th centuries a pontifical and two antiphoners from northern Italy using a stave (MSS Canon. liturg. 358-59 and misc. 43). Polyphonic music of the middle ages is found in about fifty MSS, mainly fragments used in bindings, ranging from the 12th to the 16th centuries, covering a wide field of secular and religious works — conducti, partsongs, carols, dances and other forms. Among these are parts of a 13th- and 14th-century volume of Worcester harmony, a collection of songs and carols in Latin and English written down between 1425 and 1440, which includes the Agincourt song (MS Arch. Seld. B. 26), and the famous collection of Flemish religious and secular music copied about 1436, which contains songs by Dufay, Binchois, Hugh and Arnold de Lantins and many others (MS Canon. misc. 213). A selection of compositions from this manuscript have been transcribed with facsimiles in Stainer's 'Dufay and his Contemporaries' (London, 1898). A catalogue of all the medieval polyphony so far known to be in the Bodleian Library has been prepared by Dom Anselm Hughes; see 'Medieval Polyphony in the Bodleian Library' (Oxford, 1951). A selection of the most important medieval music of all kinds has been edited with facsimiles in Stainer & Nicholson's 'Early Bodleian Music' (3 vols., Oxford, 1901 & 1913) and the liturgical MSS containing music are described in W. H. Frere's 'Bibliotheca Musico-Liturgica', Vol. I (London, 1901).

For music of the 16th to the 18th centuries the Bodleian is indebted to two large collections in particular. In 1801 the Rev. O. Wight bequeathed (besides printed works) 209 volumes of manuscripts written in the 17th and 18th centuries, which include compositions by Ariosti, Blow, Boyce, Byrd, Caldara, Clarke, Croft, Josquin Des Prés, Dowland, East, Ford, O. & C. Gibbons, Greene, Handel, Lassus, Lotti, Morley, Pergolesi, Purcell, Rogers, Scarlatti, Tallis, Taylor, Vinci, Weelkes, Wilbye and others, besides numerous works by W. & P. Hayes. Many of these are autograph. The collection is described in the 'Summary Catalogue of Western Manuscripts in the Bodleian Library', Vol. IV (Oxford, 1897). In 1885 the library of the Music School was deposited in the Bodleian, containing 575 volumes of manuscript music accumulated since its foundation by William Heather in 1626. It is particularly rich in English music from the Restoration to the end of the 18th century, and also in Italian works. It includes the six Baldwin partbooks (one of the few complete sets remaining from the 16th century) containing 18 masses by Taverner, Burton, Marbeck, Fayrfax, Rasar, Aston, Ashwell, Norman, Shepherd, Tye and Alwood; three Edwardine cathedral partbooks; a collection of In Nomines in four and five parts by Byrd, Ferrabosco, Bull, Taverner, Tye, Tallis and others; motets by Felice Sances, motets with instrumental accompaniments by Rosenmüller, Schelling and Knüpfer; 61 sonatas by Corelli, Matteis, Ruggiero, Purcell and others; 235 pieces from Lully's operas; Henri de Gallot's 'Pièces de guitare' (1680-84), 18 French and Italian songs; two volumes containing fantasies, music to masques, etc., by William and Henry Lawes; fantasies in six parts by J. Jenkins, Cooper, Lupo, T. Tomkins, Byrd and others; John Jenkins's 'Fancies & Ayres' and fantasies for 2 trebles, 2 basses and organ; pavans, galliards, corantos, dated 1654, by Coleman, Lawes, John Taylor and others; about 179 instrumental pieces by Benjamin Rogers; Sylvanus Taylor's Ayres for 2 trebles and a bass, vocal and instrumental parts of Dryden's 'Secular Masque'; 9 instrumental pieces by C. Gibbons; songs by Purcell, Blow, W. Child and others; the 'Oxford Act Music' (or commemoration music) by Blow, Goodson and others; Christopher Simpson's 'Months & Seasons' for 2 basses and a treble (1668) and his 'Little Consort'; a complete set of occasional odes by Boyce for the king's birthday and New Year (1755-79), and anthems and odes for various occasions by Boyce and others. The Baldwin part-books (MSS Mus. Sch. c. 376-82) are fully described in Dom Anselm Hughes's catalogue. The whole of the Music School collection is described in the 'Summary Catalogue of Western Manuscripts in the Bodleian Library', Vol. V (Oxford, 1905).

With the Music School collection came also a collection of exercises submitted for Oxford musical degrees, from 1710 onwards (MSS Mus. Sch. ex). Since 1885 they have been deposited in the Bodleian. They are all catalogued up to 1915 in the 'Summary Catalogue of Western Manuscripts', Vols.

V & VI (Oxford, 1905 & 1924). Among musical manuscripts of this period acquired from other sources are five part-books (dated 1585) of motets by Byrd, Tye, Taverner, Fayrfax, Tallis and others (MSS Mus. c. 1-5), a volume of Purcell's songs, odes and hymns, some autograph and one hymn ('O happy man') is perhaps the only copy extant (MS Mus. c. 28), and autograph copies of Handel's cantatas 'Deh lasciate' and 'O fuggite amore' (MS Don. c. 69).

Among MSS of the 19th and 20th centuries a number of autograph works have been presented to the Library in recent years by the Friends of the Bodleian Library. They include Schubert's song 'Tiefes Leid' (MS Don c. 1), Mendelssohn's 'Albumblatt' Op. 117 (MS Don. c. 44), Delius's sketch for the 'Song of Summer' (MS Don. b. 2), six pages from 'The Wreckers' by Ethel Smyth (MS Don. b. 7), 'Sāvītri' and 'A Choral Fantasia' by Holst (MSS Don. c. 3 and 21), and the fourth Symphony by Arnold Bax (MS Don. c. 48). Other gifts include the original MS of the full score of 'The Planets' mostly in Holst's own hand (MS Mus. b. 18), and the vocal score of the oratorio 'Sancta Civitas' by Vaughan Williams.

There is no catalogue specifically of musical MSS in the Bodleian Library. Besides the individual catalogues mentioned above, descriptions of all the MSS will be found in either the 'Catalogi Codicum Manuscriptorum Bibliothecae Bodleianae' (Oxford, 1853-1900) or the 'Summary Catalogue of Western Manuscripts in the Bodleian Library' (Oxford, 1895-1937).

Printed music has been included in the Library's contents since the founder's time, for in 1602 a volume of several items was bought and others were given. But in general published music was not collected until 1759, when it first began to be received from Stationers' Hall. It was allowed to accumulate until about 1845, when it was arranged and bound up in some 400 volumes. The cataloguing began in 1882, and since then all accessions, with the exception of certain of the less important works received under the Copyright Act, have been catalogued. Some 3000 to 4000 musical works are received yearly, and classified hand-lists of all the music are available for reference. The printed works of the Wight Bequest consist chiefly of the original folio editions of Handel, Arnold's and Boyce's collections, and the works of Playford, Purcell, Croft, Greene and other English composers. Some rare sets of madrigals were purchased in the mid-19th century, notably those of Morley, Watson, Weelkes, Wilbye and Yonge.

The Friends of the Bodleian have presented rare printed works, including Morley's 'Can-zonets' (1597), Playford's 'Choice Ayres (1675-84) and the superius of the 'Motetti libro quattro' printed by Petrucci (1505). The Library's holdings of contemporary editions of the works of 18th-century composers were greatly enriched by the bequest of the late T. W. Bourne in 1947. This included a collection, believed to be complete, of Handel's published instrumental music, some of his operas and also works by Albinoni, Arne, Bach, Corelli, Geminiani, Leclair, Vivaldi and many others. The bequest was completed by a full set of Handel's works as published by the German Handel Society. Librarian: J. N. L. Myres.

b. Oxford University Faculty of Music Library, Music School, Holywell Street. This is a collection intended mainly for use as a reference and lending library by those reading music at the University. It includes the so-called Music Students' Library (the Allen, Bellamy and Heberden Bequests) and also the Bridges, Ellis, Hadow, Mec and Walker Bequests. There is an interesting section of English printed music of the late 17th, 18th and 19th centuries; also most of the collected editions, as well as the Heron-Allen collection of books on the violin, etc., and the Sanford Terry Bach collection, both on permanent loan from the Royal College of Music. The fine collection of portraits belonging to the Music School are now in the Faculty House and the Holywell Music Room. The Oxford University Musical Club also possesses a library of chamber music, and the Oxford Orchestral Society has a library of orchestral material. There is also a library of gramophone records in the same group of buildings. Professor of Music: Prof. J. A. Westrup; Departmental Librarian: J. Hough.

c. Christ Church. The Library of this college contains a very large and valuable collection of early English and foreign music, chiefly bequeathed to the college by Dean Aldrich and Mr. Goodson, but since then increased by many additions. The printed works comprise compositions by more than 180 different composers, while the MSS contain 1075 anonymous pieces, and 2417 pieces by known composers, of whom 182 are English, 80 Italian and 14 composers of other nations. This estimate does not include the many separate movements of operas, services, etc., and the fantasies for instruments, which if enumerated would amount to nearly 5000. Among the MSS are 30 anthems by Aldrich; 23 anthems, 7 motets, 4 services and a masque ('Venus and Adonis') by Blow; 29 anthems, 43 motets, 19 madrigals, etc., and a very curious piece of programme music ('Mr. Bird's Battle') by Byrd; 18 motets by Dering; 20 anthems and 21 madrigals and canzonets by Thomas Ford; 24 anthems by Orlando Gibbons; 21 anthems by John Goldwin; 33 motets by M. Jeffrey; 21 canzonets by John Jenkins; 17 motets by John Mundy; 15 dramatic works by Henry Purcell; 39 motets by J. Shepherd; 17 motets by William Taverner; 10 madrigals by Warde; 25 motets by Whyte; 47 motets and 45 cantatas by Carissimi; 15 cantatas by Cesti; 67 motets by Graziani; 27 cantatas by Micheli; 30 motets by Palestrina; 112 cantatas by Luigi Rossi; 12 cantatas, a serenata, 2 dramas, and an opera by A. Scarlatti; and the following anonymous compositions: 239 motets, 162 cantatas, etc., to English words, and 408 cantatas, etc., to Italian words. In 1918 the Library acquired the set of 10 volumes of Barnard's 'Church Music' formerly in the possession of the Cathedral Library at Hereford. See the catalogues of the MSS by G. E. P. Arkwright (Vol. I, 1915; Vol. II, 1923 — a third volume is in preparation), and of the printed music prior to 1801, by A. Hiff (1919). A thematic catalogue of the anonymous instrumental music is available in the Library.

d. St. John's College. The Library possesses two MS bass part-books, dated between 1625 and 1632, of anthems and psalms by various composers, one originally from the Royal Library, and both formerly in the possession of William Juxon, Archbishop of Canterbury. Both books contain important works not found elsewhere, notably Tallis's 5-part service. Both MSS were written by M. East, not, as sometimes stated, by T. Tomkins. Librarian: C. H. Roberts.

e. Oriel College. The Library has about 200 vols. of 17th- and 18th-century printed music, concertos, sonatas, operas, etc., most of which came from the Library of Lord Leigh, of Stoneleigh, Warwickshire, in the late 18th century. Librarian: J. W. Gough.

RIPON. The Minster Library contains some rare liturgical printed books, particularly a York Manual of 1509 (Wynkyn de Worde) and a York Missal of 1517 (Rouen), also an interesting vol. of theological tracts on whose blank leaves are written two 16th-century ballads for 3 voices. See 'Yorkshire Archaeological and Topographical Journal', II, 396. [4.]

ROCHESTER. The Cathedral has a Music Library of 478 vols., 84 being in MS, containing anthems and services by Hopkins, Henstridge, Loch, Wootton, Hine, Turner, Elvey, Child, Dupuis, Lambert, Fussell, Mason, Walmisley, Russell, Rogers, Marsh and Pratt. [4.]

SEVENOAKS. Sir Newman Flower's Handel Collection is now at Tarrant Keynston, Dorset (q.v.).

SHENLEY, HERTS. The Speyer Collection was dispersed in 1934.

SHERBORNE SCHOOL, DORSET. There are six rare vols. of music in the School Library, containing complete sets of parts of the following works: O. and F. Lassus, 'Selectiones Cantiones' (Nuremberg, 1587); Lassus, 'Lectiones Hiob' (Nuremberg, 1588); Gastoldi, 'Balletti' (Antwerp, 1601); the 'Paradiso musicale' (Antwerp, 1596); also the 5-part madrigals of Marenzio (Antwerp, 1593). Librarian: G. J. B. Watkins.

STAMFORD. Burghley House. The Library of the Marquess of Exeter contains a small but extremely interesting collection of MSS of 18th-century Italian music, including operas, by Astorga, Pergolesi, Vinci, etc.

STONEYHURST COLLEGE near BLACKBURN. The College Library possesses the original MS of De Vico's 'Responses for Holy Week'; two 16th-century MS vols. of songs and motets by Clemens non Papa, Crecquillon, Crespel, Baston and others; and a vol. of sacred works, in the autograph of J. F. Wade, dated 1751. Librarian: Rev. H. Chadwick, S.J.

TARRANT KEYNSTON, DORSET. Sir Newman Flower possesses a fine Handel Library which includes some hundreds of transcripts of Handel's works made by J. C. Smith, formerly in the Aylesford Library; some Handel autographs; a number of early printed editions, the most important of which is an issue of the 'Songs in Messiah' which apparently antedates any previously known copy. There are also some contemporary paintings of Handel by Denner, Hudson, Hogarth, etc. In addition to a portion of Handel's work copied out by Beethoven there are a few transcripts of other 18th-century composers.

TENBURY.—St. Michael's College. This college possesses the Library of the late Rev. Sir Frederick A. Gore Ouseley, containing nearly 4000 volumes, and is by far the most important private music library in the United Kingdom. The printed books include a large number of very scarce treatises, and among other great rarities are the four works of Gafori and Case's 'The Praise of Musicke' (1586). There is also a good collection of part-books of English and Italian madrigals. But the chief importance of this Library rests upon the MSS. The most valuable of these are the numerous sets of part-books dating about the year 1600 and containing the text of sacred and secular music of the polyphonic school. Works of both continental and English composers are to be found in these books, and they supply the only known text of certain pieces by Taverner, Whyte, Byrd and other Tudor musicians. Perhaps the most notable manuscript in this Library belonging to this period is the famous organ book in the hand of Adrian Batten containing a vast store of early English church music (see T.C.M., Vol. II). The school of Purcell is richly represented in this Library by contemporary MSS, and some of the works of Purcell and Blow have survived nowhere else. In this collection are autographs of Blow, Purcell, Croft and Jeremiah Clarke. The later periods of English music are also well represented, and include autographs of Boyce, Burney, Charles Wesley, Crotch, S. Arnold and many more modern composers.

Perhaps the most famous MS in this Library is Handel's "conductor's" score of 'Messiah', used by the composer at the first performance at Dublin in 1742. Certain numbers and some pencil notes are in Handel's autograph. This MS is one of the four recognized sources of the text of the oratorio. It is fully described by Chrysander in Vol. XXIV of the German Handel Society edition, and all the autograph portions may be seen in Chrysander's facsimile reproduction of 'Messiah'.

One further feature of this Library is the remarkably large collection of printed and MS scores of operatic works ranging from the 17th to the 19th century. Among these are a very fine set of scores in the hand of Philidor ainé, which, together with vocal and instrumental part-books (numbering over 200 vols.), once formed part of the royal music library of the French kings. The scores are in especially good condition and the covers are stamped with the Bourbon coat of arms. These scores include operas, ballets and motets by Lully, Campra, Colasse and others of the same school. Also in Philidor's hand is a fine set of service books from the French royal chapel.

In 1934 the 'Catalogue of the Manuscripts of St. Michael's College, Tenbury', edited by the then Librarian, the Rev. Canon Edmund H. Fellowes, D.Mus., C.H., was published in Paris by the Lyrebird Press. There is also an unpublished catalogue of the printed music, etc., available for consultation in the Library.

Since the publication of the catalogue an important addition to the Philidor Collection has been acquired. That collection was described by Fellowes in M. & L., Vol. XII (Apr. 1931). The addition purchased in 1934 (largely through the generosity of a Fellow of the College) from Arthur Rau (Paris) consists of 55 volumes of MS in the hand of Philidor and 6 vols. of printed music. These 61 vols. are uniform with the rest of the Tenbury collection and bear the Toulouse arms on both covers. They represent practically the whole of the Toulouse-Philidor Collection that was not purchased by Williams-Hope at the sale of Louis-Philippe's library in 1852. It was Williams-Hope's purchase which shortly after was acquired by Ouseley for his own library at St. Michael's College. The addition of 1934 completes a set of ten volumes of motets by Lalande and includes motets by Lully, Lalande, Minoret, Couperin and Colasse, as well as some symphonies by Carissimi and Legrenzi. It therefore reunites at Tenbury the historic collection made by the Comte de Toulouse at Rambouillet early in the 18th century. The whole now comprises over 400 vols. in their original bindings and stamped with the count's arms. About 350 are in manuscript in the hand of André Philidor and 73 are printed books, many of them of great rarity.

The Library was extensively rearranged by Fellowes, who in 1948 was succeeded as honorary Librarian by H. Watkins Shaw.

WARE, HERTS. St. Edmund's College. Old Hall. The Library contains a famous and valuable 15th-century English MS, generally known as the 'Old Hall Manuscript', containing sacred music by English composers of the period, including two items formerly ascribed to Henry VI, but now attributed to Henry V. The Plainsong and Medieval Music Society have published this MS in 3 vols. (1930-38). See S.I.M.G., Vol. II (1900-1901); also M.Q., Vols. XXXIV & XXXV (1948-49). President: The Right Rev. J. B. Bagshawe.

WELLS. The Cathedral Library contains some fragments of a composition or compositions by Fayrfax.

WIGAN. Public Library. Founded in 1878, the Central Lending Department and Reference Libraries contain a good collection of English musical literature among their 135,000 vols. The Library possesses some MSS, among them an early 15th-century Gradual. Among the early printed editions are two copies of 'The Fool's Preferment' with music by Purcell and a Beethoven Quintet, Op. 4, of 1797. Two special collections have been acquired, one of c. 200 scores collected by the famous Lancashire bandmaster W. Halliwell; the other of 23 old musical instruments from the collection of another bandmaster, the late W. Rimmer. A card catalogue is kept up to date in the Library. Librarian: A. J. Hawkes.

WIMBORNE MINSTER. a. Among the books preserved in the famous Chained Library of the Minster are five 17th-century part-books (A.T.T.B.B.), which provide readings for Byrd's short service and other English church music.

b. St. Giles's House. The Earl of Shaftesbury has a small but interesting collection of Handel MS transcripts and early editions, which have descended in the family from James Harris, the friend of Handel.

WINDSOR. a. The Royal Library at Windsor Castle. Most of the music from this Library has been removed to form part of the Royal Music Library, now housed at the British Museum. The most important item remaining at Windsor is the autograph score of Mozart's cantata 'Die Schuldigkeit des ersten Gebotes'. Her Majesty's Librarian: Sir Owen Morshead.

b. St. George's Chapel. The Chapter Library contains a few 17th-century MS part-books; some of these are in the hand of W. Child and contain some of his services, besides anthems by Tallis and other Tudor composers. There are also two sets of part-books of Tomkins's 'Musica Deo sacra' (1668); from each set the tenor is unfortunately missing; several of these part-books are now kept in the Chapter Room.

WORCESTER. The Cathedral Library possesses a Benedictine Antiphoner of the 13th century, written at Worcester Cathedral, reproduced in facsimile in 'Paléographie musicale'; a Hereford Missal of the 14th century; some parts of Barnard's 'Church Music'; a tenor part-book containing Byrd's Great Service; and, above all, a quantity of fly-leaves of harmonized music, dating from c. 1275 to c. 1325, which have been recovered from old bindings. Parts of the same collections exist at the Bodleian, at the British Museum and at Magdalen College, Oxford, and the whole provides the most considerable body of material for the history of English composition during the period that is at present available, containing as it does about 30 complete and 80 incomplete items. These fragments have been transcribed and edited by Dom Anselm Hughes, O.S.B., in his 'Worcester Medieval Harmony. of the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Centuries' (1928); and Proc. Mus. Ass. (1924-25).

YORK. The Minster Library contains many musical works, both MS and printed. Among the MSS the following may be mentioned: a collection of glees, duets, etc. by Aldrich, Wise, Blow, etc.; an Installation Ode by Hague; various 'Te Deum', including one by Haydn. 'The Nativity' by Homilius; a mass by Naumann; 'The Intercession', an oratorio by King; a set of 3-part fantasies by Jenkins; 8 choirbooks, formerly belonging to W. Gostling, containing the voice parts of a number of anthems and services of the 17th century, including an unknown one by Purcell. There is also a considerable collection of printed music of the 17th century. Canon-Residentiary, Chancellor and Librarian: F. Harrison.

GREECE

ATHENS. The Gennadion contains a rich collection of specimens of Byzantine musical notation and other material illustrative of Greek church and folk music. [4 & S.]

HOLLAND¹

AMSTERDAM. a. Verenigde Muziekbibliotheek. This is a joint Library of the Music Section of the Public Library and of the fine collection of the Vereniging voor Noord-Nederlands Muziekgeschiedenis or Maatschappij tot Bevordering der Toonkunst. The Dutch Musicological Society's Library is fine and extensive, with many rarities. See 'Catalogus van de Bibliotheeken der Maatschappij tot Bevordering der Toonkunst . . .' (Amsterdam, 1884). Supplementary lists also appeared in the Society's first two 'Bouwsteenen', later continued as the 'Tijdschrift'. The collection also includes the library of the Zutphen Zangersverbond. See 'Year's Work in Librarianship', Vol. II (1938).

b. Donemus. This is primarily a Lending Library which specializes in Dutch music.

THE HAGUE. a. Koninklijke Bibliotheek. The Royal Library contains about 1100 vols. of musical interest, which have been catalogued on cards. Part of the extensive library of Dr. D. F. Scheurleer has been obtained by this Library, including a great many old song books. See also 'Catalogue van schoone kunsten en kunstnijverheid' (The Hague, 1905). Director: Dr. L. Brummel.

b. Municipal (Gaemeente) Museum. The greater part of the Scheurleer collection was acquired by the municipality and forms one of the two sections of the Museum Scheurleer. The music library here is the most extensive and important in Holland; there is also a fine collection of musical instruments of all kinds. See 'Catalogus der Muziekbibliotheek van D. F. Scheurleer', 2 vols. & suppl. (1893, 1903, 1910); also 'Muziekhistorisch Museum van Dr. D. F. Scheurleer: catalogus van de muziekwerken en de boeken over muziek', 3 vols. (The Hague, 1923-25).

LEYDEN. a. The University Library contains MSS of the 10th, 11th and 15th centuries; a collection of Souterliedekens and some chamber music of the 18th century. See the third 'Bouwsteenen', p. 111, etc. Director: Dr. A. Kessen.

b. St. Pieterskerk. This church possesses six choir-books containing compositions of the 16th century. They are described at length in the third 'Bouwsteenen', p. 37, etc. At present one of the books is in the Stedelijk Museum at Lakenhal, and five are in the Town Archives at Leyden.

c. The Bibliotheca Thysiana. Founded in 1653, this Library contains a vol. of 17th-century lute music that is of the very greatest importance, partly on account of its size (over 1000 pp.) and partly on account of the variety of styles and of composers represented. This book, which is now generally known as 'Het Luytboek van Thysius', has been described at great length by G. P. N. Land in the 'Tijdschrift' of the Vereniging v. N.N.M., 1885-91. Curators: Dr. J. N. B. van den Brink and Dr. T. J. G. Loder.

ROTTERDAM. The Library of the Philharmonic Orchestra (no details available).

UTRECHT. a. The University Library. This collection contains a number of valuable liturgical MSS of the 12th-15th centuries, among which a 14th-century collection of sequences is noteworthy. See 'Catalogus codicum manuscritorum bibliothecae Universitatis Rheno-Trajectinae', 2 vols. (Utrecht, 1887, 1909). Librarian: Dr. D. A. Grosheide.

b. The University Institute of Musicology has a large general library of its own. Director: Prof. Dr. A. Smijers.

c. Collegium Musicum. The orchestral parts, etc., belonging to this historic music club are still in existence and form a most interesting source of materials for the study of music in 18th-century Holland. They are kept in a building just south-east of the Domkerk. A catalogue by W. Noske is in preparation.

HUNGARY

BUDAPEST. a. National Museum. The Library of this institution includes MSS by Liszt, Dohnányi and other Hungarian composers, also some letters of Wagner. [4 & S.] It is not known what has survived the war.

b. The Esterházy Archives contain the musical material used for the concerts given by the Esterházy family at Esterház and Eisenstadt.

ITALY

Much information about Italian libraries can be found in 'Ente culturali italiani', Vol. II (Bologna, 1930); also the 'Guide manuel des bibliothèques de Rome' and its companion-volumes in the 'Bibliothèques des Annales Institutorum' (Rome, 1932-); for the MS collections see 'Inventari dei manoscritti delle biblioteche d'Italia' (Forlì, 1890-); also G. Gabrieli, 'Notizie statistiche, storiche, bibliografiche, delle collezioni di manoscritti oggi conservati nelle biblioteche italiane' (Milan, 1936). For the musical collections, the bulletins of the Associazione dei Musicologi Italiani, which began in 1909, and continued until 1942, are particularly valuable and are referred to below as B.A.M.I. The Association, which ceased to exist for a while after the death of Prof. G. Gasperini in 1945, is now in process of revival. Other useful sources of information are included in 'Le biblioteche governative italiane nel 1898' (Rome, 1900). For conditions just after the war see E. Lowinsky in J.A.M.S., Vol. I (1948); also

W. H. Rubsamen, 'Music Researches in Italian Libraries' in 'Notes' (1949).

AREZZO. Biblioteca Pubblica della Fraternità dei Laici. Some liturgical MSS of the 11th, 12th and 15th centuries.

ASSISI. Biblioteca Comunale. For the contents of this library see the catalogue by the late librarian, F. Pernachi, in B.A.M.I. (1921). The Library is shortly to issue a catalogue of the MSS in the Papal Chapel of St. Francis of Assisi, for the use of musicologists, as these MSS are understood to contain many unknown works by early musicians of the Chapel. Director: Father G. Zaccaria.

BASSANO. a. Biblioteca Comunale. Large collection of MS and printed music, mostly sacred and operatic, c. 1750-1850.

b. Chilesotti Collection, at the Villa Bus-sandri, Marchesane nr. Bassano. Consists mostly of his transcripts of works, many of which are now lost or destroyed; especially rich in lute music, etc.; N.B.—the 'Arie' of Severi.

BERGAMO. a. Biblioteca Civica. This Library possesses some works printed by Petrucci; madrigals of the 16th and 17th centuries; MS vocal and instrumental works of the 18th century; 11 vols. of youthful compositions by Donizetti. These last are at present on view at the Museo Donizettiano. Most of the music preserved in the Library formerly belonged to J. S. Mayr. Librarian: A. Leidi.

b. Museo Donizettiano. The Library contains some 10,000 vols., which include a large number of works by Donizetti in MS, or printed editions, also some autographs of the cellist Piatti, who was also a native of Bergamo. Keeper: Prof. G. Zavadini.

BOLOGNA. a. Biblioteca Comunale annessa al Conservatorio Musicale (formerly known as the Conservatorio G. B. Martini, or the Liceo Musicale). This magnificent Library was founded in 1798 and opened in 1805. It contains the collections of Padre Martini, S. Mattei and G. Gaspari, and although damaged during the war, is still one of the finest and most valuable musical libraries in the whole world, and was even further enriched in 1946 by the presentation of the collection of modern music and books of the late librarian, Prof. F. Vatielli (d. 1946). See the elaborate published Catalogue, Vols. I-V (1890-1943); also F. Vatielli, 'La Biblioteca del Liceo Musicale di Bologna' (Bologna, 1917); also 'Notes' (Sept. 1949). Librarian: N. Fanti. N.B.—The musical instruments formerly kept there are now in the Museo Civico.

b. Biblioteca Universitaria. The music is all in MS and includes a missal of the 11th century, a valuable collection of sacred vocal music of the 15th century (see V.f.M., 1885), 2 operas by A. Scarlatti and some sacred music of the early 17th century. See F. Liuzzi, 'I codici musicali conservati nella Biblioteca Universitaria di Bologna', in 'La Rinascita Musicale' (Parma, 1909); also 'Inventari', Vol. XIX. Director: A. Toschi.

c. Accademia Filarmonica. The Library contains a small collection of music of the 17th-18th centuries, including the Diploma Exercises. There is also a small collection of letters, etc., presented by M. Masseangeli, of which a catalogue was issued in 1881. See A. Bonora in B.A.M.I. (1910-13). This institution is usually closed; visitors must apply at a above.

d. San Petronio. Church Archives. Some sacred vocal music of the 16th century and an important collection of instrumental music, mainly for solo trumpets and strings. (See J. Berger in M.Q. (July 1951). For general collection see B.A.M.I. (1913) and Acta Mus., XIII, 30.

e. The Raimondo Ambrosini collection of works relating to Bologna was catalogued in B.A.M.I. (1913).

f. The Archiginnasio. See 'inventari', Vols. XXX & LXVI.

CASALE MONTEFERRATO. See P. Guerrini, 'I codici musicali dell' Archivio capitolare di Casale Monferrato' (Allesandria, 1933). [S.]

CESENA. Biblioteca Comunale (formerly Malatestina). This Library possesses some old Italian MS treatises and much sacred music. See Zazzeri's 'Sui codici e libri a stampa della biblioteca Malatestiana di Cesena' (Cesena, 1887). Librarian: Prof. A. Vantadori.

CESTONA. Biblioteca Comunale. Some liturgical MSS, including a 12th-century Antiphoner. [4.]

CIVIDALE. Biblioteca Capitolare. Liturgical MSS, with neumes; 14th-century mystery plays. See Coussemaker, 'Les Dames liturgiques' (Rennes, 1860). [4.]

CORTONA. Biblioteca del Comune e dell' Accademia di Cortona. Although there is no special section for music there is a fine copy of a 13th-century Codex containing lauds on the life and passion of Christ and the Madonna, with a transcript made in 1935 by N. Gazi. For a reproduction of this MS see L. Ferdinando, 'La lauda e i primordi della melodrama italiana' (Rome, 1945). There are also two 16th-century Codices containing French and Italian songs and motets. See G. Manerni, 'I manoscritti della libreria del Comune e dell' Accademia Etrusca di Cortona' (1884). Director: L. Pancrazi.

CRESPIANO. The famous Canal Library formerly here was acquired by St. Mark's, Venice, in 1927. For former contents see 'Biblioteca musicale del Prof. P. Canal in Crespano Veneto' (Bassano, 1885). [S.]

collection of Italian madrigals, etc., printed between 1565 and 1611. They are not included in Vogel's 'Italienische Vokalmusik'. See E. Filippini in 'Rivista delle biblioteche', V, 168. [4.]

FERRARA. Biblioteca Comunale. Printed vocal works by Italian composers of 16th to 18th centuries. See B.A.M.I. (1917).

FLORENCE. a. Biblioteca Nazionale Centrale (combined since 1861 with Magliabechiana and Palatina). Very important musical collections; the MSS include theoretical works of the 12th and 15th centuries; laudi of the 14th century; sacred and secular music from the 15th to the 18th centuries. The printed music is also extremely important. For bibliography see F. Fossi, 'Catalogus codicum saeculo XV. impressorum qui in publica bibliotheca Magliabechiana Florentinae adservantur, . . .' (Florence, 1793-95); F. Palermo, 'I manoscritti Palatini de Firenze ordinati ed esposti' (Florence, 1853-1868); A. Bartoli, 'I manoscritti italiani della Biblioteca Nazionale di Firenze . . . Sezione prima. Codici Magliabechiana', 4 vols. (Florence, 1879-85); 'I codici Panciatichiana: i manoscritti della Bib. Naz. . . Sez. Palatina' Rome, 1887 — Vol. VII of the 'Indici e cataloghi'; 'Illustrazioni di alcuni cimeli concernanti l' arte musicale in Firenze' (Florence, 1892); M.f.M. (1872); also the 'Inventari', Vols. VII-XIII (1897-1906); also 'Notes' (Sept. 1949 & Dec. 1950). Librarian: Signora Mondolfo.

b. Biblioteca Mediceo-Laurenziana. The liturgical MSS are important and include an Antiphoner of the 11th century; also a precious collection of 13th-century music described, with excerpts, in O.H.M., Vol. I. The Library also contains a portion of the Ashburnham MSS, among which are liturgies from the 10th to the 14th centuries, Greek hymnologia of the 12th and 14th centuries, treatises of the 14th-15th centuries, etc. See C. Paoli, 'I codici Ashburnhamiani della R. Biblioteca Mediceo-Laurenziana', Vol. I (Rome, 1887-89; Vol. VIII of the 'Indici e cataloghi'); 'Il lustrazioni di alcuni cimeli, . . .' (Florence, 1892). Also 'Notes' (Sept. 1949).

c. Bibliotheca Riccardiana. This Library possesses some treatises, besides MS and printed music of the 16th and 17th centuries, including a German organ book in tablature of the early 17th century. See 'Catalogus codicum manuscriptorum qui in bibliotheca Riccardiana Florentinae adservantur' (Leghorn, 1756) and R. Morpurgo, 'I manoscritti della R. Biblioteca Riccardiana', Vol. I (Rome, 1893-1900, Vol. XV of the 'Indici e cataloghi'); also 'Notes' (Sept. 1949). Librarian: Dr. I. M. Tondi.

d. Conservatorio di Musica "Luigi Cheru-bini". This collection has been assembled from the libraries of the R. Istituto Musicale, other old schools of music and the grand-ducal court. There is a great deal of German music as well as Italian. Among the early items are 15th- and 16th-century Codices and some rare theoretical and practical works of the 15th-17th centuries; also autographs of Monteverdi, A. Scarlatti, Rossini, Wagner, Cherubini, Donizetti and Verdi. Attached to the Conservatory is a Museum with a fine collection of musical instruments, including some of the Stradivari family, Amati, Arcangeli and Del Mela. See Barbure, 'Étude sur un manuscrit du 16^e siècle' (Brussels, 1882); 'Illustrazioni di alcuni cimeli, . . .' (Florence, 1892); also R. Gandolfi, 'Biblioteca del R. Istituto Musicale di Firenze' (Florence, 1901); also B.A.M.I. (1910-11); A. Damerini, 'Il R. Conservatorio di Musica "L. Cherubini" di Firenze' (Florence, 1941). For the Barbera MS see Ghisi in Acta Mus. (1948). Director: A. Damerini.

e. Biblioteca Marcelliana. Some printed works of the early 16th century. See Vogel, 'Weltliche Vokalmusik', Vol. II.

f. The celebrated Landau collection was sold in 1949-50.

GENOA. a. University Library. Some printed works and MS lute books, the most important of which is described by A. Neri in 'Giornale storico della letteratura italiana', Vol. VII. For catalogue see B.A.M.I. (1933). [4 & S.]

b. Biblioteca del Civico Liceo Musicale N. Paganini. Practical working library. Librarian: M. Pedemonte.

LEGHORN. Biblioteca Comunale. Collection of 18th-century librettos. [4.]

LORETO. See G. Tebaldini, 'L' Archivio musicale della Capella Lauretana. Catalogo storico-critico' (Loreto, 1922).

LUCCA. a. Biblioteca Governativa. About 45 MSS, ranging from the 11th to the 15th centuries, are kept in this Library. They are mostly liturgical, but include the 'Trattati musicali' of Prosdócimo, the 'De Musica' of Boethius, etc. The printed works range from the 15th to the 18th centuries. There is an accurate catalogue in MS, drawn up in 1909 by Prof. R. Baralli, which can be consulted in the Library. Director: E. A. Moneti.

b. Biblioteca Palatina. Now at Parma (q.v.).

MILAN. For general notes on the libraries of Milan, see 'Le biblioteche milanesi' (1944); also 'Notes' (Sept. 1949).

a. Biblioteca Ambrosiana. Liturgical MSS of the 10th-13th centuries; printed works, mostly sacred, by Italian composers of the late 16th and early 17th centuries; autographs of Gafurio, C. de Rore, Zarlino, etc. See B.A.M.I. (1910-11); also 'Notes' (Sept. 1949).

b. Conservatorio della Musica G. Verdi. There is a very large Library in this institution, to which additions are made continually by the deposit of copyright items. It is rich in printed sacred vocal music of the 16th centuries and also possesses autographs of Durante, Leo, Paisiello, Zingarelli, Donizetti, Bellini, Rossini, etc. In 1889 the large collection of G. A. Nosedà was deposited there. See E. de Guarinoni, 'Indice generali dell' Archivio Musicale Nosedà . . . con . . . alcuni cenni intorno . . . alla biblioteca de R. Conservatorio di Musica di Milano' (Milan, 1897).

c. Biblioteca Nazionale Braidense. This Library contains valuable liturgical MSS of the 12th-16th centuries, some printed theoretical works and some lute books in tablature. Two important acquisitions have been made since 1938: the Library of liturgical music formerly belonging to the Duchy of Parma, which contains a few MSS, and some printed books relating to music; also a unique copy of the Petrucci edition of Franciscus Bossensis, 'Tenor e contrabassi intabulati col sopran in canto figurato per cantar e sonar col lauto', Bk. ii (1511). See F. Carta, 'Codici corali e libri a stampa miniati della Biblioteca Nazionale di Milano, Catalogo descrittivo' (Rome, 1891 — Vol. XIII of the 'Indici e cataloghi'); also 'La biblioteca liturgica dei Duchi di Parma' (Milan & Rome, 1934). Director: Dr. M. S. Buonanno.

d. Archivio del Duomo. Valuable collection of sacred music, comprising MSS of the 15th-18th centuries, and a few rare printed works of the 16th and 17th centuries. See 'Elenco dei maestri di musica le cui composizioni si conservano nell' archivio della cappella del duomo di Milano' — App. iii, to Vol. II of 'Annali della fabbrica del duomo di Milano' (Milan, 1877-85); also Acta Mus., Vol. III (1931); also J.M.W. (1949-50), p. 313; also 'Notes' (Sept. 1949).

e. La Scala Theatre. The theatrical museum attached to this opera-house is very rich in material relating to theatrical and musical history, including a large number of autographs. [S.]

f. It is understood that the private library of Messrs. Ricordi has suffered severely from fire.

MODENA. a. Biblioteca Estense. The musical collections, both MS and printed, are important. The MSS include valuable compositions of the 15th century, in which Dunstable and his contemporaries are unusually well represented. There is also a very rich collection of MSS by Stradella, Scarlatti, etc., and many 18th-century operas and oratorios, including works by Mozart. The printed works are almost all Italian and French, and date from the 16th to the 18th centuries. See

V. Finzi, 'Bibliografia delle stampe musicali della R. Biblioteca Estense' in 'Rivista delle biblioteche', III, IV & V, containing careful descriptions of 321 works, with a good index. The Stradella collection is described in A. Catelani's 'Delle opere di A. Stradella esistenti nell' archivio musicale della R. Biblioteca Palatina di Modena . . .' (Modena, 1866); for the whole Library see P. Lodi, in B.A.M.I. (1916-24). A more recent inventory of the music library of Francis I. d' Este appeared in 'La Bibliofilia' (Nov.-Dec. 1936). Director: G. Stendardo.

b. Cathedral Library. See A. Dondi, 'Notizie storiche . . . del Duomo di Modena' (Modena, 1896); also 'Notes' (Sept. 1949 & Dec. 1950).

MONTE CASSINO. Although the monastery buildings were destroyed during the second world war, the Library stocks are reported to have survived, though inaccessible at present. 'The pre-war collection was rich in liturgical MSS and treatises; and the splendid Regnano collection of Neapolitan operas, etc. There were also works by Frescobaldi, and a vol. containing 15th-16th-century vocal compositions by Dufay, Okeghem, etc. See E. Dagnino, 'L' Archivio Musicale di Montecassino' in 'Casinensia' (Montecassino, 1929) and P. Ferretti, 'I MSS musicali gregoriani dell' Archivio di Montecassino' (ib., 1929).

MONZA. Biblioteca Capitolare. Valuable liturgical MSS of the 10th-14th centuries. [4.]

NAPLES. a. The Biblioteca Nazionale possesses some liturgical MSS of the 13th-17th centuries, some Byzantine hymns of the 13th and 15th centuries, and a little printed vocal music of the 16th and 17th centuries. See 'Notes' (Sept. 1949).

b. Biblioteca Lucchesi-Palli. This Library of some 26,000 vols. illustrative of theatrical and operatic history, collected by Count Lucchesi-Palli, was made over by him to the town of Naples and is administered as an independent section of the Biblioteca Nazionale. Librarian: E. Nobile.

c. Conservatorio de Musica (C. di San Pietro a Maiella). The Library is important for its collection of MS Italian music, especially of the Neapolitan school of the 18th and 19th centuries. It includes autograph scores of operas by Leo, Pergolesi, Jommelli, Paisiello, Cimarosa, Piccinni and Vinci. The printed works date from 1550 to 1728 and include some rare sets of madrigals printed at Naples. There is also a good collection of librettos. Some account of the contents of the Library will be found in F. Florimo's 'La scuola musicale di Napoli e i suoi conservatorii' (Naples, 1882); also 'Indici di tutti i libri e spartiti di musica che si conservano nell' archivio del R. Conservatorio della Pietà de' Turchini' (Naples, 1801). A complete catalogue is in B.A.M.I. (1929-34). See also the catalogue of a special exhibition held in 1936: 'Mostra autografi musicali della scuola napoletana' (Naples, 1936).

d. The Oratory of St. Philip Neri. Important collection of church music, chiefly of 16th and 17th centuries. See B.A.M.I. (1918). [4.]

NOTO. Biblioteca Comunale. See Domenico Russo, 'Indici alfabetico delle opere e della raccolta musicale del Maestro P. Alfieri' (Noto, 1913). Librarian: Dom Russo.

NOVARA. Cathedral Archives. Sacred music mostly of late 17th-century date. [4.]

ORISTANO. Biblioteca del Seminario Vescovile Tridentino. See G. Pistani, 'Catalogi dei codici corali d' Oristano' (Lucca, 1911). [S.]

PADUA. a. Biblioteca Nazionale, incorporated in the Museo Civico; this possesses a few printed musical works of the 16th and 17th centuries. [4.]

b. University Library. This contains MS French and Italian songs of the 14th century; MS organ tablatures by Hasler, Sweelinck, etc.; some 15th-century Antiphoners; a little printed music of the 16th and 17th centuries. See 'Notes' (Sept. 1949). Chief Librarian: Bianca Saraceni Fantini.

c. Seminario Vescovile. The Library here possesses a small collection of theoretical and musical works of the 16th and 17th centuries. [4.]

d. Sant' Antonio. The Archives contain some rare printed music and autographs of Tartini. See G. Tebaldini, 'L' archivio musicale della Cappella Antoniana in Padova . . .' (Padua, 1895); also 'Notes' (1949-50).

PARMA. Istituto Musicale. The musical works formerly in the Biblioteca Palatina at Lucca are now preserved here and form what is known as the Biblioteca Palatina di Parma (Sezione Musicale). See 'Rivista delle Biblioteche', IV; also B.A.M.I. (1909-12), which includes works from other libraries at Parma. See also Milan, c. Biblioteca Nazionale Braidense, for the liturgical works formerly belonging to the Duchy of Parma. [4.]

PAVIA. The University Library possesses a number of early MS treatises, including a 14th-century 'De arte musica' at one time ascribed to St. Thomas Aquinas. There is also a 15th-century MS, containing a number of French and Italian songs, a 17th-century "explanation" of the theories of Guido d' Arezzo and a collection of 18th-century cantatas, including works by the elder Bononcini and A. Scarlatti. See L. de Machi and G. Bertolani, 'Inventario dei manoscritti della R. Biblioteca Universitaria di Pavia' (Milan, 1894); also B.A.M.I. (1932-35).

PERUGIA. Biblioteca Capitolare. Some liturgical MSS, including an Antiphoner of the 11th century. [4.]

PESARO. Biblioteca Oliveriana. For a 16th-century MS of this Library, containing songs and lute music, see A. Saviotti in 'Giornale storico della letteratura italiana', Vol. XIV. [4.]

PISA. The University Library. The music collections of the University have been catalogued by P. Pecchiai in B.A.M.I. (1932-1935); this catalogue also includes the archives of the Chiesa Nazionale dei Cavalieri di San Stefano, of the Cappella Musicale Primaziale (which includes many autograph compositions of G. C. M. Clari, chapelmaster 1736-54, and of his successor, G. G. Brunetti). A number of other smaller collections, both public and private, also appear in the same catalogue. Director: Dr. C. Pacchi.

PISTOIA. Cathedral Archives. Church music of the 16th-19th centuries, including works by the Pistoian composers F. and G. Gherardeschi. See B.A.M.I. (1936-37). [S.]

REGGIO EMILIA. Biblioteca Municipale. Printed music of the 16th-18th centuries. See B.A.M.I. (1931).

ROME. For bibliographies of the Rome libraries see J.M.W. (1949-50), p. 314.

a. Vatican Library. The music in this Library consists chiefly of liturgical and theoretical works. The former, both printed and MS, are especially valuable, and there are many MS treatises from the 10th to the 15th centuries. A collection of French troubadour songs (13th-14th centuries) and a MS, in the Urbino collection, containing vocal music of the 15th century by Dunstable, Binchois, Ciconia, etc., may be mentioned, but the contents of the Library can only be assessed by consulting the typewritten inventories maintained in the Library itself. The Barberini and Chigiana collections are now part of the Vatican Library. See 'Bibliotheca Apostolica Vaticana codicibus manuscriptis recensita' (Rome, 1885-); also H. Ehrensbürger, 'Libri bibliothecae Apostolicae Vaticanae manuscripti' (Freiburg i/B., 1897); H. Stevenson, 'Inventario dei libri stampati Palatino-Vaticano' (Rome, Vol. I, 1886-89; Vol. II, 1886-91); G. B. de Rossi, 'La biblioteca della Sede Apostolica ed i catalogi dei suoi manoscritti' (Rome, 1884); also 'Notes' (Sept. 1949 & Dec. 1950).

b. Archives of the Sistine Choir. For the valuable MSS preserved here see F. X. Haberl in M.f.M. Suppl. (1888); there is also a typewritten inventory in the Library.

c. Archives of St. Peter's. The music here includes an Antiphoner of the 14th century, and some important collections of vocal compositions of the 15th-16th centuries. See V.f.M. (1885 and 1887); also J. Wolf in 'Kirchenmusikalisches Jahrbuch' (1908). [4.]

d. Lateran Choir. The Archives contain MS and printed sacred music of the 16th and 17th centuries. [4.]

e. Santa Maria Maggiore. Some graduals of the 16th century. [4.]

f. Biblioteca Casanatense. The musical collections of Baini, the biographer of Palestrina, are preserved here. The Library contains liturgies of the 11th-14th centuries, MS treatises by Ugolino, a vol. of compositions by Okeghem, etc., and MS works by Scarlatti, Hasse and other 18th-century composers. The collection is also rich in printed works of the 16th and 17th centuries. See 'Notes' (1949-1950).

g. Accademia di S. Cecilia and Biblioteca di Conservatorio. The joint Libraries, housed together, are very rich in printed music and librettos, having about 30,000 of the latter alone. Constant accessions are received through the copyright laws. Among the rarer books are the 'Liber quindecim missarum' printed by A. de Montana (Rome, 1516), editions of masses by Agricola and Josquin printed by Petrucci (1504 & 1516) and the only complete copy known of Cavalieri's 'Rappresentazione' (Rome, 1600). Among the autographs is a score of Bellini's 'Norma'. The Library also includes some MS sacred music from Santa Maria in Trastevere and the collection of 18th-century church music known as the Fondo Mario. Many valuable purchases were made at the dispersal of the Borghese collections in 1892. See the catalogue, of theoretical works only, in B.A.M.I. (1912-1913); also 'Catalogo delle opere di musica . . . della Congregazione ed Accademia di S. Cecilia di Roma' (n.d.); also the 'Elenco delle opere musicali . . .' (Rome, 1896). Librarian of the Conservatory: Prof. N. Pirotta; of the Academy: Signorina E. Zanetti.

h. Biblioteca Nazionale Centrale. Besides some liturgical music of the 15th-17th centuries this Library contains a few MSS of the 16th-19th centuries, including works by Palestrina, Animuccia, Anerio, Santini and A. Scarlatti. There is a hand-written but up-to-date catalogue in the Library. Director: N. V. Santovito.

i. The Rolandi collection of 30,000 librettos, vocal scores, etc., is one of the largest in the world. It is a private collection assembled by its owner, the gynaecologist, Dr. Rolandi.

k. Biblioteca Vallicelliana. See 'Notes' (Sept. 1949).

l. Biblioteca Corsiniana. See V. Raeli in Riv. Mus. It., Vols. XXV-XXVII (1918-20); also 'Notes' (Sept. 1949).

SIENA. a. Biblioteca Comunale degli Intronati. This Library, founded in 1758 by S. Bandini, contains a collection of musical works, printed and MS, among the former being a few 16th- and 17th-century madrigals; the MSS include a 15th-century vol. containing treatises by J. de Muris, Marchetto of Padua, etc., a collection of French songs of the 15th century and a very large collection of 16,000 MSS of sacred music of the 18th and 19th centuries. The music is catalogued under the heading 'Belle arti' in L. Ilari's 'Indice per materie della biblioteca comunale di Siena' (Siena, 1844-48); the French songs are described by L. Passy in 'Bibliothèque de l'École de Chartres', Vol. V, ser. iv (Paris, 1859); also in Mus. T. (Nov. 1886). Librarian: F. Jacometti.

b. Cathedral Archives. Important collection of old Italian religious music.

c. Biblioteca Accademia Chigiana. Practical working library, for teaching, etc.

TRENT. Castello del Buon Consiglio. Six of the famous 'Trient Codices' are preserved here (the seventh being kept in the Biblioteca del Duomo). There is yet another late 15th-century MS in the Biblioteca Comunale. See 'Notes' (Sept. 1949); also D.T.O., Vols. VII; XI, i; XIX, i; XXVII, i; XXXI; XL.

TREVISO. The Chapter Library of the Cathedral contains some MSS of 16th-17th century sacred music, but its greatest treasure is a copy of the 'Odhecaton' printed by Petrucci in 1501.

TURIN. a. Biblioteca Nazionale. The fire of Jan. 1904, which destroyed so many priceless treasures in this Library, and the bombing which greatly damaged it in the second world war, fortunately spared the musical collections. These include a considerable number of printed madrigals of the 16th century and a valuable series of ballets performed at the court of Savoy between 1645 and 1660. Since the early part of the 20th century the Library has been greatly enriched by the acquisition of the collections of Mauro Foà and Renzo Giordano, which contain, among other treasures, the autographs of over 200 works by Vivaldi, including the scores of 12 operas, as well as many works by Stradella. For catalogues see: 'Rivista delle biblioteche', IX, also published as part of the 'Esposizione Nazionale di Torino' catalogue of 1898; 'Manoscritti e libri a stampa musicali esposti della Biblioteca Nazionale di Torino' (Florence, 1898); also L. A. Villanis in 'Atti del Congresso Internazionale di Scienze Storiche', Vol. VIII (Rome, 1905); also B.A.M.I. (1928). For the Giordano collection see A. Gentili, 'La raccolta di antiche musiche "Renzo Giordano" alla Biblioteca Nazionale di Torino' in 'Accademie e biblioteche d'Italia', Vol. IX (1930). For the Foà collection see A. Gentili, 'La raccolta Mauro Foà nella Bib. Naz. di Torino' in Riv. Mus. It., Vol. XXXIV (1927). Also 'Notes' (Sept. 1949). Director: Luisa Nofri.

b. Biblioteca Civica. See 'Biblioteca Civica di Torino: Cataloghi, sezione teatrale' (Turin, 1913).

c. Cathedral Archives. Sacred vocal music of the 16th-18th centuries. [4.]

d. Museo Civico. Said to contain some liturgical MSS of the 17th and 18th centuries, but there is no confirmation of this statement from Grove [4]. Director: Dr. V. Viale.

URBINO. University Library. The only musical work here appears to be an imperfect copy of Cavalieri's 'Rappresentazione' (Rome, 1600). Librarian: Dr. L. Moranti.

VENICE. a. The Library of St. Mark's (known as the Marciana and now transferred to the Zecca Palace) is one of the finest collections in Italy, especially since 1927, when it acquired the collection of Pietro Canal (d. 1883), formerly at Crespano; it also contains the Contarini collection, which is very rich in operas, some autograph, of the early Venetian school. The MSS now include works by Marcello, the Scarlatti (including the 13 vols. of harpsichord sonatas), Cavalli (27 operas), Galuppi (23 MSS), Pérez, Mysliveček, Graun, Sarti, Monteverdi, Lotti, Haydn, etc. The printed works are rich in partbooks of madrigals, chiefly in Venetian editions, by most of the famous continental madrigal composers. There are also many cantatas, arias, songs, etc., in both printed and MS copies. For catalogues see T. Wiel, 'I codici musicali Contarini del secolo XVII nella R. Bibl. di S. Marco' (Venice, 1888); for the Canal Collection see 'Bibl. Mus. del Prof. P. Canal in Crespano Veneto' (Bassano, 1885); also L. Ferrari, 'La collezione musicale Canal alla Marciana di Venezia' (Venice, 1928). For post-war conditions see 'Notes' (1949-50). Director: P. Zorzanello.

b. Conservatorio Musicale "Benedetto Marcello". This institution now houses the considerable collection of music formerly in the Museo Correr, consisting chiefly of MS compositions of the later Venetian school. There are many autographs of B. Furlanetto, as well as church music, operas, etc., by Morlacchi, Bernasconi, Perotti, Pergolesi, Jommelli, Mayer, Bertoni and others. In 1881 the collection of Count Leopardo Martinengo, consisting chiefly of detached vocal and instrumental pieces, was added to the collection. See the catalogue in B.A.M.I. (1913-14); also 'Notes' (1949). Director: G. F. Malipiero.

c. Biblioteca Querini-Stampaglia. This Library contains vocal music of the late 17th century, chiefly in MS. See B.A.M.I. (1914); also 'Notes' (Sept. 1949).

VERONA. a. Biblioteca Capitolare. The Library building was destroyed during the second world war, but the stocks were saved, although not generally accessible. They contained liturgical MSS, including an 11th-century troper, a missal of the 13th century and vocal music of the 16th and 17th centuries, including a vol. of 19 masses by Lassus. See G. B. C. Giuliani, 'La Capitolare Biblioteca di Verona', pt. I, bks. i-ii (Verona, 1888). See also T.V.N.M., Vol. XIV, pt. iii (1935). Librarian: G. Turrini.

b. Biblioteca Comunale. This Library contains a little printed and MS music, mostly of the 16th-19th centuries. See G. Biadego, 'Storia della Biblioteca Comunale di Verona . . .' (Verona, 1892); also 'Catalogo descrittivo dei manoscritti della Bib. Com. di Verona' (Verona, 1892). [4.]

c. The Società Accademia Filarmonica, founded in 1543, possesses many scarce works acquired during the first century of its existence, including a fine collection of madrigal part-books. See G. Turrini in B.A.M.I. (1935). [4.]

VICENZA. Biblioteca Comunale Bertoliana. Some printed works, theoretical and practical, of the 16th-17th centuries. See B.A.M.I. (1923). [4.]

LUXEMBURG

LUXEMBURG. Bibliothèque Nationale. For some early printed works see A. Namur, 'Catalogue des éditions incunables de la Bibliothèque de l'Athénée' (Brussels, 1865).

NORWAY

BERGEN. Public Library. There is a separate Music Department of about 25,000 vols. and pieces. Grieg's collection of music, including many of his autographs, is also housed here. Librarian-in-Chief: S. Grun-deven.

OSLO. Norsk Musiksammling. This collection was founded in 1927 and forms part of the University Library. It possesses a large collection of printed music and music literature, and is the national deposit of Norwegian printed music. There are about 10,000 Norwegian and 60,000 foreign works at present. In addition the Library contains some 3000 MSS comprising autographs of most Norwegian composers and a large collection of Norwegian folk music. Librarian: O. Gauksstad.

POLAND

CRACOW. For general details of pre-war Cracow libraries see A. Chybiński, 'Die Musikbestände der Krakauer Bibliotheken von 1500-1650' (S.I.M.G., 1911-12).

a. The University Library (Biblioteka Jagiellonska). This Library possesses about 10,000 items of musical interest, the MS Department containing several autographs of Polish composers. See W. Wislocki, 'Catalogus codicum manuseriptorum Bibliothecae Universitatis Jagellonicae Cracoviensis' (1877-1881) and the same author, 'Incunabula typographica Bibliothecae Universitatis Jagellonicae Cracoviensis' (1900), issued as Vol. III of 'Munera Saecularia Universitatis Cracoviensis'; also 3 instalments of the illustrated catalogue by J. Reiss of 15th-16th-century music have been published (Cracow, 1924-34); also W. Hordyński in 'Przegląd Biblioteczny', pt. iii (1937). Director: Prof. A. Birkenmajer.

b. The Library of the Praemonstratensian Monastery of Cracow contains a small collection of music, chiefly works of the late 16th and 17th centuries, also some works by Polish composers of various periods.

GDANSK (formerly Danzig). Municipal Library. Only 685 vols., about two-thirds of the original number, have survived the second world war. O. Gunther in his 'Katalog der Handschriften der Danziger Stadtbibliothek', Vol. IV (Danzig, 1911), gave a complete list of the original collection, which was principally of works of the second half of the 16th century. The surviving MSS, however, are mostly of 18th-century church music (from the Church of St. Catharine) and instrumental music, with a little 19th-century German organ music. Librarian: Dr. Marian Pelczar.

LEGNICA (formerly Liegnitz). Bibliotheca Rudolphina. This collection, formerly in the Ritter-Akademie, was completely destroyed during the second world war. For former contents see M.f.M. (Suppl., 1886).

WARSAW. For the present state of the former music libraries see M. Prokopiewicz in 'Przegląd Biblioteczny' (1952), pp. 40-53.

WROCLAW (formerly Breslau). a. University Library. This collection now includes that of the former Town Library, especially the printed works of the 16th to 17th centuries, which are still largely extant, but the MSS have been lost. The former University Library collection was mostly destroyed; but the collection transferred from the Brieg Gymnasium [4, p. 159] is still intact. See O. Bohn, 'Bibliographie der Musik-Druckwerke bis 1700, welche in der (a) Stadtbibliothek, (b) der Bibliothek des Academischen Instituts für Kirchenmusik, und (c) der . . . Universitäts-Bibliothek zu Breslau aufbewahrt sind' (Berlin, 1883). Also E. Bohn, 'Die musikalischen Handschriften des 16. und 17. Jahrhunderts in der Stadtbibliothek zu Breslau' (Breslau, 1890), and E. Kirsch, 'Die Bibliothek des Musikalischen Instituts bei der Universität Breslau' (Berlin, 1922).

b. Akademisches Institut für Kirchenmusik (Chapter Library). This collection is still practically intact.

PORTUGAL

For a note on the Library of King John IV at Lisbon, destroyed in the earthquake of 1755, see JOHN IV.

COIMBRA. University Library. See A. Kastner, 'Inventário dos inéditos e impressos musicais', fasc. i (Coimbra, 1937).

EVORA. a. The Cathedral Archives contain some MSS and early printed editions of masses and motets of the late 16th and early 17th centuries, including works by Navarro (1590), Aguilera (1618) and Magalhães (1636). Keeper of the Archives: Father J. A. Alegira.

b. Biblioteca Publica. Some sacred music of the 16th–18th centuries. [4.]

LISBON. a. Biblioteca da Ajuda. Some 30 MS scores of operas by Jommelli, granted a pension by King Joseph (1750–77) on condition of sending copies of all his works; Portuguese operas by A. d'Almeida; 9 Italian operas by M. Portugal; operas and oratorios by Lima. There is also a copy of Correia de Araujo, 'Libro de tientos' (1626).

b. Cathedral. A quantity of Portuguese church music including MSS of John IV ('Adjuva nos', 4 v.).

c. Biblioteca Nacional. MSS of Leite, M. Portugal, Rebello; printed copy (incomplete) of C. de Araujo (1626). [4.]

MAFRA. Biblioteca Publica. Church music for men's voices by M. Portugal. [4.]

RUMANIA

BRASOU (formerly Kronstadt). The Honterus Gymnasium. A few MSS, including some keyboard pieces in tablature, compiled by D. Croner, of Kronstadt (Brasou), c. 1681–1682, and of which the second half contains a humble forerunner of the "48". See E. H. Müller, 'Die Musiksammlung der Bibliothek zu Kronstadt' (1930). [S.]

SIBIU. The Superintendial Library possessed, before the war, a unique copy of J. Honterus, 'Odae cum harmoniis' (1562). [S.]

SCOTLAND. (See Great Britain)

SPAIN

It is still very difficult to get accurate information about most Spanish libraries, and to what extent their stocks were destroyed or dispersed during the Civil War.

AVILA. a. The Cathedral. MSS and printed sacred music of the 16th century onwards, including Morales, Guerrero, etc. [4.]

b. Monastery of Santa Ana. MS part-books of the 16th century of incomplete works by Guerrero and Ribera. Printed music includes Guerrero, motets (completing those in the Cathedral); Lassus (1578); Victoria (1572). [4.]

BARCELONA. a. Bibl. Musical de la Diputació. MS Spanish madrigals, music to Calderón's 'Jardín de Falerina'. Printed music of 16th century, mostly Spanish vocal music. Catalogue in 2 vols. by F. Pedrell (Barcelona, 1908–9). [4.]

b. Orfeó Català. 15th-century MS of Peñalosa and others; sacred music by Morales. [4.]

c. University Library. Printed works in tablature: E. de Vaderrabano (1547); Santa María (1565); Cabezon (1578). [4.]

d. The collection of the late F. Pedrell was catalogued by H. Anglès, 'Catàleg dels Manuscrits Musicals de la Col·lecció Pedrell' (Barcelona, 1920).

CÓRDOBA. Cathedral. Printed sacred music by Guerrero and Morales, and a quantity of Spanish polyphonic music in MS partbooks. [4.]

EL ESCURIAL. a. The Monastery Library. Some valuable old MSS are kept in this Library, including three 12th-century breviaries; 12th–13th century missals; the famous 'Cantigas de Alfonso X' dating from the 13th century; two French MSS of 15th-century songs, the second containing an English work a 3, 'Princesse of youth', and the discantus of an unidentified piece by Dunstable, 'Durer ne puis'. Among the printed books are theoretical works of Censorini (1510), J. Bermudo (1550), Tomás de Santa María (1565), Salinas and Gafurio; while the practical music includes the works of the vihuelistas Mudarro, Pisador, Fuenllana and Cabezon, and the interesting 'Llave de la modulación' by Soler (Madrid, 1762). Librarian: P. S. Rubio.

b. The Monastery Chapel Music Archives. These contain early MS choirbooks of music by Morales, Guerrero, Victoria and Palestrina, together with much vocal and organ music of the 17th and 18th centuries, including the Soler music for organ and strings. Music Director: P. S. Rubio.

MADRID. a. Biblioteca Nacional. The splendid collections of music in this Library are now being displayed in a printed catalogue. See H. Anglès and J. Subirá, 'Catálogo Musical de la Biblioteca Nacional de Madrid', 2 vols. (I.—'Manuscritos', Barcelona, 1946; II.—'Impresos, libros litúrgicos y teóricos', Barcelona, 1949).

b. Alba Collection. For the most interesting musical works collected by the Dukes of Alba see J. Subirá, 'La música en la casa de Alba' (Madrid, 1927).

c. Biblioteca Medinaceli. This Library contains among its MSS collections of Spanish madrigals of c. 1580 by R. Cevallos, D. Garzón, F. and P. Guerrero, Navarro and others; motets by C. de Rore and Morales; some parts of an Italian comic opera. The printed music includes a copy of the 'Odhecaton' of Petrucci (1504) and several rare Spanish works. See J. B. Trend, 'Catalogue of the Music in the Biblioteca Medinaceli, Madrid' (New York, 1927).

d. Biblioteca Municipal. 18th-century tonadillas and incidental music to Spanish plays, from the Teatro de la Cruz and Teatro Principe. Also the Sbarbi collection of 18th-century church music; Aránaz, Doyagüe and Soler. Catalogue (Madrid, 1902). [4.]

e. In the Library of the former Royal Palace (Biblioteca Real) is a 15th-century 'Cancionero del Palacio' published in 1890 by Barbieri. [4.]

MÁLAGA. Cathedral. MSS of Morales, 'Tu es Petrus', a 5; Guerrero, psalms, hymns and motets. Printed copy of Aguilera's 'Magnificat' (1618). [4.]

MONTSERRAT near BARCELONA. This monastery, founded in the 10th century, possesses many MSS, including 12th-century liturgical music, pieces by P. de La Rue, Clemens non Papa, etc.; a first-rate collection of Spanish music from the 16th to the 19th centuries. The printed music includes first editions of Haydn and a good collection of religious and organ music. The monks of Montserrat under Dom G. Suñol have edited the liturgical books of the Church of Milan, and the results of their labours may be seen in the monastery and in the publications 'Antiphonale missarum' (1935), 'Liber vespalis' (1939) and 'Missa sacra española', fasc. x (1947). For other music see various accounts in the magazine 'Música sacra española' (1941-47). Keeper of the Archives: A. Olivar.

SANTIAGO. a. Cathedral. Codex Calixti II (1120-40), including Pilgrims' songs. [4.]

b. University Library. Liber Ferdinandi Regis (1055), Mozarabic MS. [4.]

SEVILLE. It is not known how much of the music formerly at Seville survived the ordeal of the Civil War.

a. Cathedral (Bibl. del Coro). MSS of church music by Lobo, Morales, Guerrero, Verdelot, Willaert, Josquin. Printed music by Lobo, Aguilera, etc.

b. Chapter Library (Bibl. Columbina, founded by Ferdinand Columbus). 15th-century MSS of secular songs, etc., rare printed works by Petrucci ('Frottole' of 1514, the 'Odhecaton', etc.), with other early 16th-century printed works bought by the son of the discoverer of America. Also a set of Guerrero motets of 1597. The published catalogue of printed books includes the music. [4.]

TOLEDO. a. Public Library. The MSS include the treatise by Ferrand Estevan, 'Reglas de canto plano y de contrapunto' (1410), a 15th-century missal, three 16th-century antiphoners, a 'Liber Vesparium' (Rome, 1634) and several 18th-century compositions for the Mozarabic rite, with a treatise by J. Romero. Librarian: M. M. Cañero.

b. The Cathedral. The Mozarabic MSS are described by Riano in his book 'Early Spanish Music'. The polyphonic MSS consist of a splendid collection of Morales, in 16th-century illuminated choirbooks, and works by Escobedo, F. and P. Guerrero, A. Lobos, Navarro, Victoria and Josquin. The printed works include masses by Guerrero (1582) and Rogier (1598); a vol. of Victoria motets (1585). Librarian: Dr. D. J. F. Rivera.

VALENCIA. a. Cathedral. MSS of Guerrero, Pérez and Victoria. [4.]

b. Colegio del Patriarca. MSS part-books of Guerrero, Ribera, Robledo, Navarro, Clemens non Papa, Comes, Lobo, Morales, Vecchi, etc. Printed sacred works by Guerrero, Lobo and Victoria; also the 'Canciones' of Guerrero (1589). See Catalogues, by V. Ripollés (1925) and Anglès & Pujol (Barcelona, 1926). [4.]

Norlind, 'Vor 1700 gedruckte Musikalien in den schwedischen Bibliotheken' (S.I.M.G., 1907-8).

LUND. The University Library. The four main music collections in this Library, apart from a general working collection, are the Baron Barnekow Bequest of 70 vols., mostly printed instrumental music of the 18th century; the J. H. Engelhart Bequest of about 750 MSS of the early 18th century, many of which are anonymous; the F. Kraus collection of 462 vols., mostly MSS of the late 17th and early 18th centuries; the E. M. Wenster Bequest of about 600 theoretical works, MSS and printed music of the 18th century.

NORRKÖPING. The Finspong Library, which passed into the possession of the town in 1904, includes Swedish liturgies of the 16th-18th centuries, some theoretical works, Italian madrigals and 17th-century French songs. See B. Lundstedt, 'Catalogue de la Bibliothèque de Finspong' (Stockholm, 1883). [4.]

STOCKHOLM. a. Kungliga Musikaliska Akademi. The Library of this institution, founded in 1771, contains 500,000 items of music, 20,000 MSS, 20,000 books and 15,000 letters and is the only specialist library of its kind in Sweden. It is especially rich in MS and printed music of the 18th century. The autographs include works or sketches for works by Lully, Haydn, Albrechtsberger, Mozart, Beethoven, Rossini, Weber, Liszt, Grieg, Tchaikovsky and Dukas, as well as most of the leading Swedish composers. Among the interesting collections which are to be found here are the J. F. Hallardt Collection, presented in 1795, containing 18th-century MSS and first editions representing the Mannheim and Italian schools, and 17th-18th-century books on music; the J. Mazer Bequest, presented in 1847, contains 16th- and 17th-century vocal music and 18th-century symphonies, etc., among some 2400 vols.; the P. A. Fouché d'Otrante Collection, presented in 1874, contains 16th- and 17th-century vocal works. There are two interesting collections of pianoforte scores formerly belonging to Adelina Patti and Christine Nilsson; and in 1924 the C. O. Boije av Gennas collection of guitar music was presented to the Library. See C. F. Hennerberg, 'Kungl. Musikaliska Akademiens Bibliotek' in 'Nordisk Tidskrift för bok- och Biblioteksväsen' (1927).

b. The Royal Library (Kungliga Biblioteket). The Royal Library contains some 25,000 items relating to music; the actual music is largely by Swedish composers. Librarian: E. Gundström.

c. The Royal Theatre Library is rich in music by 18th-century composers. [4.]

UPPSALA. The University Library. The printed music in this Library includes many German, French and Italian works of the 16th and 17th centuries. Among the MSS, chiefly of the 17th and 18th centuries, is the Duben collection with several autographs of Buxtehude. See M.f.M. (1889); 'La Bibliofilia' (1909-10); 'Catalogus Librorum impressorum Bibliothecae Regiae Academiae Upsaliensis' (Uppsala, 1814); R. Mitjana and A. Davidsson, 'Catalogue critique et descriptif des imprimés de musique des XVI^e et XVII^e siècles conservé à la Bibliothèque de l'Université Royale d'Uppsala', Vols. I-III (Uppsala, 1911-51). Librarian: T. Kleberg.

SWITZERLAND

BASEL. a. The University Library. This contains the most important music collections in Switzerland. Besides a few early printed books it is chiefly notable for a large collection of MS parts of symphonies and chamber music by some of the lesser-known 18th-century composers. The early music includes MS organ tablatures by J. Buchner and H. Kotter, with A. Gabrieli's scarce 'Ricercari' (Venice, 1595). The music section also houses the Library of the Swiss Society for Musical Research (established 1902). See J. Richter, 'Katalog der Musik-Sammlung auf der Universitätsbibliothek in Basel', in M.f.M. Suppl. (1892); also pt. i of the 'Katalog der Schweizerischen Musikbibliothek. Hg. von der Verwaltung der Öffentlichen Bibliothek der Universität Basel' (Basel, 1906); E. Refardt, 'Verzeichnisse der Aufsätze zur Musik in den nichtmusikalischen Zeitschriften der Universitätsbibliothek Basel' (Leipzig, 1925); H. Zehnter, 'Die Musikabteilung der Basler Universitätsbibliothek' in 'Publikationen der Vereinigung Schweizerischer Bibliotheken, No. 20' (Berne, 1945). Principal Librarian: Dr. K. Schwarber.

b. Musikwissenschaftliches Seminar. Practical working collection. Director: Dr. J. Handschin.

c. Conservatorium und Schola Cantorum Basiliensis. Practical working collection.

BERNE. a. Stadtbibliothek. This Library possesses some early liturgical MSS and treatises, many containing music in neumes. See H. Hagen, 'Catalogus codicum Bernensium (Bibliotheca Bongarsiana)' (Berne, 1875). Principal Librarian: Dr. H. Strahm.

b. Landesbibliothek Schweiz. This has a good music section, mainly of practical music and books.

c. The Conservatory has an extensive library; no details are known of any rare works.

EINSIEDELN. Stiftsbibliothek (Library of the Benedictine Monastery). This contains important treatises of the 10th-15th centuries and a J. C. Bach collection of which there is a MS catalogue. The Library also contains the valuable and extensive collection of musical treatises brought together by R. L. de Pearsall and presented to the Library by his heirs. On the important 12th-century Hymnal preserved here see: B. Eberl, 'Das älteste alemannische Hymnar mit Noten' (Einsiedeln, 1931); also G. Meier 'Catalogus codicum manuscriptorum qui in Bibliotheca Monasterii Einsidensis O.S.B. servantur', Vol. I (Einsiedeln, 1899), Vol. II in MS only; and A. Schubiger, 'Die Sängerschule St. Gallens vom 8. bis 12. Jahrhundert' (Einsiedeln, 1858); also the same, 'Die Pflege des Kirchengesangs und der Kirchenmusik in der deutschen katholischen Schweiz' (Einsiedeln, 1873). Principal Librarian: P. P. Vetter.

FRAUENFELD. Kantonsbibliothek. Some 16th- and 17th-century printed works. [4.]

GENÈVE. a. Bibliothèque Publique et Universitaire. This Library owns some missals of the 10th, 14th and 15th centuries, and a small general collection of printed theoretical and practical works, including a few early treatises, as well as some 18th-century French operas. The music section has lately been enriched by the gift of the important library of R. Aloys Mooser, consisting of theoretical and practical works by Italian and French musicians in Russia, and of Russian musicians, dating from the 16th to the 20th centuries. See J. Senebier, 'Catalogue raisonné des manuscrits conservé dans la Bibliothèque de la Ville et République de Genève' (Geneva, 1779) and 'Catalogue de la Bibliothèque Publique de Genève', Vol. III (1879), Vol. V (1885), Vol. VIII (1899). Director: H. de La Rue.

b. The Conservatory, the Grand Theatre and Radio Geneva also have extensive music libraries.

LAUSANNE. a. Bibliothèque du Conservatoire. Practical working library. See J.M.W. (1949-50), p. 310.

b. The private library of A. van Hoboken is now at Lausanne. It contains many first and early editions of the works of the great masters, especially Haydn, with a large number of British editions. It was formerly in Vienna; the Hoboken photostat collection is still in the National Library there. [4 & S.]

c. The private library of Alfred Cortot is also at Lausanne, having been formerly in Paris; it is said to be one of the finest libraries ever brought together by a private collector. It is general in character, but especially rich in theoretical works and instrumental music. See 'Bibliothèque Alfred Cortot', pt. i, 'Théorie de la musique' (Paris, 1936).

ST. GALL. Stiftsbibliothek (Library of the former Benedictine Abbey). The large collection of magnificent liturgical MSS, dating from the 9th to the 18th centuries, is very important for the study of European church music and the development of notation. The Irish, Anglo-Saxon, German and Roman elements in liturgy and music are all recorded here. The compositions, books and theoretical treatises by the monks of the 9th and 10th centuries include Moengal, Notker ('Sequences'), Tutilo ('Tropes'), Ratpot ('Hymns') and many others. Among the most important MSS are a 9th-century Gregorian antiphoner; many of Notker's compositions; 10th-century missals; 16th-century song-books, secular and sacred, collected and written by the organist Sicher and the humanist Tschudi; 2 MS vols. containing compositions (200 a 4) by Manfredus Barberinus Lupus, Correggio (1562); the treatise 'Melopoiae' of Tritonius (Augsburg, 1507). For Catalogues see G. Scherrer, 'Verzeichnis der Handschriften der Stiftsbibliothek St. Gallen' (Hall, 1875) and 'Verzeichnis der Incunabeln der Stiftsbibliothek St. Gallens' (St. Gall, 1880); E. Omlin, 'Die St. gallischen Tonarbuchstaben' (Regensburg, 1934); O. Marxer, 'Zur spätmittelalterlichen Choralpflege St. Gallens' (St. Gall, 1908); also W. R. Nef, 'Der St. Galler Organist F. Sicher und seine Orgeltabulatur' in the 'Schweizerisches Jahrbuch für Musikwissenschaft' (Basel, 1938). Librarian: J. Duft.

SCHAFFHAUSEN. Town Library. Small collection of works on musical history, theory, etc., with a few early treatises. See Fach, 'Katalog der Schaffhauser Stadtbibliothek', 2 vols. (Schaffhausen, 1903-5). [4.]

ZÜRICH. a. Zentralbibliothek. This Library was founded as the result of the amalgamation in 1916 of the Kantonsbibliothek with the Stadtbibliothek. The latter possessed a collection of music literature, and a Music Department was created. This contains a great many collected editions and publications; a rich collection of hymn-books and of Swiss song-books of the 19th and 20th centuries; many autographs of Swiss composers; among others, MSS of Haydn and of Kreutzer, many printed works by 18th-century composers. The MS Department possesses some liturgical MSS dating from the 10th to the 15th centuries, mostly from the famous Abbey of Rhernau; among these are a hundred fragments of neume notation, all available in photostats. There are also some valuable treatises on the organ and some 16th-century organ music. For printed catalogues see C. Mohlberg, 'Mittelalterliche Handschriften der Zentralbibliothek Zürich' (last ed., Zürich, 1949); there are MS catalogues available in the Library. See also M.f.M. (1891) for the organ treatises. Principal Librarian: Dr. L. Forrer; Chief of the Music Department: Dr. P. Sieber.

b. Bibliothek der Allgemeinen Musikgesellschaft Zürich. In 1812 two ancient Zürich musical societies, Auf dem Musiksaale and Zur deutschen Schule, were amalgamated, to become the Allgemeine Musikgesellschaft. Their libraries are now housed in the Zentralbibliothek under this name; they are especially rich in printed German and Italian instrumental music of the 17th and 18th centuries, but also have many collected editions and periodicals. The autographs include works by Kayser, Wagner, Goetz and Brahms, and letters of Schauensee, Nägeli, Kreutzer, Wagner and Bülow. For good summary of contents see P. Sieber, 'Die Bibliothek der

c. There is also a private collection of Beethoveniana made by H. C. Bodmer, including autographs, sketchbooks and about 275 letters. [S.]

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

BALTIMORE, MD. a. Enoch Pratt Free Library. This contains 8900 books on music, 9200 orchestral scores, 8500 pieces of sheet music, 1200 librettos and 3400 gramophone records. Additions to these figures are made at the rate of 500 items per year. The Library also contains extensive files of cuttings, pictures, pamphlets, programme notes, etc. Apart from the gramophone records already mentioned, which are for use in the sound-proof rooms within the Library, there are about 4000 additional disks for use in the Fine Arts Department on special machines equipped with earphones, and for borrowing. In 1948 some 60,000 borrowings were made for home use, and 6500 for use in the Fine Arts Department. Librarian: Emmerson Greenaway. Head of the Fine Arts Dept.: Gretta Smith.

b. Peabody Conservatory of Music. The Library of this institution contains about 3000 vols. of books and music. It is particularly strong in orchestral scores and textbooks on harmony. Several small collections have been absorbed. There is also a large reference section of gramophone records. Librarian: Nina C. Brown.

BEREA, OHIO. Baldwin-Wallace College. The Karl and Emilie Riemenschneider Memorial Bach Collection, presented to the Baldwin-Wallace College by the late Professor Albert Riemenschneider (1878-1950) in memory of his parents, and by his widow, Mrs. Selma Riemenschneider, is a collection of about 2850 books, pamphlets, published music and manuscripts by and about Johann Sebastian Bach and, to a minor extent, his sons, teachers and students. There are over 675 biographical and technical books and pamphlets concerning Bach, including a number of general bibliographical and technical books.

Among the few manuscripts the choicest is the Heinrich Nikolaus Gerber transcription of Book I of 'Das Wohltemperierte Clavier', dated 31 [sic] Nov. 1725, and copied under the eye of Bach from his own manuscript, dated 1722 (Schmieder, Nos. 846-869), while Gerber was a pupil of Bach's. There are also three holographs by Bach of the major portion of the "English" Suites, together with a few 19th-century transcripts of miscellaneous Bach material.

There are about 2000 separate music publications in the Bach Collection. The most important of these are the copies of works printed during Bach's own lifetime. Of the eighteen publications listed by Kinsky as appearing by 1752 there are copies of four in the collection. These are 'Klavierübung, Opus I' (Leipzig, 1731), 'Klavierübung [Teil 4]' (Nuremberg, 1735), 'Veränderungen über "Vom Himmel hoch" . . .' (Nuremberg, [1748]) and 'Die Kunst der Fuge', 2nd ed. (Leipzig, 1752). Besides these there are facsimile reproductions of three more: 'Klavierübung, Teil 3' (Leipzig, 1739), 'Sechs Choräle . . . auf einer Orgel' (Zella, Johann Georg Schübler, [1747]) and 'Musikalisches Opfer' (Leipzig, 1747).

Besides the special Bach Memorial Collection, Baldwin-Wallace College also has the nucleus of a practical working library for graduate research, including the three 'Denkmäler' series and the usual standard editions of the complete works of the great composers. The Bach collection, left uncatalogued at the time of Riemenschneider's death is now (1954) in process of being completely catalogued and made ready for active use as a research collection. A printed catalogue, edited by Edythe N. Backus, is in preparation and will be published by the Baldwin-Wallace College. Curator and cataloguer (ad interim) Edythe N. Backus.

BERKELEY, CAL. University of California. The Music Department possesses approx. 20,000 vols. of music and musical literature, including many collected works and a large collection of orchestral scores and parts, forming an adequate means for research from the 12th century to modern times. There is also a reference collection of about 10,000 gramophone records. In 1950 a large collection of 18th- and 19th-century opera scores (about 5000) was acquired. Chairman of Music Dept.: Albert I. Elkus. Music Librarian: Vincent H. Duckles.

BETHLEHEM, PHILADELPHIA. The Moravian Church here owned a most interesting collection of 18th-century music, not only for the church, but also symphonies, etc. See 'Church Music and Musical Life in Pennsylvania in the 18th Century', Vol. II (Philadelphia, 1927).

BOSTON, MASS. a. Public Library. The music collection contains about 53,000 vols. of music and musical literature, of which about 24,000 belong to the Allen A. Brown Reference Collection and the remainder to the general circulating collection. About 1000 vols. are added annually. In 1858 Joshua Bates, an early benefactor, presented the Kondelka Collection of theoretical works of the 15th-18th centuries. A survey by W. F. Apthorp, made after the foundation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, showed that the collection then lacked certain classical and other orchestral scores. This deficiency was remedied by Allen A. Brown, who in 1894 gave 6382 vols. to the Library. A catalogue of the collection has been published by the Trustees (1910-16). In 1924 Isabella Stewart Gardner endowed a fund as a memorial to B. J. Lang, long prominent in the musical life of Boston, and thus additions are continually made. Among the interesting works at present possessed by the Library are Caccini's 'Euridice' (1600), Seagar's 'Metrical Psalter', Tye's 'Acts of the Apostles' and Spohr's 'Alruna'. Early American works include the 'Bay Psalm Book' (1640), Flagg's 'Collection of Psalms' (1764), Billing's 'New England Psalter' (Paul Revere, 1770), Hopkinson's 'Seven Songs' (1788) and William Brown's 'Three Rondos' (1787).¹ The collections have been greatly enriched from time to time by gifts, notably those of Philip Hale (including his scrapbooks), Florence Rich King (organ music) and Nicholas Slonimsky (letters, etc.). Autograph MSS and letters include items by Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Wagner, Franck, Coleridge-Taylor, MacDowell and many other American composers. Also on exhibition are porcelains of the 'Cries of London' by G. Parnell, and an early American pianoforte (c. 1800). The Library is very much a centre of music rather than a mere collection. Concerts and exhibitions are organized by the Library authorities, and in connection with the programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra many eminent composers and conductors have lectured here. See Barbara Duncan, 'The Allen A. Brown Libraries' in 'Bulletin of the Public Library of the City of Boston' (Apr.-June 1922); Honor McCusker, 'Fifty Years of Music in Boston' in 'More Books' (1937); H. Leichtentritt, 'Music in Boston in the 'Nineties' also in 'More Books' (Dec. 1946); R. G. Appell, 'Landmarks of Music—Boston 1634-1924'. Chief of Music Dept.: Richard G. Appell.

b. Harvard. Musical Association. This Society, founded in 1837, and having no connection with the University, has a library of about 30,000 pieces of music and 2400 books. It is particularly rich in scores of the classical repertory and chamber music, the latter section including a remarkable collection of music for wind instruments. It has an excellent variety of Russian and other modern music. There are also over 1000 opera scores, some not easily found elsewhere, and some rare early publications. Librarian: Muriel French.

c. Handel and Haydn Society. The library contains some interesting early scores and sets of parts. See 'Notes' (Mar. 1948).

BRUNSWICK, MAINE. Bowdoin College. The Library specializes in collecting musical settings of Longfellow's poems, of which it now has about 1000. Librarian: K. J. Boyer.

BUFFALO, NEW YORK STATE. The Grosvenor Library has an interesting collection of American sheet music. See 'Notes' (Mar. 1948).

CAMBRIDGE, MASS. Harvard University. a. Harvard College Library. Harvard is not only the earliest American university (1636), but it was the first to establish a chair for music (in 1875), to which the American composer and organist John Knowles Paine was appointed. The Harvard College Library has a special musical collection of 25,000 volumes and pamphlets, and includes the collected works of the most prominent composers, full scores of a number of important operas and a fairly representative collection of treatises, biographies and criticism. In addition to the main collection the Library has on its folklore shelves an unusually complete set of folk music (all countries) and ballads and songs (especially English and American). The Library has also (not included in its special music collection) a fair collection of hymnology—supplemented by that contained in the departmental Theological Library. A special file of 90,000 sheet-music songs is worth noting. These are arranged alphabetically by titles and are for the most part American. A similar file of instrumental sheet music has been listed by composers. A series of 224 manuscript volumes contains the words of over 1500 Italian operas, sacred dramas and cantatas, which are uncatalogued. The musical manuscripts include five volumes of unpublished chamber music by Boccherini and autographs of Bellini, Haydn (part of the opera 'Armida'), J.-J. Rousseau, Gabriel Fauré, as well as J. K. Paine and other American composers. The average yearly growth of the collection is between 300 and 400 volumes. See H. Nathan in 'Notes' (Sept. 1948).

b. The Music Building. The reference library in this building has 5000 vols. of books and music and 4800 gramophone records.

c. Ishem Memorial Library. Established in 1936, this collection is devoted to organ, early keyboard and early vocal music. Its 650 vols. are supplemented by 175 bound vols. of photo-stats and an equal number of microfilms of MSS and rare early editions, and the whole forms a unique collection for the study of keyboard music before 1750.

² M.Q. (Jan. 1944).

CHAPEL HILL, N.C. University of North Carolina. The Music Library has a full-time music librarian and a half-time cataloguer, and contains about 4000 books on music, about 5100 vols. of music, 46 bound series of periodicals (subscriptions 31); 5000 items of uncatalogued sheet music, about 1500 parts for orchestra, band, etc., about 7000 gramophone records and 100 microfilms. Equipment includes 6 listening turntables, 4 audition rooms, study rooms with pianofortes and 3 microfilm readers. Notable special collections include the Southern Historical Collection, which contains a number of items of Confederate and other early printed music; the private library of William S. Newman, a member of the Music Faculty, which includes one of the world's most comprehensive collections of keyboard sonatas (about 3100 works by 720 composers) and a good collection of sonatas for other instruments, as well as source literature on the sonata; and the valuable collection of J. P. Schinhan, also a member of the Music Faculty, which contains recordings in the field of comparative musicology, such as North American Indian Music of the Pacific Coast, Chinese flute music, Haitian folksongs and North Carolinian folk music. The library is strong in foreign and American scholarly materials, both old and new, especially in bibliography, basic periodicals, year-books, commemorative editions, studies, contemporary theoretical treatises and collected works, etc. Conspicuous deficiencies are included on microfilm. The periodicals include the 'Allgemeine musikalische Zeitung'; Dehn's 'Cecilia', M.f.M. and the Proc. Mus. Ass., while among early editions are works by Fux, Zalmá, Meibom, L. Mozart, Quantz, Rameau, Burney, etc. About 1000 vols. are added annually. Head of the Department of Music: Glen Haydon.

CHARLOTTESVILLE, VA. University of Virginia. The Music Library has about 23,000 items, forming one of the most representative collections in the southern States. It includes general works, orchestral ensemble and vocal scores, pianoforte and vocal music, and about 2500 gramophone records. The Library also houses the Alexander McKay Smith Collection and a large collection of southern songs. Librarian: H. Clemons.

CHICAGO, ILL. a. Public Library. The music section was established in 1915 with the collaboration of the music critics of the Chicago city newspapers. Until 1949 it contained only scores, books on music forming part of the main library, but early in that year a completely independent Music Department was formed, equipped for reading as well as for lending purposes. In Jan. 1949 there were 4800 books on music, 12,000 bound vols. of music, 29,000 pieces of sheet music and 2600 gramophone records. The collection is chiefly of a popular nature, and the number of enrolled borrowers (10,250 in 1949) testifies to the success of its aims. Librarian: C. B. Roden.

b. The Newberry Library. This free library of reference, which was established in 1887, is maintained by the moiety of the estate of Walter Loomis Newberry, who died in 1868. The Music Department (in 1949) contained 9100 books and 15,525 bound vols. of scores. The most important features are: (1) the collection of scores of the classical composers; (2) full scores of many of the earlier operas; (3) files of many of the older periodicals; (4) an extensive collection of American hymnology. Collections which have been merged in it include that of Count Pio Resse, of Florence (purchased 1889), which contains many rare works, such as a copy of the original edition of Peri's 'Euridice' of 1600; the collection of the Beethoven Society of Chicago, added in 1890; the private library of Julius Fuchs, in 1891, and that of Otto Lob, in 1892. Hubert H. Main's collection of hymn-books and sacred music, numbering 3000 vols., was added in 1892. The library of Theodore Thomas (566 vols.), given by his widow, is kept intact and contains many orchestral scores annotated by Thomas, and 3 original MSS written by him. By his will the set of 10,000 programmes of concerts conducted by him, 1855-1904, was bequeathed to the Library. In 1911 the collection of Mme T. Le Carpentier-Morphy was acquired; in 1920 that of the late G. P. Upton, presented by his widow; in 1929 many of the 17th- and 18th-century scores formerly belonging to W. J. Wolffheim were acquired. Among the MSS are Boethius's 'De Musica', 12th century, a 16th-century MS of German folksongs, etc., about 40 compositions in French lute tablature, a collection of 30 motets and madrigals in Latin and Italian by Verdelot, Willaert and other early 16th-century composers, lute compositions by V. Capirola, with illuminated borders, early 16th century, a 16th-century Vespers of the Russian Church. Other MSS include the B major fugue from Bach's "48", Brahms's 'Vergebliches Ständchen', the third of Schumann's three 'Fantasiestücke' and a considerable number of liturgical MSS from the 13th to the 18th centuries. Many modern composers have presented autographs to the Library, and there are others by Mozart, Chopin, Liszt, Wagner, Saint-Saëns and MacDowell. Early printed works include the 'Graduale Dominicana' (Mexico, 1576), the first choir-book printed in North America, 'Musica Transalpina' (London, 1588) and works by Gasurio, Dalza, Cavazzoni, Lassus and many others, as well as the Peri vol. mentioned above, which is one of the Library's most prized possessions. A large monetary bequest was made to the Library by Horace Sweeney Oakley, which will be used, when it becomes available after a life interest to a relative, to endow a music foundation. A sketch of the musical material available, written by Dr. Felix Borowski, is contained in the Handbook of the Newberry Library (1938). Librarian: S. Pargellis.

c. University of Chicago. The Music Library contains an excellent general working collection of about 11,000 vols., of books and music, including most of the collected editions. The library of William Huber, jun., was presented to the University in 1919, and the most interesting pieces of his collection of 13,000 items of organ music is retained in the Music Library, the rest being deposited in the archives of the Library of Congress. There is also a collection of scores, some little known, acquired in 1941 from the library of the late Frederick Stock, formerly conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. A microfilm archive for the study of 16th-century music is now being developed. The Deutsches Volklied Archiv, which was presented to the Library by the Wiebolt family in 1930 and possesses 200,000 photostats, is now housed in the Modern Languages Library. Curator of the Music Library: Scott Goldthwaite.

CINCINNATI, OHIO. a. Public Library. This Library contains (Jan. 1949) about 8000 books on music, 30,000 scores and 7000 pieces of sheet music. The average annual increase is about 1250 items. The circulation records for 1948 show that 10,117 pieces were borrowed that year. A record collection was started in 1947 and by 1949 had over 4000 records, with a circulation of 40,000 a year. It will be seen from these figures that the Library, although possessing no rare or outstanding items, has an excellent and extensive collection for general use, and that it is much appreciated. Librarian: Carl Vitz.

b. Conservatory of Music. This institution has a students' Library of 4000 vols. of books and music, many orchestral parts and over 1000 gramophone records. It is affiliated to the University.

c. Hebrew Union College. The College Library possesses one of the most extensive collections of Jewish music in the world, containing 2000 books, 4000 scores and 6000 MSS. Secretary: I. Goldberg.

d. The College of Music. The College of Music was founded in 1878 as a direct outcome of the internationally famous May Festivals. The success of the Festivals led to the building of Music Hall. At that time the same group of prominent citizens founded the College of Music and housed it in a building adjoining Music Hall. The College Library contains old volumes which have become valuable as Americana. There is also an original Italian illuminated manuscript, dated about 1600 given to the College of Music by Peter Thompson, an original edition of Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach's 'Versuch' (1787) and a first edition of 'Notes of a Pianist' by the first American pianoforte virtuoso Louis Morian Gottschalk (published 1881, eleven years after his death). The Library also contains a number of original copies of the books issued in the early 19th century for the use of the "singing skewls", an essentially American institution.

The collection of music and books on various subjects in the College Library numbers about 2500, the books including the best of the latest publications, 1000 vols. of orchestral, opera and oratorio scores, some of them valuable old editions. There is the pianoforte music collection of Dr. Albino Gorno; another given by a former professor of the school, Frederick J. Hoffman; a large oratorio collection given by B. W. Foley, also a former faculty member; a fine chamber-music library donated by Mrs. Helene V. B. Wurlitzer and an extensive choral and orchestral library (scores and parts). Librarian: Theresa K. Noak.

CLEVELAND, OHIO. Cleveland Public Library. The music section includes about 4500 volumes for reference use. In the circulating collection there are approximately 8750 books about music, 24,000 volumes of scores, including orchestral music, 16,000 pieces of sheet music, 12,000 gramophone records and 100 pianola rolls (a sample collection only).

In addition to the music section the John G. White Collection of folklore and orientalia now has about 2500 volumes of music and musical literature.

The collection of recordings includes long-playing and other records, also many records for the study of foreign languages. Four turntables, each equipped with four sets of headphones, provide for listening in the music section. The Library works closely with local musical organizations and offers a lecture or concert each month. A study course in musical appreciation for adults, with weekly lectures, is jointly sponsored by the Library, the Cleveland Orchestra and the Cleveland Board of Education. Head of Fine Arts Division: Ruth Wilcox; of Music Section: L. Quincy Mumford.

DETROIT, MICHIGAN. Public Library. The music collection includes (May 1948) 8000 books and bound magazines, 28,000 bound volumes of music, 19,000 pieces of sheet music, 21,000 octavo choruses and anthems, and files of newspaper cuttings, programmes, pictures and pamphlets. Among the Department's holdings are the William H. Murphy and John B. Martin collections of orchestral music; the libraries of the late Theodore Spiering and Maud Powell; definitive editions of Bach, Brahms, Chopin, Couperin, Handel, Monte-verdi, Mozart, Palestrina and Purcell; the E. Azalia Hackley Memorial Collection of Negro Music, Drama and Dance; the Michigan Collection of works by Michigan composers; and early American hymnals, song-books and sheet music. Anthems and sacred songs, reinforced by the Hazel B. Leonard and Melvina Huger Memorial Collections, provide the music for the services of about 125 churches.

The Library also has holdings of pianola rolls, sound films on musical subjects and some 13,000 records of folk, classical and modern music, as well as of non-musical subjects.

Reference questions answered during the year are estimated at 16,000; books and music lent for home use at 56,000; records lent at 14,000.

Through the Library's new Audio-Visual Department plans are being made to extend the record circulation service to the branch libraries, and to make the large reference collection of records available for use in listening-rooms in the Library. Librarian: Ralph A. Ulveling. Chief of Music and Drama Department: H. Dorothy Tilly.

INDIANAPOLIS, INDIANA. Public Library. The Music Department contains about 3500 books on music, 5200 bound scores and 49,000 pieces of sheet music. Special collections are (1) popular songs from 1830 to the present day; (2) orchestral scores; (3) anthems and choral works in sufficient number to lend to choirs for their use; (4) recordings, many of which may be borrowed. Librarian: Marian McFadden; Head of Music Department: Elizabeth Ohr.

ITHACA, N.Y. Cornell University. The University Library has about 10,000 vols. of music and books about music; the Music Department has about 8000 records and 1500 scores for study purposes. Choir Library, 700 titles; Orchestral Library, 800 titles. Willard Straight Hall has a Carnegie Corporation College music set, consisting of about 850 records, 250 scores and 150 books. Librarian: S. A. McCarthy.

LOS ANGELES, CAL. a. University of California. (1) The Music Library. This collection of scores and parts, operas and chamber music has as its nucleus the library of the South California Federal Music Project, which was transferred to the University of California at Los Angeles in 1942. The section of American music is being extended whenever possible to provide a regional centre for the study and performance of American works. All this music is available on loan.

(2) The William Andrews Clark Memorial Library. This library contains a small but interesting collection of some 200 vols., of works dating from the 17th and 18th centuries, including many first editions. The majority of the composers and authors represented were either English by birth or lived in England and include Morley, O. Gibbons, Lawes, Handel, Bononcini, etc. There are also numerous editions of 18th-century English ballad operas.

b. Public Library. This extensive library contains about 72,500 books and periodicals on music, 29,000 pieces of music and a special collection of 752 full scores in its Art and Music Department. Indexes are maintained, and the annual circulation of books and music is estimated at about 183,000 items. Librarian: Harold L. Hamill; Departmental Librarian: Helen Fitz-Richard.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINNESOTA. The Public Library has a general working collection of over 50,000 scores and other items of printed music, including the John P. Rossiter Library of band music (12,000 items); a special file of old popular songs printed in America since the beginning to the 19th century, indexed by title and by five-year periods; about 10,000 books on music, 15,000 newspaper cuttings and pamphlets, and over 5000 gramophone records, with a soundproof room with pianoforte and gramophone for the use of readers. There are also some original MSS of works by local composers, and one illuminated Gregorian MS; also William U. Knight's scrapbooks of musical life in Chicago in the 1890s. There is an annual growth of some 1000 items. An index to folk dances and singing-games was compiled by the staff of the department and published by the American Library Association in 1936; Supplement, 1949. As a result of two gifts of $5000 each from the late Mrs. Emil Oberhoffer in memory of her husband, the co-founder and first conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, the Music Room was re-named the Emil Oberhoffer Music Room in 1944. His grand pianoforte and music library were also given to the Library. The Minneapolis Record Society is also housed in the Music Department. City Librarian: Glenn M. Lewis; Head of the Music Department: Gladys M. Wilson.

NEW HAVEN, CONNECTICUT. Yale University. a. The University Library contains approx. 12,000 volumes on music and increases by about 300 volumes a year. The stock includes historical and theoretical works, American song-books, folksongs and the Edward Bliss Reed collection of carols. With the expansion of the Department of History of Music in the Graduate School of the University, the Library has added reference books and important foreign works. In the Rare Book Room are a number of scores and manuscripts, among them the Burgundian song-book discovered in 1939 (called the 'Mellon Chansonier' after its donor), in which are French, Italian, English, Spanish and Latin songs of the 15th century.

b. The Library of the School of Music has about 40,000 vols., with a growth of about 1000 vols. per year. The Library has been developed to provide a background for the study of music in all its branches. It has the usual collected editions, 'Denkmäler' series, etc., and the reference books, treatises and scores expected in a scholarly library. Fields of special interest are bibliography, the history and construction of instruments, in particular the organ, and works relating to J. S. Bach and his sons. The MS of the 'Clavier-Büchlein' for W. F. Bach and three of the four parts of the 'Clavier-Übung' in the original edition are here. Among recent acquisitions are a selection of keyboard and chamber music printed in the 17th and 18th centuries, the operas of Lully in contemporary editions and Lassus's 'Magnum Opus Musicum'. The Lowell Mason Collection, which includes the library of Dr. Rinck of Darmstadt, has been incorporated in the School Library and adds to its resources several hundred vols. of German chorale books, American hymn-books, other Protestant church music, organ music (much of it in MS) and a good representative selection of the theoretical writings of the 18th century. Librarian: Eva J. O'Meara.

NEW YORK. Public Library, Music Division. The nucleus of this celebrated collection is a combination of three entities: the Astor and Lenox Libraries and the Tilden Foundation, established respectively in 1849, 1870 and 1887, and amalgamated in 1892. The Astor Library's music collection included the publications of the Plain-song and Medieval Music Society, and of the continental antiquarian societies, as special features; the central feature of the Lenox Library was the musical collection made by Joseph W. Drexel of Philadelphia, begun in 1858 by the purchase and combination of the collections of H. F. Albrecht (a musician who went to America with the Germania Orchestra in 1848) and Dr. R. La Roche; additions were also made at the sale of the Rimbault Library in London in 1877. The Astor and Lenox collections were united and transferred to the new building of the Library at Fifth Avenue and 42nd Street, in 1911. Since then the following collections have been added to the Music Division: 1914, Julian Edwards (over 800 vocal and orchestral scores); 1918, Doane Collection, presented by Mrs. George W. Doane (777 vols. of scores, books about music, song-books, etc.); 1921, 1923, 1924, parts of the collections belonging to James G. Huneker, Henry E. Krehbiel and Arthur Mees; 1922, musical MSS of Horace Wadham Nicholl. At the Wolffheim sale in 1929 and 1930 the Library purchased over 400 items, including Galilei's 'Fronimo' (Venice, 1568-69), Mersenne's 'Les Préludes de l'harmonie universelle' (Paris, 1627), Fuenllana's 'Orphenica lyra' (Seville, 1554), Vallet's 'Paradisus musicus testudinis' (Amsterdam, 1618) and Besard's 'Novus Partus sive concertationes musicae' (Augsburg, 1617). Other important collections include the Lambert bequest of photographs of musicians, autograph letters, etc., and sheet music from the David Belasco estate. The chief gift of the 1930s was the magnificent collection of MSS presented in memory of Mrs. Lizzie Bliss and Dr. C. Herter. In 1940 the Joseph Muller Collection of musical portraits was acquired, while the Beethoven Association Collection of books, music books, pictures, MSS, instruments, statues and copyright contract rights belonging to the Association was presented the following year. About the same time the Gabrilovitch Collection of pianoforte music and orchestral scores came to the Division and in 1945 the Neighbourhood Playhouse gave 387 pieces of sheet music and 300 pieces of vocal and instrumental music. Finally during 1948 the Music Division acquired the Bristow and Gottschalk Collections of MSS. All these collections include many interesting items which cannot be mentioned separately in one short entry, but the Library is famous for its early English MS material, among its holdings being three important books of virginal music (Drexel 5609, 5611 and 5612 — the last thought to be, at least in part, a Gibbons autograph), 'John Gamble his Book' (1569), 'Francis Sambrooke his Booke' (an early 17th-century anthology of anthems, motets and madrigals); Rimbault's own 'Commonplace Book' and his catalogues of various rare collections. Other MSS from Europe are a Gradual on vellum (1494), written by Brother Leonard of Aachen; a 'Choir-book' Antiphonary and Gradual (1636) made for Scipio, Cardinal Borghese by the Franciscan monks of Ischia, and an Antiphonary (1695) which formerly belonged to Charles X of France. The Library also possesses the holographs of Bach's cantata 'In allen meinen Thaten', Handel's cantata 'Langia de bocca'; a sonata by Haydn; Schubert's song 'Skolie'; Schumann's 'Herzlied', Op. 107 No. 1; two Mozart items (K. 296 and K. 594) and 8 pp. from one of Beethoven's sketchbooks (later used for the Trio, Op. 97). Among the interesting letters in the Bliss-Herter Collection is the famous outburst addressed to Amalie Sebald (16 Sept. 1812) beginning "Ich Tyrann, Ihr Tyrann . . .". There are also letters and holograph scores by Chopin, Liszt, Wagner, Stravinsky and other composers both ancient and modern. Among the printed works of special interest are the Berg and Neuber 'Thesaurus' (1564), the Schadeus 'Promptuarium Musicum' (1611), Lassus's 'Magnum Opus' (1604) and his 'Patrocinium Musices' (1575-89). Also the only known copy of 'Parthenia Inviolata' (? 1614) is here, and one of the two known copies of Farmer's 'Divers and sundry waies . . .'

(1591); and a copy of the 'Ballet comique de la royné' (1582) which formerly belonged to Ben Jonson and Horace Walpole. There are treatises by many theorists, including Boethius, Gafurio, Cerone, Salinas, Zarlino, Rameau, Fux and Quantz, and a number of incunabula. One of the special sections of the Music Division is the Americana Collection of the Henry Hadley Memorial Library, which houses and administers everything appertaining to the music of the U.S.A. and its composers. Besides the works of native and resident musicians of the 17th, 18th and 19th centuries, there are MS and published compositions by modern composers. Special catalogues and indices are devoted to standard works as well as folk music and popular songs. In 1948 the Music Division separated its music and dance items, and thus created a special section for the dance. This archive numbers about 3000 vols. and covers the subject in all its phases. Supplementing the book collection are auxiliary files, catalogues, an iconography section, etc. In addition to its activities as a reference centre, the Dance Collection carries on a programme of lectures and exhibitions of rare dance materials. Among the other reference material in the Music Division is a large and expanding microfilm collection of musical source material, including both MSS and early books about music, which is in constant use. The Phonograph Record Collection, built up since the early 1930s by its Curator, Philip Miller, has become very extensive, and nowadays the leading record companies deposit copies of new releases in this section, which also includes speech disks. Weekly concerts of recorded music were instituted early in 1948 and have become a feature of the Division's activities, and in the summer crowds enjoy them daily in Bryant Park. The collection of record catalogues, magazines and other gramophone literature is constantly growing. The Circulation Department maintains one branch devoted entirely to music, usually known as "The Music Library". This contains about 24,000 scores and 7500 books about music, available for home use, with a collection of over 12,000 disks and three listening machines, all in constant demand. Nearly 100 amateur groups make use of the orchestral department. Again, a special section is devoted to the dance.

Other activities. Besides the normal library activities above, the New York Public Library has undertaken the publication of various old works existing formerly only in MS or contemporary sets of parts. The music is carefully edited (by Sidney Beck) for study and performance, and is made available to the public at nominal cost. Also in co-operation with New York University, courses of lectures are offered at the Library in various aspects of music and musical history. Special concerts of old and rare music, from material in the Library, are given from time to time, and Dr. Curt Sachs, consultant to the division, gives an annual series of ten lectures.

Catalogues. Besides the usual working catalogues to be found in the Division itself, a new catalogue of music printed before 1800 is now in progress. A catalogue of the Drexel Collection was printed in 1869; there was also an article by H. Botstiber in S.I.M.G., IV (1902-3), which gives a little idea of the Library's holdings in early material. See also O. Kinkeldey in 'Library Journal', Vol. XI. The 'Annual Reports' of the Library list important acquisitions. Chief of the Music Division, Reference Department: Carleton Sprague Smith; Curator of the Americana Collection: John Tasker Howard; of the Dance Collection: Genevieve M. Oswald; of the Phonograph Collection: Philip Miller.

b. Columbia University, Music Department. The Library here was built up in its earlier stages under the leadership of Edward MacDowell, Columbia's first Professor of Music (1896-1904), and has been augmented by the collections of A. Seidl (1905) and Dr. J. Pech (1913), each of which contained many scores. Two further collections have been acquired in more recent years: the Béla Bartók deposit of south-eastern European folk music, including MSS of his collections and studies (1942) and the Judah A. Jaffe collection of records, showing in over 2500 examples the development of recording from its earliest days. Systematic purchases of musical literature, music and gramophone literature have been made since 1927. In 1934 larger quarters were provided, the library was reorganized and its activities expanded in a development parallel with the growth of graduate studies in the Department of Music. The Library now contains about 8000 books and pamphlets, 14,000 scores and 10,000 gramophone records, with an annual increase of about 1500 items. Among the unique items is the holograph of MacDowell's 'Drei Lieder für vierstimmigen Männerchor', Op. 27. There is also a collection of first editions of his works and a number of autograph letters of several composers. Music Librarian: Mrs. C. K. Miller.

c. New York University. The Washington Square Library has a working collection of about 4000 vols., to which about 100 are added annually. There is a special collection of theoretical works of the 18th and 19th centuries, numbering about 70 vols. in all and including works by C. P. E. Bach, Forkel, Gerber, Marpurg, etc., which were all purchased from a former organist of the Leipzig St. Thomas Church. In 1946 a special appropriation was secured to enrich the printed resources of the Library for graduate work, and an anonymous donor presented $5000 for the purchase of microfilms, records and other equipment. Many basic sets, journals and monographs have already been acquired, and much out-of-print material is available on microfilm. The record collection is kept in the Music Department of the College, not in this Library. Librarian: Nelson W. McCombs.

d. New York Institute for the Education of the Blind. This Institute, founded in 1831, runs many classes on music and the arts. The Library contains 5500 pieces of music in Braille, 2000 pieces of printed music and 500 vols. of printed music. Librarian: L. V. Hartung.

e. Columbia Broadcasting System. The Music Library, which was founded in 1929, contains approx. 500,000 items, including a small working collection of 750 bibliographical and reference works supplemented by the general Reference Library of the company. Scores of all kinds are available, the collection having many modern editions of old music, symphonic works, modern popular music and special orchestral arrangements and adaptations for radio programmes. There are also many contemporary American works commissioned by the company. Director: Julius Mattfeld.

f. Municipal Broadcasting System. The Library is chiefly remarkable for its large collection of gramophone records amounting to over 25,000, chiefly "classical" music. Director: Hermann Neuman.

g. National Broadcasting Company, Inc. The total collection in the N.B.C. Music Library, founded in 1926, is well over 500,000 items of music of all types, including many modern orchestrations specially arranged for the N.B.C.

h. Station WOR. The Music Library at this broadcasting station was founded in 1922, and now possesses a very large collection of orchestral music of all kinds, amounting to about 25,000 orchestrations, some 5500 titles of music for string orchestra, 75,000 songs, of which about half are popular music, and complete materials for all the Bach cantatas, together with many operas, oratorios and masses. There is also a large collection of music publishers' catalogues. Librarian: John R. Bogue.

i. Juilliard School of Music. This institution possesses a large reference and circulating library of about 40,000 vols. of music and some 5000 books on music. The Library is maintained for the use of the Faculty and enrolled students, but it is also available to the general public for reference purposes (by appointment only). Orchestral scores and parts of about 1500 compositions are available for the use of the various departments. Special features of the collection are vocal scores of operas of rare historical value, French and German treatises on music, a large assemblage of opera librettos, historical and current. Some first editions and autographs are also included. An extensive cuttings and pamphlet file augments the reference facilities of the collection. President: W. Schumann; Dean: M. A. Schubart.

k. The Selden-Goth Collection of Autographs. For details of this celebrated private collection see M.Q., Vol. XXVI, No. 2 (Apr. 1940).

NORTHAMPTON, MASS. a. Forbes Library. The Music Department here has a collection of some 20,000 items, comprising bound vols., sheet music and musical literature. Charles B. Cutter, the first librarian, made it his object to equip the Library with all the standard editions, and the collection begun on these lines immediately after the opening of the Library in 1894 now contains most of the collected editions; additions are regularly made. Librarian: J. L. Harrison; Art and Music Departmental Librarian: Henrietta B. Schmitter.

b. Smith College. The Music Library possesses some 18,000 pieces of music and 8000 books, with an annual increase of some 800 vols. There is also a collection of more than 20,000 records, to which a further 800 is added yearly. The Library is rich in historical collections and has many of the complete editions of the leading composers. Two interesting special collections are housed here: the Philip Hale Collection of rare first editions of early treatises and the Einstein Collection, which consists of a large number of 15th- and 16th-century vocal and instrumental items copied by Dr. Alfred Einstein in the libraries of Europe.¹ Librarian: Mary M. Ankudowich; Assistant Librarian: Margaret A. Kiley; Curator of Records: Ruth Agnew.

OVERLIN, OHIO. Oberlin College and Conservatory of Music. The College Library houses a good working collection of musical literature and larger works of historical interest, estimated (1950) at over 14,000 vols. The Conservatory maintains a Circulating Library of 40,000 copies of music for voice, pianoforte, organ, string and wind instruments. The two collections are carefully selected to meet the requirements of the historical worker, about 400 books and 200 pieces of music being added each year. There is also a collection of about 4000 records and 1500 lantern slides. College Librarian: Julian S. Fowler; Conservatory Librarian: Betty J. Barnes.

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA. a. Curtis Institute of Music. Founded in 1926, the Library here has a total collection of 31,600 items and 4000 records. Among the items of musical literature the Institute possesses a rare copy of the Joannes Aurelius Augurellus 'Carmina' (Vienna, 1491) containing one of the earliest known illustrations of the viola da gamba. The rare music includes two 16th- or 17th-century antiphoners, the first book of organ music with pedal — 'Preludes' by Adam Ileborgh (1448); a conductor's score of Wagner's 'Die Feen' and many first editions of Bach, Liszt and others. The Burrell Collection of Wagner relics, comprising 518 MS letters, documents and music was presented to the Institute by Mrs. Mary Curtis Zimbalist. Librarian: Elizabeth R. Hartman.

b. Historical Society of Pennsylvania. The Society's Library contains a valuable collection of Colonial and early Federal music MSS and publications, and some European MSS. Director: R. N. Williams, 2nd.

c. (1) The Free Library of Philadelphia. The Music Department contains more than 200,000 items of music in all forms. The facilities of the department make it possible to meet the needs of more than 37,000 people a year. Books lent to music library patrons number more than 40,000 per annum. For home use there are 18,000 volumes of biographies, theoretical works, miniature and full scores, books on music and related subjects, operatic material and collections of instrumental and vocal compositions. For reference use within the department there are more than 4000 dictionaries, encyclopedias, bibliographies, textbooks, bound periodicals and bound orchestral programmes of the major symphony orchestras. In addition to the usual sets of the works of Palestrina, Bach, Brahms, Beethoven, etc., the Library has both the Arnold and Chrysander editions of the complete works of Handel and 'Le Trésor des pianistes'. There are many full scores of operas, including early editions of Gluck and Philidor. Musicologists and research students will find large holdings of important reference and text-books in foreign languages. For chamber-music performers about 15,000 works are catalogued for home use. There are large collections of librettos, programmes; announcements and newspaper cuttings of local musical events, current musical periodicals, pamphlets, pictures of musical subjects and special card files of popular and dance music. A collection of 80,000 pieces of sheet music is particularly rich in early American material. The collections of the Musical Fund Society of Philadelphia, including the Edward I. Keffer collection of sheet music, constitute an important part of the department's holdings. There is a collection of 23,000 gramophone records for use within the department, for which 6 gramophones are installed. A pianoforte is available for study in a sound-proof room. Each year the Free Library and the Musical Fund Society sponsor a series of six chamber concerts, which are presented free to the public in the auditorium of the Library. Exhibitions are prepared by the staff of the Music Department to demonstrate the activities and holdings of the department and to celebrate special events. Head of Music Department: Arthur Cohn.

(2) The Edwin A. Fleisher Collection of Orchestral Music. This collection contains about 12,000 orchestral compositions. Over 9000 of these consist of full scores and sets of parts ready for performance. The music is available for reference in the Library and lent to recognized orchestras and musical organizations, provided that the music is not available from any other source. A printed catalogue describing in detail the holdings in the collection has been published in two volumes, the first in 1933 (o.p. 1952), the second in 1945. Catalogue information includes performance time, instrumentation, facts about first performance (place, date, name of organization and conductor), names of soloists in the case of concertos and prize-winning details, etc. The catalogue is divided into 21 categories embracing large and small orchestra, chamber, wind and string orchestra, and works for one or more solo instruments with orchestral accompaniment. Also included are fanfares and works for percussion orchestra. No work is included that contains voice parts unless they are ad libitum or incidental. Composers from almost every country in the world are represented. The greater part of the orchestral repertory is included in the collection, and the policy of additions has covered all schools of musical thought from the pre-classic to the most modern.

PORTLAND, OREGON. The Library Association of Portland. The Association maintains a Music Room which has a collection of over 8000 books on music and about 15,000 bound vols. of music, including opera scores, chamber music, miniature and full orchestral scores, and much solo music. There are also more than 5000 records for use in the Library, and over 1200 albums for circulation. Music Librarian: Rozella Knox.

POUGHKEEPSIE, NEW YORK STATE. Vassar College. The Music Library has an excellent reference collection. In Jan. 1949 it possessed 6600 books, 20,000 items of printed music and 8500 records, and accessions are continually being made. The Library is extremely well equipped, having a reading-room, a class-room, six audition rooms each containing a high-fidelity gramophone and pianoforte, cataloguing room, photographic workroom and offices. Music Librarian: George S. Dickinson; Assistant Music Librarian: Natalie Mestechin.

PRINCETON, NEW JERSEY. Princeton University Music Department. The Library here, although established only in 1935, possesses about 10,000 books and vols. of music, and more than 8000 records. Librarian: Julian P. Boyd; Associate Librarian: Lawrence Heyl.

ROCHESTER, NEW YORK STATE. University of Rochester, Eastman School of Music. The Sibley Library, established in 1904, is now a branch of the University of Rochester Library, and serves as a circulating library and as a reference collection. The Library is rich in chamber music (the latest acquisition being the Jacques Gordon Library), in literature on French music and the French theatre, in theoretical treatises of the 16th and 17th centuries and in operatic scores and librettos. The following collections have come into the possession of the Library: Arthur Poujon (French music); H. P. Kreiner (History of Russian music, opera and folksong); O. G. Sonneck (miscellaneous pamphlets, cuttings and periodicals); M. J. Fleming (literature concerning the violin and MS dictionary of violin and bow makers, A-F); H. E. Krehbiel (folksong); A. Hartmann (orchestral music and MSS). Early printed works include Niger's 'Grammatica' (1480), Lassus's 'Patrocinium Musices' and Keinspeck's 'Lilium Musice Plane' (1497). The MSS include the famous 11th-century treatise by Hermannus Contractus, and others by Berno of Reichenau, William of Hirsau, etc., the Admont Codex 494 of the 12th century and the Oskar Fleischer collection of fragments of MSS of the 10th-16th centuries. Autograph MSS include Bishop's opera 'Clari, or The Maid of Milan' (which contains the famous song 'Home, Sweet Home'), the Saint-Saëns 'Caprice brillant' for violin and piano-forte, and the first draft of the orchestral score of 'La Mer' by Debussy. A catalogue of the collection has been prepared by Elizabeth Schmitter. Librarian Emeritus: Barbara Duncan; Present Librarian: Ruth Watanabe.

SALEM, MASS. The Essex Institute. The Library possesses a collection of about 1000 vols. and 5000 sheets of music, chiefly American. See C. Seeger in 'Notes' (Mar. 1948). Librarian: Harriet S. Tapley.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA. Public Library. The Music Department, founded in 1917, has over 11,000 vols., 15,000 pieces of music and 7000 books on music, and a collection of disks is now being built up. There is a concert-hall in which weekly record concerts are given and which is available to local artists free of charge. The Library is the headquarters of the North California Chapter of the Music Libraries Association and has very strong public support. The collections include over 1000 opera scores, 12,000 miniature scores, 1100 pieces of chamber music, 1700 scores with sets of parts and an unusual collection of rare Spanish music.

SAN MARINO, CALIFORNIA. Henry E. Huntington Library and Art Gallery. This houses an exceptional collection of English and American music, only incidentally dealing with French, Italian and German music. The pre-1800 material largely derives from three great English collections (described in the 1911 edition of Grove): the Bridgewater, Britwell and Huth Libraries. The Huntington Library now has the entire file of items bearing the Bridgewater shelf-list classification, including madrigals, liturgical and theoretical works; the rare items include Jones's 'Muses Gardin of Delights' and his 'Musical Drame' as well as the presentation copy of Ravenscroft's 'Briefe Discourse' and Lowe's 'Short Direction for the Cathedral Service'. There is also a MS of John Coperario's 'Rules how to Compose'. The Britwell Collection, a large part of which is in the Huntington Collection, is also rich in English madrigal music and includes the first issue of the first edition of 'Parthenia'. The Huth collection consisted largely of popular songs and theatre music, with about 500 broadside songs of 1700-30. The Library also contains a collection of material relating to music composed in honour of George Washington, from the Lewison collection, and the Brock collection of early American music and 19th-century sheet music. Miscellaneous items of interest include an American Missal of 1561 (one of five or six extant musical works from Mexican presses of this period), the only complete copy of T. Whythorne's collections of songs, rare Aberdeen imprints from the press of John Forbes, the elder, and a rich collection of incunabula. See Edythe N. Backus, 'Catalogue of Music in the Huntington Library printed before 1801' (San Marino, 1949). Librarian: Leslie E. Bliss.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS. City Library. In 1909 the late Colonel James A. Russell bequeathed a large sum of money to the City Library Association to establish the Grace Russell Department of Music. The Department now has over 4000 books, 7000 scores and about 5000 pieces of sheet music. There are also over 5000 records, which are lent free of charge to the public. Librarian: J. A. Humphrey; Head of the Art and Music Department: Charlotte K. Bausman.

STANFORD, CALIFORNIA. a. University Library. The Music Department here is of a practical general nature, designed to fulfil the needs of university students.

b. The Memorial Library. This celebrated collection of rare items, founded through the generosity of Mr. and Mrs. G. T. Keating, as a memorial to the men who lost their lives in the second world war, contains many autographs of the great composers, as well as MS copies and original editions. For catalogue see N. van Patten, 'A Memorial Library of Music at Stanford University' (Stanford, Cal., 1950). Librarian: N. van Patten.

UNIVERSITIES AND COLLEGES. There are several American universities and colleges whose names do not indicate their exact location. As these have been placed in this article under the names of towns, the following list is given as a guide:

Bowdoin College, see Brunswick.

Columbia University, see New York.

Cornell University, see Ithaca.

Harvard University, see Cambridge, Mass.

University of California, see Berkeley and Los Angeles.

University of North Carolina, see Chapel Hill.

University of Illinois, see Urbana.

Vassar College, see Poughkeepsie.

Yale University, see New Haven.

URBANA, ILL. University of Illinois. A departmental Music Library was opened in the music building in 1944 and the collection of music and musical literature is divided between this departmental library and the main University Library. In 1948 the two buildings housed 77,300 vols. in all, 66,000 being music, 7000 books and 4300 records. There is an average annual increase of about 2000 items. There is a good stock of scores, sets of parts, choral music, collected works and historic editions. Current musical periodicals number 55. The collection is particularly rich in opera and 18th-century music. Special collections include the Rafael Joseffy collection of about 2000 pieces for pianoforte, a collection of American sheet music (1830-76), popular songs of the two world wars and over 100 first and early editions. Director of the University Library: R. B. Downs; Music Librarian: J. Allen.

WASHINGTON, D.C. a. The Library of Congress. The Music Division is a service division in the Reference Department of the Library of Congress. It was established officially in 1897, with Walter Rose Whittlesley in charge. From 1902 to 1917 the Chief was Oscar George Theodore Sonneck, who displayed extraordinary skill and energy in developing and organizing the collections to a degree of international prominence. His work was continued by successors (Carl Engel, 1922-34; Oliver Strunk, 1934-37; Harold Spivacke, 1937 to date) along old and new paths, and now the resources and activities of the Division make it one of the richest in existence. It offers the student and the investigator remarkable opportunities for reference and research in music of the past 500 years. In certain broad fields (e.g. opera scores, librettos, books) it is unrivalled by any collection anywhere. Its collections of music printed before 1800 and of books on music printed before 1800 are extremely comprehensive and valuable; and since about 1940 the holdings of autograph scores and letters of master-composers have grown enormously. As a result the Division has what is probably the largest collection in existence of Brahms manuscripts, as well as outstanding autographs by Bach, Beethoven, Haydn, Liszt, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Weber, etc.

In 1952 the accessions numbered approximately 2,000,000 volumes, pieces and sound recordings, with nearly another million (estimated) uncounted but part available for use. About 40,000 items are added annually, coming to the Division through copyright, gift, purchase, transfer and exchange. A provision of the U.S. Copyright Law demands that all registered works be deposited in the Library of Congress. This accounts largely for the rapid growth of the collections and gives special significance to the holdings of present-day publications. (The Copyright Office, which is a part of the Library of Congress, regularly publishes lists of all titles deposited in accordance with the statute.) From 1903 to 1942 the notable accessions were announced in the annual reports of the Librarian of Congress; they are now announced in 'The Library of Congress Quarterly Journal of Current Acquisitions'. An impressive but still inadequate estimate of the Division's holdings can be obtained from these publications.

Conspicuous features of the collections are early books on music, estimated at about one half of all such books printed before 1800; dramatic, symphonic and chamber works, both pre- and post-1800; opera librettos, numbering some 35,000 (including the Albert Schatz collection); early Americana, including hymn-books and patriotic music; music of the wars in which the U.S.A. has taken part; composers' autograph scores and letters, which are in both the general and special collections of the Library.

In the general autograph collections of the Division the following composers and works call for special mention: J. S. Bach, Cantata No. 9; Berg, 'Wozzeck'; Brahms, violin Concerto, Op. 77; Chausson, 'Poème'; Debussy, 'Nocturnes'; Leoncavallo, 'Pagliacci'; Liszt, 'Soirées de Vienne'; Rakhmaninov, Paganini Rhapsody, 4th pianoforte Concerto, 3rd Symphony, 'Symphonic Dances'; Schumann, 1st Symphony; Walton, violin Concerto.

The autographs of American composers are especially treasured, and the following are well represented: John Alden Carpenter, George W. Chadwick, Frederick Shepherd Converse, Victor Herbert, Charles Martin Loeffler, Edward A. MacDowell, David Stanley Smith.

An object of particular pride is the autograph music book of Francis Hopkinson (1737-91), a signatory of the Declaration of Independence and the first native-born American composer. Also of great national importance are the first printing of 'The Star-Spangled Banner' (broadside, words only) and the first edition of the words and music together. In addition to the collecting of patriotic and national music the Division also stresses every manifestation of American music, both serious and popular. Thus the sheet-music collections contain American popular songs and dances as well as art songs and instrumental works. The collecting of American music, particularly of an earlier day, poses special bibliographic considerations. Therefore the accumulation of American music imprints from the beginning of the Republic onwards is looked upon as a primary responsibility.

The Division has in manuscript unpublished works by Tartini, C. P. E. Bach, Boccherini, Brunetti and many other composers. Another special feature is the large quantity (over 600) of manually copied transcripts of rare old opera scores in European archives and of special collections, such as Philidor's compilation of ballets. The acquisition of this kind of material continues, but now through the facilities of modern photography.

At the sale of the Cummings, Weckerlin, Prieger and Landau collections the Division secured enviable acquisitions which greatly increased its holdings of primary sources and research materials. It must be admitted, however, that medieval sources (i.e. manuscript music and treatises) constitute the Division's weakest point. Among the vast array of sources which are available here, the following are representative for quality, rarity and importance: John Cotton's 'De musica' (12th-cent. MS); 'Chansonnier de M. le Marquis de Laborde' (15th-cent. MS); Beaulieu's 'Balet comique de la royne' (Paris, 1582); Byrd's 'Psalmes, sonets, & songs of sadnes and pietie' (London, 1588); Caccini's 'Le nuove musiche' (Florence, 1601); Caroso's 'Il ballerino' (Venice, 1581); Josquin's 'Liber primus missarum' (Fossombrone, Petrucci, 1516); Gagliano's 'Dafne' (Florence, 1608); Gibbons's 'First set of madrigals and motets' (London, 1612); Giovanelli's 'Novi thesauri musici' (Venice, 1568); Gombert's first book of motets (Venice, 1539); 'Harmonice musices odhecaton' (Venice, Petrucci, 1504); Marenzio's 'Il primo libro de madrigali' (Venice, 1596); Merulo's 'Toccate d'intavolatura d'organo' (Rome, 1597-1604); Mouton's first book of masses (Fossombrone, Petrucci, 1515); 'Musica transalpina' (London, 1588); Palestrina's 'Offertoria totius anni' (Venice, 1594-96); 'Parthenia' (London, 1611); Peri's 'Euridice' (Florence, 1600 [1601]); Victoria's 'Hymni totius anni' (Venice, 1600).

Theoretical writers such as the following are profusely represented: Pietro Aaron, Jacob Adlung, Martin Agricola, Adriano Banchieri, Bonaventura da Brescia, Charles Burney, Domenico Pietro Cerone, Johann Joseph Fux, Franchino Gafori (complete), Vincenzo Galilei, Glareanus, John Hawkins, Athanasius Kircher, Friedrich Wilhelm Marpurg, Giovanni Battista Martini, Johann Mattheson, Marin Mersenne, Thomas Morley, Michael Praetorius, Wolfgang Caspar Printz, Jean Philippe Rameau, Jean-Jacques Rousseau, Gioseffo Zarlino.

Early in his administration Sonneck devised a classification scheme for the Division; this scheme, revised and amplified, is in use to-day and has been adopted by many other libraries. It divides the collection into three main categories: Music (symbol, M), Musical Literature (i.e. writings about music, symbol, ML), Musical Theory (i.e. pedagogic material, symbol, MT). A permanent scheme for the housing of sound recordings is (1953) in process of organization. Card catalogues provide access to the collections which are freely available to users of the Division or the Library. Like the Library of Congress, of which it is a constituent part, the Division's first responsibility of service is to the Congress of the U.S.A., next to the various agencies of the Federal Government, finally to the public concerned with music in all its manifestations. The Division's services and resources (of material and personnel) are available to scholars, students, teachers, professional societies, industry and to all who have a serious interest in music and its literature. At present the Division is the headquarters for 'Notes', the quarterly journal of the Music Library Association, although there is no official connection between the periodical and the Library of Congress.

Included in the Music Division is the Folklore Section, an outgrowth of the Archive of American Folksong. This Section has custody of a special collection of recorded folk music which, though predominantly American, is widely international in scope. Continual recording projects, in the U.S.A. and abroad, are steadily increasing the size of this collection, which is already estimated at some 60,000 songs and dances. The Section has supervised the issue of 22 albums of the folk music of North and South America, and additional albums (or long-playing disks) are being prepared.

The record issues by the Library of Congress are made possible by another Section of the Music Division, the Recording Laboratory, which resulted from a generous grant of the Carnegie Corporation of New York. It was established in 1940 for the recording and re-recording of music, speech and other forms of auditory communication. The equipment is completely modern and enables the Division to engage in recording experiments as well as to augment its holdings of recorded material.

Incorporated in the Division are several foundations and activities which are the result of private philanthropy. These enable the Library of Congress to exert an influence in the world of music rarely associated with library institutions.

The Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation. This foundation was established by Mrs. Coolidge in 1925, being an outgrowth of her Berkshire (Mass.) chamber music festivals dating from 1918. Mrs. Coolidge gave to the Library of Congress an excellent concert auditorium (seating about 500), following this gift with a generous endowment. Her gifts made possible the adoption of a continuing programme which has been of great importance to creative music and the appreciation of chamber music.

The foundation began its career with a festival of chamber music in the Coolidge Auditorium of the Library of Congress, in 1925, and up to 1952 eleven such festivals have taken place. These have been internationally significant, both for content of programmes and for standard of performance. The foundation has been responsible for the creation of many significant modern chamber works by eminent composers to whom it extends commissions. In past years several composition contests were held, an activity which has not been attempted recently. Many of these works (as well as others) have received their world premieres at Coolidge Festivals. Through commissions to composers, through encouragement of composers, through personal benefactions of Mrs. Coolidge herself, the foundation has acquired an extraordinary collection of modern musical autographs, including chamber works by Beck, Bloch, Bridge, Britten, Casella, Castelnuovo-Tedesco, Enesco, Gruenberg, Hanson, Harris, Hindemith, Honegger, Lajtha, Loeffler, Lopatnikov, Malipiero, Martinù, Milhaud, Pierné, Piston, Porter, Ravel, Respighi, Roussel, Schoenberg, Sessions, Tansman, Thompson, Toch, Villa-Lobos, Webern, Weiner, Wellesz.

The Gertrude Clarke Whittall Foundation. In 1935 Mrs. Whittall presented to the Library of Congress five magnificent Stradivari instruments (3 violins, one of which was the "Betts", 1 viola, 1 cello) and as many Tourte bows. Shortly after (1936) she created a foundation the first purpose of which was to provide these instruments with adequate care and to offer to the public concerts in which they would be heard as a united ensemble. The instruments are housed in a room specially erected and furnished by Mrs. Whittall, known as the Whittall Pavilion. The Whittall Foundation also sponsors frequent additional concerts in the Library, which are often related to the distinguished manuscript collection acquired through Mrs. Whittall's generosity. Among these are many autographs of master-composers (from Bach to Schoenberg), including most of the Brahms holographs mentioned above.

The Serge Kussevitsky Music Foundation in the Library of Congress. This foundation was established in Dec. 1949 by the late Serge Kussevitsky. Assistance to the creative artist was very dear to Kussevitsky, and an earlier foundation in memory of his wife commissioned new works from 35 outstanding composers. The more recent foundation is carrying on the activity of commissioning composers and will encourage the dissemination of new works by performance and other means. The original manuscripts of the commissioned works are added to the autograph collections of the Music Division. Characteristic examples of those received so far are works by Bartók, Bergsma, Blitzstein, Britten, Dallapiccola, Diamond, Fitelberg, Guarneri, Honegger, Kassern, Martinù, Messiaen, Milhaud, Piston, Schoenberg, Villa-Lobos.

The Dayton C. Miller Flute Collection. An extraordinary collection of flutes and flute-type instruments (about 1600 in number), flute music and literature on the flute was bequeathed to the Library of Congress by Dayton C. Miller, eminent physicist and acoustician, who died in 1941. It is a musicological unit of inestimable importance. His bequest also included an endowment for the care of the instruments, to enlarge the collection and to provide concerts, lectures or other activities promoting the knowledge and appreciation of the flute and its music.

The Louis Charles Elson Memorial Fund. In 1945 the Library of Congress received a bequest of the late Mrs. Bertha L. Elson which was to provide lectures on music and musical literature in memory of her husband, Louis Charles Elson (1848-1920), pioneer American musical scholar.

The Nicholas Longworth Foundation. This foundation was established after the death of Nicholas Longworth (1869-1931), eminent statesman who served as Speaker of the House of Representatives. The purpose of the foundation, which was created by Longworth's friends, is to assure concerts in his memory. Longworth was an ardent chamber-music enthusiast and served as first president of the Friends of Music in the Library of Congress.

The Friends of Music in the Library of Congress. This organization, founded in 1928, was national in scope. Its chief purpose was to assist the Music Division in purchasing rarities for its collections. It suspended activities with the outbreak of the second world war and donated its treasury to the Library of Congress as an endowment for the continuation of the above-mentioned purpose.

The Sonneck Memorial Fund. This is an endowment established by the Beethoven Association of New York in memory of Oscar George Theodore Sonneck (1873–1928), former chief of the Music Division. Sonneck was a notable historian of American music, and the income from this fund is used to subsidize the publication of original research in American musical history. Chief of Music Division: Harold Spivacke.

b. The Public Library. A music collection for general circulation is maintained in this Library. It contains over 14,000 pieces of music, 10,000 books and scores, and 400 miniature scores. In addition there are two audition rooms where records from the collection of over 3500 disks may be heard. The Library also acts as a bureau for amateur musicians who wish to start or join ensembles of all kinds, and members of the staff give talks to local clubs and societies in addition to advising readers. Librarian: H. N. Peterson; Acting Music Librarian: G. R. Henderson, jun.

c. Folger Shakespeare Library. This famous collection includes copies of about half of all known Elizabethan printed music, together with MSS, books of history, theory and other material relating to the Shakespearian period. One of its most celebrated items is the unique 'First Book of Airs' by Thomas Morley. Other rare items of which this Library possesses the only known copies in America include Byrd's 'Songs of Sundry Natures' (1610), John Cosyn's 'Music of Six and Five Parts' (1585), John Day's 'Morning and Evening Prayer' (1565), Michael East's 'Madrigals to 3, 4 and 5 parts' (1604), Leighton's 'Tears or Lamentations . . .' (1614) and the superius part of the 'Recueil du mellange d'Orlande de Lassus' (1570), of which only one other part, the quintus, is extant (in the Bodleian Library at Oxford). There are three interesting commonplace books of the Elizabethan period — one for lute from John Dowland's library, one of madrigals by Weelkes, Wilbye, Morley, etc., and one of liturgical music containing several little-known 'In Nomines' of the 16th century. The Library also possesses a distinguished collection of MSS of Shakespearian operas, as well as settings and incidental music by a great many composers, past and present. The latter section includes John Playford's own copy of the songs in 'The Tempest' set by John Wilson. The Library is administered by the Trustees of Amherst College.

d. Pan-American Union. The Columbus Memorial Library. The Music Division of this Library has over 5500 items of music, including symphonic, chamber, instrumental, choral and popular music. The music section of the main book collection contains about 1500 books and pamphlets, and nearly 100 titles of journals. Much of this material relates especially to the music of North and South America, particularly the folk music of these regions. Librarian: Arthur E. Gropp.

WATERTOWN, MASS. Perkins Institution and Massachusetts School for the Blind. The special library here contains over 6000 pieces of music in Braille and an adequate library of books of and about music. The historical section has much rare information concerning the blind musicians of the past. The music is circulated not only in the Institution itself, but also throughout the U.S.A. Librarian: Nelson Coon; Musical Director: Paul L. Burgess.

WORCESTER, MASS. The American Antiquarian Society's Library has an interesting American Music section which includes some 35,000 pieces of sheet music and a large number of hymn-books. See C. Seegar in 'Notes' (Mar. 1948).

LATIN AMERICA

There is no doubt that there is a considerable amount of interesting source material for the study of music in the Latin-American countries, and even some fair-sized collections of music and literature of music, in the various national libraries, conservatories, etc., but at present we have definite information about only a few of these collections. Unfortunately the tropical climate and destructive insect life in some of the countries of Central and South America almost prohibits the survival of any really ancient source material, but there must be many interesting old collections still extant in some of the magnificent old monasteries and cathedrals erected in colonial times. The following list, for which we are largely indebted to Dr. F. C. Lange, of the Argentinian Institute of Musicology, and to Mr. Arthur E. Gropp, Librarian of the Columbus Memorial Library of the Pan-American Union, lists not only the collections about which we have definite information, but also the various national conservatories, etc., which are reported to have libraries, but of which exact details are lacking.

ARGENTINA

BUENOS AIRES. a. Conservatorio Nacional de Música y Declamación, Teatro Cervantes.

b. Conservatorio Municipal, Cangallo 2285.

MENDOZA. a. Universidad Nacional de Cuyo, Escuela Superior de Música, Instituto de Musicología. The Library here is steadily growing, as a practical working library for university studies. Director of Musicology: F. C. Lange.

b. Dr. F. C. Lange's own private collection is one of the most extensive in South America and includes many South American MSS, including the rare 18th-century Minas Gerais collection of part-books, amounting to some hundreds of items; many old theoretical works; periodicals, pamphlets, etc.; first editions; treatises from Spain and Portugal; photostats, microfilms and a very large collection of letters written to and from musicologists all over the world. He also has a small collection of native instruments.

TUCUMÁN. Conservatorio de Música, Universidad Nacional de Tucumán.

BOLIVIA

BRAZIL

RIO DE JANEIRO. a. Biblioteca Nacional. The National Library has recently formed a Music Division, and possesses some extremely interesting MSS and printed source material, including a number of first editions of the Viennese classics, brought over by Leopoldine of Austria, the wife of Pedro I. See J.M.W. (1949-50); also F. C. Lange in 'Revista de estudios musicales', No. 3 (Apr. 1950).

b. Escola Nacional de Musica, Rua de Passeio 98. This institution possesses a music library, with some interesting MSS by such Brazilian composers as Padre J. M. N. Garcia. There is also a collection of instruments. See J.M.W. (1949-50).

c. Conservatorio Nacional de Canto Orfeonico, Avenida Pasteur 350 (Urna).

d. The Carvalho Library. The former library of Senhor A. de Carvalho, which is now in public ownership, is very extensive, and includes MSS, much printed music, treatises, etc. So far as is known, the collection is not yet available for consultation.

SAO PAULO. a. Conservatorio Dramatico e Musical, Avenida São João 269.

b. Discoteca Municipal. There is a considerable collection of gramophone records in this establishment. Director: O. Alvarenga.

CHILE

SANTIAGO. a. Instituto de Extensión Musical de la Universidad de Chile. See J.M.W. (1949-50).

PANAMA CITY. Conservatorio Nacional de Música y Declamación.

PARAGUAY

ASUNCIÓN. Conservatorio de Música, Ateneo del Paraguay.

PERU

AREQUIPA. Escuela Regional de Música del Sur, Apartado 2957.

LIMA. a. Archiepiscopal Archives. This Library has a considerable collection of old music; some of the MSS have been transcribed by Professor A. Sas.

b. Conservatorio Nacional de Música, Minería 180.

TRUJILLO. Escuela Regional de Música del Norte.

REPÚBLICA DOMINICANA

CIUDAD TRUJILLO. Conservatorio Nacional de Música y Declamación, Isabel la Católica 17.

URUGUAY

MONTEVIDEO. a. Conservatorio Municipal.

b. Instituto Interamericano de Musicología, Casilla de Correo 540. This institution, founded by F. C. Lange, and now a dependency of the Facultad de Arquitectura of the University of Montevideo, has an extensive collection of books about music in the Americas, as well as music by American composers.

c. Servicio Oficial de Difusión Radio-eléctrico (SODRE). This radio station probably has the best collection of music and gramophone records in Uruguay.

VENEZUELA

CARACAS. Escuela Nacional de Música. There is a considerable collection of music in this institution; some of the older MSS have been transcribed and published by the Inter-american Institute of Musicology at Montevideo.

MARACAIBO. Academia de Música del Estado, Avenida Guayaquil 8.

THE BRITISH COMMONWEALTH

In some of the countries of the British Commonwealth there are young but growing music schools with libraries which may be small now, but which will undoubtedly expand in the near future. Some of these are listed below.

AFRICA

NAIROBI. The East African Conservatory of Music.

ROSEBANK, CAPE PROVINCE. The South African School of Music.

AUSTRALIA¹

SYDNEY, NEW SOUTH WALES. Besides the well-known Government Conservatorium of Music, Sydney possesses two other institutions interested in music and music literature: (a) The Public Library, which has a growing general collection, and (b) The Mitchell Library, which specializes in Australian music.

MELBOURNE, VICTORIA. The Melbourne Public Library has a well-equipped music division, which includes both books and music; among the latter are many of the collected editions.

BRISBANE, QUEENSLAND. Dr. R. Dalley-Scarlett's private library has many 18th-century editions of Handel, etc., as well as a good collection of modern orchestral scores, especially of the Russian School.

ADELAIDE, SOUTH AUSTRALIA. The Barr-Smith Library at the University of Adelaide contains many reference works on music, as well as a Carnegie Trust Collection. The Adelaide Reference Library also contains many works on music.

TASMANIA

The State Library of Tasmania has a good music section, especially of violin literature.

NEW ZEALAND

The four University centres of New Zealand at Auckland, Canterbury, Otago and Victoria, each make provision for the study of music, and are doing their best to build up representative collections.

ASIA: JAPAN

TOKYO. The Nanki Music Library and Auditorium, founded by the Marquis Tokugawa and built up by him from 1914 onwards, is not only one of the richest music collections in Asia, but also in the whole world, for it has as its nucleus some 450 rare works from the library of the famous English musicologist W. H. Cummings. Various catalogues of the collection have been published, in Japanese and English, in Tokyo, between 1917 and 1929. See 'Catalogue of the Nanki Musical Library, Books on Music', 2 vols. (1918-20); do., 'Musical Scores', 2 vols. (1917-20); 'Catalogue of the W. H. Cummings Collection in the Nanki Music Library' (1925); a more complete catalogue began to appear in 1929. C. L. C.

LIBRETTO (Ital., lit. a small book, Fr. livret, Ger. Textbuch). The name generally given to the book of words of an opera, oratorio or cantata. The name obviously came into general use because the words of the earliest operas were printed separately, as well as in the musical score, for the benefit of the audience who wished to follow them during performance. As the earliest operas were probably printed at the expense of the prince for whose entertainment they were composed, the librettos were printed in a dignified style and are generally about 8½ ins. in height; but after opera became a public spectacle the height was reduced to about 5½ ins., as in the case of Monteverdi's 'L' incoronazione di Poppea' (Venice, 1642), so that the diminutive form of the word became appropriate. The size of these word-books and the style of their typography have varied considerably at different periods and in different countries; for special state performances, librettos were sometimes printed on a sumptuous scale with numerous engravings of the scenic designs. In the 17th and 18th centuries librettos were much more read during performance than they are now in darkened theatres; but even in those days a wax taper was often needed, and many of the books which have survived show spots of candle-grease.

The sale of librettos was often a perquisite of the author, and the poets evidently regarded them as literary works in their own right; the name of the composer is generally relegated to an obscure situation, if not omitted altogether, and we often find passages in the drama which were not set to music at all.

The study of librettos has been very much neglected by most historians of opera, and it has been taken for granted that the vast majority of them are as literature beneath contempt. But the collation of scores with librettos is indispensable; scores are often deficient in stage directions and have no lists of characters; to understand the plots we often need the argomento, which is not a synopsis of the drama itself but a prefatory account of the situation which leads up to it before the opera begins. Title-pages, dedications and casts of singers supply much valuable information. The study of librettos by themselves helps us to understand the successive conventions on which the musical forms of operas are based, and in this connection it is always instructive to collate librettos, when possible, with the historical chronicles, novels or plays on which they are founded and observe the alterations which have been found necessary to adapt them to the exigencies of musical presentation.

The earliest Italian librettos, such as Rinuccini's 'Dafne' and 'Euridice', are derived from the pastoral dramas of the Renaissance, such as Poliziano's 'Orfeo'; they are mythological in subject and their acts, even if not so designated, are marked off by contemplative choruses commenting on the action as in ancient Greek tragedy. The chorus is integral to opera from the first, although in later periods it may tend to disappear altogether. Since the early operas were composed for princely festivities, a happy end was indispensable, however tragic the original story. The tragedy of blood, familiar in Elizabethan drama, is practically never to be found in opera until the 19th century; violent deaths take place off-stage and are related by messengers. The early operas are generally called favola, and tragedia is seldom to be found in Italy, though Monteverdi's 'Arianna' and Giacobbi's 'Andromeda' are so entitled; but the general principle is that even after mythology is abandoned the characters are princely and aristocratic. Comedy is appropriate only to the lower classes. Yet even the mythological operas do not entirely exclude comedy; there is generally some touch of humour about the ferryman Charon, if he appears.

As soon as opera descends from mythology to history, comic servants make their entry; the best-known example is in Monteverdi's 'Incoronazione di Poppea' (libretto by G. F. Busenello). The comic stammerer who is occasionally to be found points to the influence of the commedia dell'arte (Tartaglia, a Neapolitan mask), and the irruption of comic servants at incongruous moments belongs to the same tradition, although the fixed characters of the commedia do not appear in opera under their conventional names or in their conventional masks. This comic element, as in Shakespeare, persisted almost to the end of the 17th century. The subjects of Venetian opera, although ostensibly taken from history and set forth in the preliminary argomento, deal almost exclusively with the passion of love in various aspects; the first object of all operas was pleasure. Love and glory are also the main motives of the huge spectacular operas written and performed by Italians for the court of Vienna, where the spectacle was organized primarily for the glorification of the House of Habsburg. These were imitated at other German courts though on a less extravagant scale. The commercial opera at Venice was also spectacular, and for most of the spectators the scenic marvels constituted its main interest. Gradually the spectacle became secondary to the singing, as the great schools of Italian opera-singing developed and a larger supply of skilled singers became available. The attraction of the aria began quite early in the 17th century, and Mazzocchi, the composer of 'La catena d'Adone' (Rome, 1626), states frankly in his preface that the many "half-arias" (mezz'arie) break the tedium of the recitative. As the arias became more formal, the recitatives declined into a hurried conventionality.

The chief Italian librettists of the 17th century are Ottavio Rinuccini, Giovanni Chiabrera, Alessandro Striggio (for Peri, Monteverdi, etc.), Giovanni Francesco Busenello, Francesco Sbarra, Benedetto Ferrari, Aurelio Aureli (for Venetian composers), O. Tronsarelli (Rome), G. A. Moniglia (Florence), Nicola Minato and Matteo Noris (for Vienna). Monsignor Giulio Rospigliosi, afterwards Pope Clement IX, was a distinguished librettist for the Barberini family in Rome and author of 'Chi soffre speri', music by Mazzocchi and Marazzoli (Rome, 1639), the first real comic opera; it was witnessed by Mazarin and Milton.

A curious feature of practically all Italian librettos down to the beginning of the 19th century was the protesta, in which the poet protested that all words referring to classical religion such as Fato, Dei, Numi, etc., were merely poetical conceits and that he himself was a devout member of the Catholic Church; this indispensable item is sometimes comically expressed in Neapolitan dialect for comic operas produced at Naples.

The absurdities of many Italian librettos of the 17th century have often been pointed out, whereas their literary merits have been ignored except by a few Italian scholars. The plots, however extravagant, can find parallels in many of Shakespeare's plays, but the restrictions of the operatic form left little room for dramatic poetry in recitative, and the innumerable short arias required words in short rhymed lines that were more like epigrams. All Italian poetry in that century was largely disfigured by the affectations and conceits of the baroque style; what might be tolerated in an epic became ridiculous in the words of song. The spoken drama of Italy produced not a single dramatist of universal fame comparable to Corneille or Calderón, so that it is hardly surprising if the musical drama was equally undistinguished.

Spanish drama became known in Italy owing to the Spanish political dominion and had more influence than French drama (during most of the 17th century) on Italian opera; the emergence of a type of comedy opera half-way between opera seria and opera buffa is due partly to the older Italian pastoral and partly to Spanish comedy. Some of Alessandro Scarlatti's earlier operas are in this style, and it survived later in a few of Handel's such as 'Partenope' and 'Serse'.

FRENCH OPERA.—Italian opera, sung in Italian, had been introduced to Paris in 1645; the first germs of French opera are to be seen in the tragédies à machines of which Corneille's 'Andromède' (1650) is the earliest and the most distinguished example. 'Andromède', like the later English operas for which it was the model, is not an opera at all, but a mythological play with large quantities of incidental music designed to utilize the scenery and machinery which had been designed by Torelli for the Italian opera 'Orfeo' of Luigi Rossi. It was followed by various pastorales by Boyer with incidental music by Dassoucy and others. The French had the same difficulty as the English; their actors could not sing, so when an air was introduced it was sung by a singer in the wings and mimed by the actor on the stage. These plays were of high literary quality and the frequent employment of the alexandrine gave them a dignity lacking in the librettos of the Italians. French opera never suffered from the verbal extravagances of Italian seicentismo.

Dassoucy was both the author and composer of 'Les Amours d'Apollon et Daphné' (1650), a burlesque treatment of the classical myth which is nothing more or less than an opéra-comique with spoken dialogue exactly like those of the 18th century. It was described on the title-page as comédie en musique. The pastorale of Charles de Beys and Michel de La Guerre 'Le Triomphe de l'Amour' (1655) and its more famous successor the 'Pastorale d'Issy' of Perrin and Cambert (1659) were merely developments of the earlier comédies de chansons which, like the English jiggs, were made up of popular songs strung together without anything in the nature of recitative. The music of the 'Pastorale d'Issy', formerly regarded as the first French opera, is lost, but the libretto suggests at least a primitive approach towards recitative.

'Pomone' (Perrin and Cambert), which inaugurated the Académie Royale de Musique in 1671, was in five acts with a prologue in glorification of Louis XIV; this feature remained characteristic of French librettos throughout the reign. The words of 'Pomone' earned the contempt of Saint-Évremond. Lully, after collaborating with Molière in various comédies-ballets, had from the first the advantage of Philippe Quinault as poet for his operas. The early Italian librettists were aiming at an imaginary reconstruction of ancient Greek tragedy; Quinault took as his model the classic French drama and thereby established a tradition of dignity, clarity and elegance which lasted into the 19th century despite certain later lapses into empty rhetoric and formality. French librettos are characterized by the employment of the rhymed alexandrine as a basic metre, varied by shorter rhymed lines, so that recitative, to which French critics always attached the greatest importance, became both musical and dramatic, whereas in Italy, where it was unrhymed, it soon degenerated into formless conventionality.

ENGLAND.—Davenant's 'The Siege of Rhodes', the first English opera (1656), had been planned as a spoken drama in heroic couplets, but seems to have been modified to suit musical setting; the placing of songs and choruses at the ends of the acts, found also in Shirley's masque 'Cupid and Death' (1653), shows the influence of the French comédie-ballet. Shadwell's 'Psyche' (1674), a free adaptation of Molière's 'Psyché' for Locke, treats the musical element more dispersedly and picturesquely. Shadwell was an amateur composer himself and had his own ideas on the construction of an opera. Dryden's 'Albion and Albanus' (Grabu, 1685) combines the tradition of the English masque with that of the French allegorical prologue, of which it is really a three-act expansion. With 'King Arthur' (Purcell, 1691) Dryden solved the problem of the English opera of the Restoration period in which most of the principal actors do not sing at all. The only English operas of this time which are sung throughout are Blow's 'Venus and Adonis' (? 1684) — librettist unknown — and Purcell's 'Dido and Aeneas' (1689) with words by Nahum Tate, in both of which rhyme, as in the French operas, greatly assists the musical forms. Rhymed recitative persisted more or less in English opera and oratorio into the 18th century. The English type of opera, exemplified by 'King Arthur', did not die out with Purcell, but was continued in the 18th century by such dramatists as Thomas Durfey and Lord Lansdowne.

THE 18TH CENTURY: ITALY.—Apostolo Zeno, distinguished as an historian and man of letters, was court poet in Vienna from 1718 to 1729 and set himself to reform the Venetian type of libretto on the lines of French classical drama, more especially that of Corneille. His subjects were generally historical, and he showed a curious preference for subjects from the medieval Roman Empire, of course Italianizing the uncouth Teutonic names of his characters. Among these is an opera 'Ambleto', taken not from Shakespeare but from Saxo Grammaticus. He standardized the system by which a character who sings an aria invariably leaves the stage at the end of it; this rule, which sometimes provokes absurd situations, must have been imposed upon him by the singers. He was succeeded in Vienna by Pietro Metastasio, who continued on the same lines, but more under the influence of Racine, with more dramatic subtlety and with an exquisite elegance of literary style. Both poets, writing for court festivities, were obliged to flatter their imperial patrons by exalting the institution of monarchy; they concentrate on the heroic virtues and especially on the invariable magnanimity of emperors and kings. Their librettos were set to music over and over again, notably those of Metastasio, which dominated the entire operatic stage up to about 1780. Metastasio was a poet and dramatist of genius, still regarded as a classic of Italian literature; during his lifetime his librettos were often acted in Italy as spoken plays, and he tells us himself that they were much more effective in this form. Their artificialities, which seemed so ridiculous to later generations, were due in the main to their courtly origin and largely to the vanity of singers. Metastasio himself had a good understanding of music, and some of his letters give copious and detailed instructions to composers on the treatment of accompanied recitative. He makes no secret of his contempt for the exaggerated bravura of the singers. It is evident, however, that his musical tastes were very conservative and that he made no attempt to keep abreast of what were then the modern developments in music.

The burning question of the day was whether poetry or music should have the upper hand in opera, and the literature of this controversy in Italy and France, and even in Germany and England, is enormous. The clearest exposition of the operatic principle is to be found in the "Saggio sopra l'opera in musica" by Francesco Algarotti, written in 1755 but apparently not published until 1763. Algarotti was a much-travelled man of wide culture and great practical experience of the theatre. His attitude towards opera is strongly French, and it was perhaps his close contact with England that gave him a certain touch of artistic puritanism. The poet, he says, must be the creator and director of the whole opera; the musician's function is merely to give colour and intensity to his words. Algarotti's outlook is evidently conservative; he inveighs against "modern" opera for its exaggerated musical virtuosity both instrumental and vocal, and he rightly censures the managers for their total lack of artistic integrity. The appearance of this essay caused the author to be invited to Parma, where he supervised the reconstruction of the court theatre, and his visit coincided with the production of two operas by Traetta based on Italian adaptations of French librettos already set by Rameau. Despite his admiration for the ideals of Rinuccini and Peri, Algarotti was not in favour of mythological subjects, since opera of that type easily degenerated into a masquerade; nor did he approve of historical operas, since vocal display was inappropriate to real personages. He prefers the scene to be laid in some remote country such as South America, Egypt or China; he would no doubt have approved of 'Aida', as he mentions Graun's 'Montezuma' as a good example to follow. This was perhaps intended to flatter his former patron, Frederick the Great, who had sketched the scenario of it in French. The essential, he maintains, is truth to human nature, for which he cites as models Pergolesi's 'Serva padrona' and his serious aria 'Se cerca, se dice'; these examples show at once that he was influenced by Rousseau and the Guerre des Bouffons in Paris.

The reform of opera often supposed to have been brought about by the single-handed efforts of Gluck represented the triumph of French operatic principles over those of Italy. Metastasio had been influenced by French drama, but not by French opera; the new style came about by the translation and adaptation into Italian of French librettos. Calzabigi, who wrote the Italian libretto of 'Orfeo' for Gluck in 1762, was a devoted admirer of Metastasio as a poet; the novelty of his Italian 'Orfeo' was the application of French principles and the French lay-out of choruses and ballets, hitherto almost entirely neglected in Italian librettos, except in the operas of Jommelli for Stuttgart, where the extravagance of the monarch and the geographical proximity to France encouraged the spectacular effects characteristic of French opera. Opera seria has always been the product of a courtly environment, and as the century drew towards the era of the French Revolution and incessant warfare had forced most of the princely patrons to reduce their expenditure, its vogue and importance declined in favour of popular comic opera. In Italy we can trace two tendencies in serious opera, the one Italian and conservative, the other progressive and French; but neither school produced either librettists or composers of any great distinction.

Comic opera, as we have seen, began in Italy comparatively early, but it could take no firm root until it could become independent of princely patronage. The first mention of a comic opera in Neapolitan dialect occurs only through a newspaper report of 1707; this was 'La Cilla' (author and composer unknown), which was acted privately in a prince's palace. By 1709 comic operas in dialect had found a home of their own at the Teatro de' Fiorentini, and a few years later at the Teatro Nuovo. The chief librettists were Niccolò Corvo (under the pseudonym of Agasippo Mercotellis), Francesco Antonio Tullio (Colantuono Feralentisco) and Bernardo Saddumene. The scheme of these librettos is clearly derived from the earlier comedy operas in Italian such as those of A. Scarlatti, but the characters are drawn from lower ranks of life to whom the local dialect was more appropriate. There was, however, nearly always a certain mixture of dialect and pure Italian, and the more serious characters tended more and more towards the literary language. The opera buffa was never derived from the comic intermezzi of the serious operas, as has often been said; Pergolesi's 'La serva padrona' (which is not in dialect) is an intermezzo, completely different in dramatic form from his full-length comic operas. Goldoni tells us that in 1734, the year after the first appearance of 'La serva padrona', Imer, the director of the Teatro Grimani at Venice, hit on the idea of inserting sung intermezzi between the acts of spoken plays; Goldoni wrote several of these (often in Venetian dialect) before he became famous as a writer of comedies. From 1740 onwards Goldoni was a prolific writer of librettos for comic operas, some original, others adapted from his plays. He had been preceded at Venice by G. M. Buini, a Bolognese who was composer, librettist and impresario as well in his native city. Buini's comic librettos are farcically extravagant and often contain a great deal of Bolognese dialect. Buini seems to have been the first librettist to write comic librettos about opera singers and their absurdities; he was no doubt led to this subject by the publication of Marcello's satire 'Il teatro alla moda'. Goldoni was a much more skilful dramatist, and we must ascribe either to him or to Galuppi, with whom he often collaborated, the standardization of the comic opera finale brought to perfection by da Ponte and Mozart. Da Ponte modelled himself on Goldoni, but certainly surpassed him for wit and elegance in 'Cosi fan tutte'; Goldoni did not take much trouble over his librettos and put the best of his genius into his spoken comedies. The wittiest of all comic librettists was G. B. Casti, whose librettos were set by Paisiello and Salieri in Vienna; Casti's new contribution to the stage was the presentation of historical characters in a ridiculous light ('Il Re Teodoro in Venezia', 'Catilina' and 'Cublai').

COMIC OPERA IN FRANCE.—French comic opera begins early in the 18th century with the vaudevilles of the Théâtre de la Foire to which Charles-Simon Favart (1710-92) was the first to give literary shape. Favart's life covers nearly the whole of his century and he may justly be regarded as the creator of French opéra-comique. His first libretto was 'Les Deux Jumelles' (1734); after the famous visit of the Italian company in 1752 he continued to write librettos for Duni, Philidor and Grétry. Rousseau was himself the author of his intermède 'Le Devin du village' of 1752, intended as an imitation of 'La serva padrona', but thoroughly French in style, except that it had sung recitatives. But this example was not followed, and from Duni's 'Le Peintre amoureux de son modèle' (1757) onwards French comic opera always had spoken dialogue. Italian opera buffa had evolved from opera seria; hence its convention of sung recitative. French opéra-comique came from the comédie mêlée d'ariettes, a name by which it was very generally described; it preserved the traditions of spoken comedy, and whereas in Italy the music was generally much better than the play, in France the reverse was often the case. The chief librettists were J. M. Sedaine, L. Anseaume, A. H. Poinciset, later on J. F. Marmontel, J. M. Boutet de Monvel and B. J. Marsollier. Their librettos were mostly founded on plays and novels, and towards the later years of the century the influence of comédie larmoyante makes itself more and more apparent. Typical examples are Marsollier's 'Nina' and 'Camille', both set by Dalayrac, and both translated into Italian and set by Italians (Paisiello and Paer); indeed these mark the transition to romantic opera.

BEGINNINGS OF ROMANTIC OPERA.—The romantic element (though it is impossible to define it exactly) makes its appearance first in France and in the librettos of comic opera long before we can find any music which strikes us now as romantic in style and technique. Goldoni's play 'Pamela nubile' (after Richardson's novel), the source of Piccini's 'La buona figliuola' (1760), marks the starting-point of sentimental comedy; Grétry's 'Zémire et Azor' (Beauty and the Beast, 1771) shows the influence of the 'Arabian Nights', and his 'Richard Cœur de Lion' (1784) may be called the first "rescue opera", a type of story which was to dominate opera in various countries until well on into the following century. The rescue opera turns on the delivery of a character, male or female, who has been unjustly imprisoned by a cruel tyrant; the rescuer, who is generally of the opposite sex to the prisoner, encounters various difficulties and the final release is generally brought about by a deus ex machina in the shape of some official representative of law and order. The scheme goes back to classical Greek tragedy, but the environment can vary according to the fashion of the day. The rescue opera attained its greatest popularity in the time of the French Revolution, when hairbreadth escapes and heroic self-sacrifice were fairly common occurrences in daily life. The best-known example is 'Fidelio', which was based on a French libretto itself based on actual contemporary fact. A favourite source of rescue librettos was the mélodrame invented by R. G. de Pixérécourt, from which the typical English "transpontine" melodrama was derived; these were plays with incidental music, generally by obscure composers, the main object of which was to inculcate moral virtues in a popular way. The insistence on ordinary moral virtues is highly characteristic of romantic opera both in France and elsewhere; it was not until the early days of Victor Hugo that the passion of love was made to predominate over all normal moral principle.

OPERA IN GERMANY.—The first German opera was the 'Daphne' of Schütz (1627) on an adaptation of Rinuccini's 'Dafne' by Martin Opitz. The next recorded is the "spiritual pastoral" 'Seelewig' by Staden on a libretto by Ph. Harsdörffer (Nuremberg, 1644) showing a mixture of the older German moral school plays and the Italian pastoral style. The first operas performed at Hamburg, where a public opera-house flourished from 1678 to 1738, were also on religious subjects influenced by the school drama. The Hamburg repertory was extensive and cosmopolitan; French and Italian operas were given, sometimes in the original languages and sometimes in German translations. German librettos were also written for Keiser and other composers, but largely based on Venetian originals. The chief poets were C. H. Postel, F. C. Bressand, L. von Bostel and Barthold Feind. There is little in these operas which is characteristically German; it was the aim of both poets and composers to produce as Italian an entertainment as they could. German comic opera or Singspiel begins in 1743 with C. F. Weisse's translation of the English ballad opera 'The Devil to Pay'; the succeeding generation of Singspiele took practically all its librettos from French sources in northern Germany, but the South German and Viennese composers adapted Italian librettos as well. The Viennese type of fantastic opera, of which 'Die Zauberflöte' is the classical example, was much influenced by the fiabe or fairy-plays of Carlo Gozzi, which were translated into German in 1777 and greatly admired by the leaders of German romantic literature. Towards the end of the 18th century there were various attempts at German serious opera by Schweitzer, Holzbauer, Naumann and others, but they were at the mercy of their librettists, who could produce only German imitations of Metastasio or of the French librettists who carried on the traditions of Calzabigi and Gluck. The French style led towards a frequent employment of choral pageantry, and the German poets contributed a characteristic touch of philosophical symbolism and ethical aspiration.

ROMANTIC OPERA.—In the romantic period we soon begin to see the influence of Shakespeare, Ossian, Schiller, Byron and Scott. The earliest Shakespearean opera (if indeed we may call it Shakespearean) was 'Georget et Georgette' by C. G. Alexandre (1761) to a libretto by Harny de Guerville, two scenes of which are taken from a French translation of Shadwell's operatic additions to 'The Tempest'. The same year saw the production of 'Les Deux Amies' (words by Antoine Bret, music by Papavoine), an opéra-comique in three acts based on 'The Merry Wives of Windsor', but with altered names; it was given once only and its failure was ascribed (though doubtfully) to its bad libretto. In 1792, when Shakespeare had come to be much better known in France, Boutet de Monvel wrote a libretto ('Tout pour l'amour') on 'Romeo and Juliet' for Dalayrac. This was followed by several other operas both French and Italian on the same play; 'Othello' was another favourite source of operas, that of Rossini (Venice, 1818) being the most famous until it was treated by Boito and Verdi. The first 'Macbeth' is that of Chelard to a libretto by Rouget de Lisle (1827).

Ossian provided librettos for Lesueur ('Ossian, ou Les Bardes', 1804) and Méhul ('Uthal', 1806), also for Winter's German opera 'Colmal' (1809), Schiller's 'Die Räuber' (1781) was not adapted for opera until 1836 (Mercadante's 'I briganti'); 'Wilhelm Tell' (1804) was the source of Rossini's opera, but was preceded by the 'Guillaume Tell' of Grétry (libretto by Sedaine, 1791). The first opera after Scott was Rossini's 'La donna del lago' (libretto by A. L. Tottola, 1819); the first "Byronic" operas were the two German operas entitled 'Der Vampyr' (Marschner and Lindpaintner, both 1828) founded on Polidori's 'The Vampyre', at that time attributed to Byron.

In the 18th century French critics often said of Shakespeare that such outrageous things as the storm in 'King Lear' and the witches in 'Macbeth' were only permissible in opera. Romantic opera accepted them with delight, but France had already provided the musical technique for them in the operas of Rameau and his contemporaries. The idea of romanticism came originally from England; French anglomania passed it from literature to opera, and the development of romantic opera in Italy and even in Germany, generally regarded as the most romantic-minded of all countries, must be traced in the habitual borrowing of librettos from France which naturally led to the borrowing of French styles of musical technique. The tradition of opera seria lingered longest in Italy, where it died out with Rossini's 'Semiramide', though that very libretto was based on a tragedy of Voltaire. The chief difference between Italian and German romantic opera lies in the fact that while Germany revelled in the supernatural (which included a supernatural view of the forces of nature), Italy rejected it altogether.

A curious type of Italian romantic opera is the opera semiseria, derived originally from Dalayrac's 'Nina' and often including a psychological study of lunacy or somnambulism both male and female. The mad hero may indeed be traced back to the much earlier operas based on Ariosto's 'Orlando furioso'. An outstanding example is Paer's 'Agnese di Fitzhenry' (1809), founded on a story by Mrs.

Opie. Despite the intense seriousness with which the mad character was treated, such operas always included the typical Italian basso buffo; in 'Agnese' the patient is attended by two physicians both of whom are comic characters. A ludicrous example of opera semiseria is Donizetti's 'Emilia di Liverpool' (1824); like Bellini's early opera 'Adelson e Salvini' it exhibits the highly romantic idea that Italians had of the British Isles. In Paer's 'Leonora', an Italian adaptation of Bouilly's 'Léonore' anterior to 'Fidelio', Rocco is treated frankly as a buffo part even when describing to Leonora the sufferings of Florestan in prison. Bellini's 'La sonnambula' had various predecessors of both sexes.

Typically German romanticism, with emphasis on the supernatural, begins with Spohr's 'Faust' (composed 1813 though first performed in 1816) on a libretto by J. K. Bernard, not based on Goethe, and continues with E. T. A. Hoffmann's 'Undine' (1816) for which F. de La Motte Fouqué himself adapted his well-known story. Weber's 'Der Freischütz' (libretto by Friedrich Kind, 1821), usually regarded as the foundation of German opera, is much more a melodrama with copious incidental music. The output of German romantic operas was enormous; their librettos are often very comical to read, and their music has been almost completely forgotten even in Germany. Weber's 'Euryanthe' (1823) is notorious for its bad libretto by Helmine von Chézy, but its faults were due largely to Weber's own insistence on the supernatural element.

In France the most prolific librettist was Eugène Scribe, both for serious and comic opera. He was also an accomplished writer of well-made plays, and his librettos, for all their conventionality, are always clear in style and dramatically effective. He developed the historico-political type of opera which may be said to have begun with Spontini's 'La Vestale' (1807) and 'Fernand Cortez' (1809), both on librettos by Étienne de Jouy. In 1828 Scribe collaborated with Auber in 'La Muette de Portici', followed in 1833 by 'Gustave III, ou Le Bal masqué'; for Meyerbeer he wrote 'Robert le Diable' (1831), 'Les Huguenots' (1836), 'Le Prophète' (1849) and 'L'Africaine' (1865, but begun as early as 1838). Scribe also wrote a quantity of comic librettos for Auber, the best of which is probably 'Fra Diavolo' (1830). In Germany Wagner's 'Rienzi' is the most conspicuous example of political opera in Scribe's manner. In Italy popular romantic feeling expressed itself mainly in politics, but political opera was severely banned by the authorities and no opera dealing with conspiracy, revolution or regicide could pass the censorship. The word "libertà" was not allowed to be sung under pain of imprisonment, but "patria" could hardly be suppressed, and any opera in which it occurred was taken up by the audience with enthusiasm.

German romantic librettists were hampered by the clumsiness and intractability of their language; the Italians showed only too much determination to be poetical at all costs, and their librettos were often ridiculously affected and involved in diction, while the composers, turning out operas with incredible rapidity and carelessness, showed little consideration of the sense of words as long as their music provided vocal display. The one outstanding exception is Felice Romani, author of some 200 librettos, many of them adaptations, but a poet of rare elegance, clarity and psychological subtlety in those which he wrote for Bellini. Bellini regarded him as indispensable for his own melodic invention; Romani evidently guessed clearly what sort of melody Bellini was likely to write, and his words always seem to fall into exactly the right place for their musical expression. Bellini's most touching melodies have always a conversational intimacy which he derived perhaps from French composers such as Dalayrac and certain famous arias of Pergolesi. The new French romantic drama of Victor Hugo was utilized first by Romani for Donizetti's 'Lucrezia Borgia' (1833), by G. Rossi for Mercadante's 'Il giuramento' (1836) and by F. M. Piave for Verdi's 'Ernani' (1844) and 'Rigoletto' (1851), starting the fashion for tragic dramas of violent passion.

About the middle of the century four composers in four different countries inaugurated a new orientation of opera at a moment when general social conditions had degraded opera to a state of commercialism. Berlioz's 'Les Troyens' was composed in 1856-58, Wagner's 'Tristan und Isolde' in 1865, Boito's 'Mefistofele' in 1868 and Mussorgsky's 'Boris Godunov' in 1868-69. All four were received with hostility at the time and are recognized now as works of lofty idealism and integrity such as had not been seen in the theatre since 'Fidelio'. It is noteworthy that in all cases the composer wrote his own libretto. All four authors were completely independent of each other, and the only conceivable common source of their ethical inspiration is Beethoven, not in 'Fidelio' but in his complete musical personality. As a composer Boito, like Mussorgsky, was technically amateurish; as a poet he was supremely accomplished in the manipulation of words and metres, with a wide literary and philosophical culture. 'Mefistofele', and still more 'Nerone', of which the music was unfinished at his death, are somewhat overloaded with erudition; his most effective librettos are those which he wrote for Verdi, 'Otello' and 'Falstaff'. Without Boito's collaboration Verdi could never have achieved the complete freedom from conventions which is the characteristic of his two last operas. In modern times

French literature and drama have again served as the basis of the most effective Italian operas; verismo, the often crude and brutal presentation of low life, inconceivable to Verdi, was derived fundamentally from 'Carmen', and both Mascagni and Puccini made use of librettos based on French originals. Both Pizzetti and Malipiero have in most cases written their own librettos, a practice which has always made for integrity of style provided that the composer has the necessary literary ability.

In France the conventional tradition of Scribe was carried on by J. Barbier and M. Carré in frequent collaboration. L. Gallet wrote librettos for Bizet, Saint-Saëns, Gounod and Massenet from 1872 onwards; in 1891 he wrote 'Le Rêve' for Bruneau. Bruneau was a close friend of Émile Zola; 'Le Rêve' is based on one of his novels and he himself wrote the libretto of 'Messidor' (1897). Gallet was the first French librettist to write a libretto in prose.

Wagner, when he broke away from the conventional romanticism of 'Lohengrin', found himself obliged to invent a German poetic diction of his own for his mythological dramas based on short alliterative lines; but his successors found it impossible to carry on this idiom without incurring ridicule.

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY.—The new century could not escape the overwhelming influence of Wagner even when poets and composers reacted violently against his ideas. The most determined opposition was proclaimed by Debussy with 'Pelléas et Mélisande', the libretto of which is a slightly abridged version of Maeterlinck's prose drama; it repudiates all idea of conventional arias, ensembles and so on, but it could hardly have come into existence but for the principles of Wagner's "music-drama" as opposed to "opera". In Germany Richard Strauss adopted the same principle, though with far different musical technique, in 'Salome' (1905), with a German translation of Oscar Wilde's drama in French. 'Elektra' (1909) was a setting of a drama in verse by Hugo von Hofmannsthal, who wrote several more librettos for Strauss. Hofmannsthal was an accomplished poet and playwright, and his librettos have high literary distinction. His published correspondence with Strauss is most illuminating on the problems of libretto-writing; he insists that he must write his poems "for himself", if possible to be performed first as plays, and that he cannot begin by writing them as "librettos" planned at once to suit the composer's musical requirements.

German opera, especially after 1920, produced many strange experiments, not all of them successful, though often interesting. Alban Berg in 'Wozzeck' (1925, but written earlier) takes scenes from Büchner's prose play unaltered. The general tendency in recent times has been to make every effort to emphasize the interest of librettos and no longer to regard them as mere pegs on which to hang music. Even the more deliberately commercial types of opera did their best to strengthen the libretto (following the example of Puccini) by means of violent action and scenes of brutality. A characteristic of German opera has been the German tendency to symbolism and some sort of philosophical theory; its genuine idealism must command respect, but in actual practice it led only too often to obscurity and diffuseness.

ENGLISH OPERA.—From the first importation of Italian opera in the reign of Queen Anne until the present day English opera has had a hard struggle for existence, and the history of English librettos is more interesting for their absurdities than for genuine dramatic merit. The most notable English libretto, if one can so call it, is 'The Beggar's Opera' of John Gay, which is much more of a play than an opera. The best author of ballad operas in the 18th century is Isaac Bickerstaffe. Arne's own translation of Metastasio's 'Artaserse' has a certain literary distinction, but that type of opera had no successors. The English romantic operas which began with Barnett's 'The Mountain Sylph' (1834) were mostly modelled on French opéra-comique in form, and the result was that their librettos often read more like bad translations than like original works.

For serious English opera there was no traditional model, and the librettists, even when they wrote in good English, were unable to evolve a national style for opera and could only imitate foreign conventional models. Some could write pleasant lyrics, but were awkward and undramatic in recitative. The only successful librettos of the 19th century were those of W. S. Gilbert for Sullivan's comic operas, though their wit has by now become somewhat obscure to modern listeners owing to its momentary topicality. And they are not contributory to a national tradition of opera because their whole intention was to make opera in itself ridiculous; their enormous popularity, as has often been pointed out, has been positively damaging to the cause of serious opera in English. Rutland Boughton's 'The Immortal Hour' (1914), adapted closely from plays and poems of "Fiona Macleod" (William Sharp), set a new standard in employing a text of real poetic value, as Debussy and Strauss had done a few years before. Since 1945 several new experiments in libretto have been tried which show that modern English composers are determined to take the problem of the libretto seriously. Men of letters like Arnold Bennett, J. B. Priestley and E. M. Forster have written librettos.

TRANSLATIONS.—The earliest known translation of an opera is the English version of Cambert's 'Ariane' (1674), made for performance in London; but the opera was sung in French and the translation was intended only for readers. Chiabrera's libretto 'Il rapimento di Cefalo' (set by Caccini, 1600) had been translated into French in 1608, but this appears to have been merely a literary publication not acted either as a play or an opera. The first instance of an opera translated for performance with the original music (disregarding translations made for new musical setting such as Opitz's German version of 'Dafne') is an Italian translation of Lully's 'Armide' made in 1690 for performance in Rome. Steffani's 'Enrico Leone' of 1688 was sung in German in 1696 and followed by other German versions of Steffani's operas. A. Scarlatti's 'Pirro e Demetrio' (1694) was sung in German in 1700 and in English (though partly in Italian) in 1708; Bononcini's 'Camilla' (1696) had several performances in English between 1706 and 1728. The 'Omphale' of Destouches (1700) was given in German at Hamburg in 1724, and most of Handel's operas were performed there in German. Translation became widespread only after the popularity of 'La serva padrona', which was sung during the 18th century in French, English, German, Dutch, Polish and Swedish. Later on translations of French and Italian comic operas are innumerable, as well as free adaptations.

With the great development of national opera-houses in the 19th century all the standard operas were translated, and in modern times the popular works have been sung in a great many languages—'La Traviata' in sixteen. Translations have seldom reached a high standard and have often been notoriously bad, but it has always been found very difficult to get improved translations accepted owing to the reluctance of singers to learn them, and still more owing to the miserable remunerations offered by managers and publishers. In recent years good English translations have been made by R. H. Elkin, Geoffrey Dunn, H. Procter Gregg and Norman Tucker.¹ E. J. D.

LICENZA (Ital., licence, freedom, liberty). Up to the 18th century a licenza was a cadenza or ornament inserted into a piece of music at the performer's choice and not written out by the composer; also, in the 17th and 18th centuries, a musical epilogue to, or insertion into, an opera or other stage work with special reference to a patron's birthday, wedding or other festive occasion. The later expressions con alcuna licenza (singular) and con alcune licenze (plural) mean either that a work has been written according to some prescribed form, but without strict adherence to it (Beethoven, "Hammerclavier" Sonata, Op. 106, finale) or that a piece is to be performed somewhat freely in the matter of tempo or expression (Tchaikovsky, fifth Symphony, slow movement).

LICETTE, Miriam (b. Chester, 9 Sept. 1892).

English soprano singer. She studied singing with Mathilde Marchesi, Jean de Reszke and Sabbatini. In 1911 she made her début in Rome in the title-part of Puccini's 'Madama Butterfly', and she sang with success in several cities of Italy, as well as in Paris and Amsterdam, before she appeared in London in 1915. She then joined the Beecham Opera Company and made a deep impression by the beauty of her voice and style, especially in Mozart, where she was an ideal Countess Almaviva and Pamina. She remained in that company until it was succeeded by the British National Opera Company, in which she continued to appear as prima donna.

LICHARD, Milan (b. Uhorská Skalica, Slovakia, 24 Feb. 1853; d. Užhorod [now Subcarpathian Ukraine], 21 Apr. 1935).

Slovak composer and writer on folksong. He was educated in Uhorská Skalica, Velka Revúca and Sopron, and after reading law and studying music in Budapest, he became a railway official. In 1919 he lived at Bratislava and from 1921 permanently at Užhorod, where he became president of the press department and also worked as a choral conductor until 1927. He belonged to the early group of Slovak composers and made every effort on behalf of Slovak folksongs. Several of his partsongs are reprinted in the collection of Miloš Ruppeldt. He also edited 'Six Garlands of Slovak Folksong' (1900) in the appropriate modes of their tunes. He devoted much work to the examination of the true modal and rhythmical character of Slovak folksongs. His studies appeared in the 'Slovenské pohľady' ('Slovak Review') and in 'Sborník Matice Slovenskej' ('Magazine of the Slovak Society'); several were published in separate reprints, e.g. 'Príspevky k teorii slovenskej ľudovej piesne' ('Contributions to the Theory of the Slovak Folksong') (1934). He also prepared a collective book on this subject.

An interesting article on Slovak songs by Milan Lichard appeared in a pamphlet entitled 'Slovak Peasant Art and Melodies' (reprinted from Professor Seton-Watson's 'Racial Problems in Hungary,' London, 1911).

LICHFIELD, Henry (b. ?; d. ?).

English 16th-17th-century composer. He published:

The First Set of Madrigals of 5 Parts; apt for both Viols and Voyces. Newly composed by Henry Lichfield London: Printed for M. L., I. B. and T. S. the Assignes of W. Barley 1613.

The volume was dedicated to Lady Cheney, or Cheney, of Toddington House, near Luton. Lord Cheney died many years earlier, in 1587. The widow survived till 1614. Lichfield may have been resident musician at Toddington, but it is more likely that he was household steward and that, like Henry Ward, he was an amateur musician. Lady Cheney bequeathed a legacy of £20 to Lichfield. Lichfield is one of the smaller figures among the English madrigalists, yet some of his works are pleasant to sing. Perhaps the best of the set is 'I always loved to call my lady Rose'.

E. H. F.

The contents of Lichfield's book of 5-part madrigals (1613) are as follows¹:

1. All ye that sleep in pleasure.
2. Shall I seek to ease my grief?
- { 3. The shepherd Claius (Pt. i).
- { 4. First with looks he lived (Pt. ii).
5. Ay me, that life should yet remain.
6. O my grief, were it disclosed.
7. I always loved to call my lady Rose.
8. O come, shepherds, all together.
9. Sweet Daphne, stay thy flying.
10. Alas, my Daphne, stay.
11. Ay me, when to the air.
12. Arise, sweet heart.
- { 13. When first I saw those cruel eyes (Pt. i).
- { 14. If this be love (Pt. ii).
15. Cruel, let my heart be blessed.
- { 16. A silly sylvan (Pt. i).
- { 17. The sylvan justly suffered (Pt. ii).
18. Injurious hours!
19. Whist that my lovely Daphne.
20. My heart oppressed.

LICHTENSTEIN, Karl August von (b. Lahm, Franconia, 8 Sept. 1767; d. Berlin, 16 Sept. 1845).

German theatre manager and composer. He studied music under Forkel at Göttingen. He served in the English army, returning to Germany in 1793 as gentleman of the bed-chamber at the court of Hanover, where he produced his opera 'Glück und Zufall', of which he had written both words and music. In 1798 he became intendant of the court theatre at Dessau, which, under his management, became a model theatre for all Germany. In about 1800 he was for some time co-director with Baron von Braun of the Vienna court theatres. After a period of directorship of the Bamberg theatre, he took over in 1823 the stage management of the playhouse and in 1825 that of the Opera in Berlin. He composed a number of operas and Singspiele, produced in Berlin, Dresden and elsewhere.

LICHTENSTEIN - KASTELKORN (Liechtenstein-Kastellkorn), Karl (b. Glatz, 8 Apr. 1624; d. Olomouc, 23 Sept. 1695).

Moravian art-patron. From his youth he was destined for the Roman Catholic priesthood, and in 1664 he was elected Prince-Bishop of Olomouc (Moravia). At his residence at Kroměříž he had a well-known musical chapel which, thanks to his generosity, became an important centre of baroque music in central Europe. H. von Biber and, after his departure to Salzburg, Pavel Vejvanovský were the leading men of this chapel.

LICHTENTHAL, Peter (b. Pressburg, 10 May 1780; d. Milan, 18 Aug. 1853).

Austrian amateur composer and writer on music. He was a doctor of medicine by profession, having studied for it in Vienna. He wrote several books on music and musical subjects, and settled at Milan, where in 1826 he produced his important 'Dizionario e biografia della musica', which was followed by several other theoretical, aesthetic and biographical works.

Lichtenthal composed five ballets for the Teatro alla Scala at Milan, chamber music, pianoforte pieces, church music, songs, etc.

LICHTENWANGER, William John (b. Asheville, N.C., 28 Feb. 1915).

American music librarian. He was educated at the University of Michigan (M.M., 1940), where from 1938 to 1940 he was chief librarian of the University School of Music. Since 1940, except during military service (1941–1945), he has been Assistant Reference Librarian in the Music Division, Library of Congress. In 1946 he became Associate Editor of the Music Library Association's quarterly 'Notes', and he was contributing editor of the music department of 'The Collier Encyclopedia' (New York, 1949–50). Other publications include contributions to 'Church Music and Musical Life in Pennsylvania in the 18th Century' (Philadelphia, 1926–47) and to newspapers and magazines. He was the editor and chief compiler of 'A Bibliography of Asiatic Musics', issued serially in 'Notes' (1947–50).

LICKL. Austrian family of musicians.

(1) Johann Georg Lickl (b. Korneuburg, Lower Austria, 11 Apr. 1769; d. Pécs, 12 May 1843), composer. He joined Schikaneder's theatre "auf der Wieden" in Vienna as a young man, and from 1789 to 1802 contributed music to about a dozen plays and operettas performed there, such as 'Der Zauberpfeil' (one of the many imitations of 'The Magic Flute') in 1793, 'Der Bruder von Kakran', 1797, 'Der vermeinte Hexenmeister', 1800, and 'Der Brigitta-Kirchtag', 1802. Of his incidental music the songs, &c. for a 5-act play by Voll, 'Fausts Leben, Taten und Höllenfahrt' (1799), an early musical adaptation of that favourite subject, is of some literary interest. Lickl produced another opera, 'Slawina von Pommern', at the Leopoldstadt Theatre in 1812, and then left Vienna about 1806 to become church chapelmaster at Pécs (Fünfkirchen) in Hungary. Some string quartets of his were published by André at Offenbach.

(2) Karl Georg Lickl (b. Vienna, 28 Oct. 1801; d. Vienna, 3 Aug. 1877), son of the preceding. He was a composer and a performer on the "Physharmonica".

(3) Aegidius Ferdinand Karl Lickl (b. Vienna, 1 Sept. 1803; d. Trieste, 22 July 1864), brother of the preceding. He settled at Trieste, where an opera, 'La disfida di Barletta' (1848), and an oratorio, 'Il trionfo del Cristianismo' (1855), were performed with great success.

LIDARTI, Cristiano Giuseppe (b. Pisa, ?; d. ?).

Italian 18th-century violoncellist and composer. He lived, according to Burney, at Pisa in 1770 and for some time in Vienna. Judging from the number of compositions published in London, as well as a fine portrait of him, apparently the work of an English painter, now in the possession of W. E. Hill & Sons, he must have been in London between 1768 and 1780. Although represented therein as a cellist, he wrote apparently no solo work for that instrument, his compositions consisting of violin and flute sonatas, duets, trios, quartets, a sonata for viola pomposa, an aria with orchestra and some catches and glees. The score of a serenata, 'La tutela contrastata fra Giunone, Marte, e Mercurio, col giudizio di Giove', dated 1767, is preserved in Vienna.

LIDHOLM, Ingvar (Natanael) (b. Jönköping, 24 Feb. 1921).

Swedish violinist, conductor and composer. He studied at the Stockholm Conservatory from 1940 to 1946: violin and ensemble playing with Charles Barkel, 1943; theory and composition with Hilding Rosenberg (1942–44) and conducting with Tor Mann. During this period he composed incidental music to a play, 'På konungens slott'. He played viola in the Royal Orchestra, 1943-46, and was awarded a state stipend in 1946 and a Jenny Lind stipend in 1947 which enabled him to study composition in Switzerland, Italy and France. Since 1947 he has been municipal conductor at Örebro. He first became generally known as a composer with a 'Toccata e canto' for chamber orchestra in 1944. His other compositions include 'Laudi' for chorus, 1947; Concerto for string orchestra (first performed in 1949); a string Quartet, 1945; Sonata for flute solo, 1946; pianoforte Sonata in A minor, 1947; and songs. K. D.

LIDL (Lidel), Andreas (b. Vienna, c. 1740; d. ? London, ?).

Austrian baryton player. He was one of the greatest virtuosi on his instrument, the wire strings at the back of which he increased to twenty-seven. After visiting all the big continental cities, he made his début in London in 1778 with great success, and appears to have remained there till his death, which occurred some time before 1789. He wrote a considerable number of quintets, quartets, trios, duets and a song. His baryton compositions remained in manuscript. The "Anton" Lidel in many biographical works is the same as Andreas, the former name arising from an error. E. v. d. s.

LIDÓN, José (b. Béjar, Salamanca, 1752; d. Madrid, 13 Feb. 1827).

Spanish organist and composer. He was organist at the cathedral of Málaga until 1787, when he succeeded Miguel Rabasa as first organist of the royal chapel in Madrid. He wrote much music for the church of which many examples are extant, organ music (six fugues were published) and theoretical works, of which a 'Tratado de la fuga' and 'El arte de modular' remained in manuscript, while 'Reglas muy útiles para los organistas y aficionados al piano' were published. In the National Library of Madrid there are also the scores of a villancico for 5 voices and of an opera 'Glauro y Cariolano' (performed Madrid, 1792). A. L.

Lie, Jonas. See Grieg (song).

LIE-NISSEN, Erika (b. Kongsvinger, 17 Jan. 1845; d. Christiania, 27 Oct. 1903).

Norwegian pianist. She was brought up in a family where many eminent musicians were guests. On the death of her father, a lawyer, the family went to live at Christiania, where Erika Lie became the pupil of Kjerulf. In 1860 she went to Berlin to study the pianoforte with Kullak, and her progress was so rapid that she was appointed a teacher in his Conservatory. In 1866 she went to Paris and had some lessons from Tellefsen, and in 1870 she was called to Copenhagen as professor of the pianoforte at the Conservatory there. She undertook many concert tours all over Europe, making a great success in the works of Chopin and the romantic school. In 1874 she married Dr. Oscar Nissen of Christiania; in 1894 she received a yearly grant from the Norwegian Storting. She was buried at Vor Frelzers Church at Christiania. Grieg conducted the musical part of the service. J. A. P.-M., rev.

LIE, Sigurd (b. Drammen, 23 May 1871; d. Vestre Aker, 30 Sept. 1904).

Norwegian composer. He was brought up at Christiansand and studied the violin with the cathedral organist there. Later he became a student at Lindeman's school of music in Christiania, where Holter was his teacher for composition, and at the Leipzig Conservatory in 1891-94, where his first important composition, a pianoforte Quintet in B \flat major, was written and performed. Later he held conducting posts at Bergen (Harmonicon choral society and Central Theatre) and, after another course of study in Berlin, in Christiania.

Among Lie's works, apart from the early pf. Quintet, are a Symphony in A mi., an 'Orientalisk Suite' for orch., a vn. Concerto, a stg. Quartet, cantatas and other choral pieces, songs, duets and short pf. pieces.

J. H. (ii).

LIEBE, Christian (b. Freiberg, Saxony, 5 Nov. 1654; d. Zschoppau, Saxony, 3 Sept. 1708).

German organist and composer. He went to Leipzig in 1676, was organist at Frauenstein in 1684 and afterwards rector there. In 1690 he became rector at Zschoppau. He composed masses, motets and other church music for 4-8 voices, mostly with instrumental accompaniments. E. v. d. s.

LIEBE DER DANAE, DIE. Opera in 3 acts by Richard Strauss. Libretto by Josef Gregor. Produced Salzburg, 14 Aug. 1952. 1st perf. in England, London, Covent Garden Theatre, 16 Sept. 1953.

LIEBERMANN, Rolf (b. Zürich, 1910).

Swiss composer. After studying law at Zürich and pursuing music at the same time under José Berr and later under Hermann Scherchen, he became a pupil of Vladimir Vogel for composition. He is on the musical staff of Radio-Zürich and as a composer is among the few Swiss musicians who have adopted the twelve-note system. His orchestral and vocal works testify to great creative vitality and intensity of expression; over and above construction on the basis of "tone-rows" he pays much attention to sensuous qualities of sound. His orchestral works 'Furioso' (1947) and Symphony No. 1 (1949) are especially noteworthy; others of importance are the following:

Opera 'Leonore 40/45', prod. Basel, 25 Mar. 1952.
'Streitlied zwischen Leben und Tod', cantata for solo voices, chorus & orch.
Polyphonic Studies for chamber orch.

- 'Volkslieder-Suite' for orch.
 'Une des fins du monde' (Jean Giraudoux), cantata for baritone & orch.
 *Chinesische Liebeslieder' (Klabund) for tenor, harp & stgs.
 'Musik' for speaker & orch.
 'Chinesisches Lied' (Klabund), dramatic scena for contralto, tenor & pf.
 Sonata for pf. (1951).
 Also festival plays, incidental music, film music, songs, &c.

LIED (Ger. = song). This is simply the German word for "song", though used both in English and in French as though it denoted a particular species, which indeed it now does in these languages, though not in German. LIEDERSPIEL (Ger. lit. song-play). A German type of play with songs introduced into it, the songs being cast in the form and character of well-known and favourite airs, which indeed they sometimes became. The Liederspiel was not, as has often been said, the German equivalent of the French vaudeville and the English ballad opera, where popular music already existing was adapted to new words; for in the Liederspiel the words of familiar lyrics were introduced and the music to which they were set was new.

The thing and the name are both due to J. F. Reichardt, whose 'Lieb und Treu' was the first Liederspiel, in which poems by Goethe were used. It was an attempt, musically speaking, to turn the German stage from artifice to natural sentiment. Reichardt's interesting account of his experiment and the reasons which led to it will be found in A.M.Z., 1801, pp. 709-17. After Reichardt a number of other composers, including Himmel and Lortzing, as well as Eberwein and other second-class writers, composed Liederspiele, which were very popular but short-lived.

Mendelssohn called his 'Heimkehr aus der Fremde' ('Son and Stranger') a Liederspiel, but that could be only by an extension of the term beyond its original meaning. Schumann's 'Spanisches Liederspiel' for vocal quartet and pianoforte (Op. 74) is also quite unconnected with the proper meaning of the term: it is merely a song cycle for several voices.

LIEDERTAFEL (Ger. lit. song-table). Originally a society of men who met together on fixed evenings for the practice of vocal music in four parts, drinking forming part of the entertainment. These clubs arose during the political depression caused by Napoleon's rule in Germany; and the first, consisting of twenty-four members only, was founded by Zelter in Berlin on 28 Dec. 1808. Others soon followed at Frankfurt o/M. and Leipzig, gradually relaxing the rules as to numbers. Bernhard Klein founded the Jüngere Berliner Liedertafel, which aimed at a higher standard of art. These societies gave an immense impetus to men's part-singing throughout Germany. After the establishment of the Männergesangvereine proper (male singing-societies), the word Liedertafel came to mean a social gathering of the society, i.e. a gathering of invited ladies and gentlemen at which the members performed pieces previously learned. They were in fact informal concerts, where the guests moved about, ate, drank and talked as they pleased, provided they kept silence during the singing. The Liedertafeln of the large male singing-societies of Vienna, Munich and Cologne were pleasant and refined entertainments, not without a musical significance of their own.

LIER, Bertus van (b. Utrecht, 10 Sept. 1906).

Dutch composer. He studied with local teachers and later at the Amsterdam Conservatory under Orobio de Castro (cello) and Willem Pijper (composition) and at Strasbourg under Hermann Scherchen for the latter subject. He early made a good impression as a composer, though his output has not been large. For a time he acted as music critic for various newspapers in Amsterdam and conductor of several amateur orchestras and choral bodies and then became teacher of harmonic analysis at the Utrecht Conservatory.

Van Lier composed three Symphonies, incidental music to Sophocles' 'Ajax' and Balthazar Verhagen's marionette play 'De Mager' ('The Thin Man'), a declamation with orchestra, 'De Dyk' ('The Dyke'), which won a prize offered by the radio society AVRO, two sonatas for pianoforte, chamber music and songs. His cappella choruses have achieved more than ordinary success.

'Het Hooglied' ('The Song of Songs'), produced in 1949 in Amsterdam, was the result of exegetical studies which only after a long period led to musical results. It is a work of exceptional originality written for soprano, tenor and bass soloists, chorus and orchestra. The music is made to fit either Dutch or English words. The first performance was attended by Queen Juliana as an expression of her interest in the music of Holland.

LISS, Andreas (b. Klein-Kniegnitz, Silesia, 16 June 1903).

Austrian musicologist. He went to school at Strehlen (Silesia) and studied music at Breslau and Danzig, and later at the State Academy for Music and the University in Vienna (with Guido Adler and Rudolf Ficker), taking the Ph.D. degree in 1928. He settled in Vienna, where he was corresponding music critic to the 'Frankfurter Zeitung' in 1938-45 and devoted himself to research for a complete edition of Fux's works on behalf of the Styrian authorities. He has been a regular contributor to the 'Oesterreichische Musikzeitschrift' since 1945. His publications include:

LIGATA (Ital., from ligare = to bind). A fugue was said to be a fuga ligata if its answer was so exact that it did not need to be fully written out, but could be merely indicated by the composer and was then performed according to the rules, in fact a strict canon — hence the word "canon" still in use.

LIGATO. See LEGATO.

LIGATURE (Fr. liaison; Ital. legatura; Lat. ligatura).

(1) In medieval manuscripts and in early printed music the ligature was a compound notational symbol indicating a group of two, three or more notes to be sung upon one syllable: used also in instrumental music, when it very often has a phrasing value ("legato", exactly); though at times it takes the place of separate notes merely to save time in writing and space on parchment. For its various forms see NOTATION.

(2) (In reed instruments). The flexible metal band, regulated by two adjusting screws, which is used to secure the reed to the mouthpiece in instruments such as the clarinet and the saxophone. In former days the reed was held in position merely by a binding of waxed thread.

LIGHT, Edward (b. ?; d. ?).

English 18th-19th-century musician and instrument maker. He worked in London and claimed the invention of the harp-lute and a kindred instrument named the Apollo lyre. The harp-lute, known also as the dital harp, was popular at the junction of the 18th and 19th centuries, and the Apollo lyre less so. The latter took the form of the ancient instrument, but it had a centre fingerboard and a sound-chamber. In 1794 Light was living at Kensington, and about this period he was making these two instruments for sale. He soon removed to 8 Foley Place, Cavendish Square, and was "lyrist to the Princess of Wales". In 1818¹ he took out a patent in connection with the harp-lute which shortly after this date was made by Wheatstone & Co. Light was a teacher of the guitar and arranged some music for it. He published a number of works, being arrangements and instructions for the harp-lute, Apollo lyre and guitar.

(b. Plön, Holstein, 8 Dec. 1820; d. Coblenz, 5 Mar. 1912).

German scholar. Having studied theology and law at Kiel and Berlin, and taking the D.D. and Ph.D., he devoted himself chiefly to old Norse languages and literature. In 1850 he became professor of these subjects at Kiel, and in 1852 of "Germanistik" at Jena. In 1855 he published 'Lieder und Sprüche aus der letzten Zeit des Minnesangs', containing twenty melodies with texts from the celebrated Jena Minnesänger codex, written about 1320. Wilhelm Stade of Jena provided the melodies with a modern setting in four-part harmony. Liliencron afterwards settled at Munich as editor of the 'Allgemeine deutsche Biographie'. It was also during his stay at Munich that he published 'Die historischen Volkslieder der Deutschen vom 13.-16. Jahrh.' in five volumes (1865-69), the last containing valuable notes on the old tunes, besides eighteen polyphonic settings of some of them by Isaac, Senfl, H. Finck, Mahu and others. For Kürschner's 'Deutsche National-Literatur', Vol. XIII (1884), he published 'Deutsches Leben im Volkslied um 1530', which contains 147 folksongs of the 16th century with texts and melodies. Later he occupied himself much with church music. Besides contributing various essays on the subject to 'Siona' and other church and musical periodicals, he published in 1893 'Liturgisch-musikalische Geschichte der evangel.-Lutherischen Gottesdienste von 1523 bis 1700', which is a valuable sketch of the history of Lutheran church music from the liturgical point of view up to the rise of the form of church cantata as perfected by Bach.

Other historico-musical works of some importance by Liliencron were 'Chorordnung für die Sonn- und Festtage des evangelischen Kirchenjahres' (Gütersloh, 1900) and 'Die Horazischen Metren in deutschen Komponisten des 16ten Jahrhunderts', which includes nineteen odes of Horace as set in simple note-for-note counterpoint and in accordance with metrical principles by Tritonius, Senfl and Hofhaimer.

Among the more recent works by Liliencron may be mentioned a novel, 'Wie man im Amwald Musik macht' (1903), written to further the cause of reform in church music. Mention may also be made of an earlier writing on the Danish composer C. E. F. Weyse and Danish music generally (1878). From 1900 he was president and leading director of the Royal Prussian Commission for the editing and publication of the D.D.T.

LILIUS (Gigli), Polish family of musicians and publishers of Italian origin.

(1) Wincenty Lilius (b. Rome, ?; d. Warsaw, 1636). He went to Poland about 1600 and became a member of the royal orchestra at Cracow. In 1604 he published a collection under the title of 'Melodiae sacrae', containing motets by various composers both Polish and foreign, mainly Italian (J. Abbatis, S. Amorosius, L. Belloti, A. Pacelli, A. Pagani, A. Potarto, G. C. Gabussi, A. Hakenberger, L. Marenzio, G. Osculati, V. Bertolusi, A. Stabile, R. Veggio) as well as his own motet with the ambitious title of 'Congratulamini mihi omnes'. In 1609 he moved with the whole court to Warsaw, still remaining a member of the royal chapel.

(2) Franciszek Lilius (b. Cracow, c. 1600; d. Cracow, 1657), son of the preceding. He was most probably a pupil of his father or of A. Pacelli, who at that time acted as the master of the royal chapel in Warsaw. On 18 Jan. 1630 the church authorities of Cracow appointed him to the post of conductor of the cathedral choir, which he retained until his death. During his lifetime only one of his works was published: 'Nabożne pieśni' ('Pious Songs'), consisting of four 4-part songs. In manuscript remain a dozen of his Masses ('Tempori Paschali', 'Offitium de Conceptione Beatae Virginis Maria', 'Offitium pro defunctis', 'Missa pro defunctis', 'O salutaris Hostia', etc.) and many motets.

(3) Jan Lilius (b. ?; d. ?), brother of the preceding, son of (1). He was choirmaster to the bishopric at Włocławek.

(4) Szymon Lilius (b. ?; d. ?), brother of the preceding, son of (1). He was royal organist in Warsaw and died after 1652. C. R. H.

LILJEFORS, Ingemar (Kristian) (b. Göteborg, 13 Dec. 1906).

Swedish pianist, organist and composer. He first learnt music from his father, Ruben Liljefors and later studied at the Stockholm Conservatory and in Munich, 1928-29, and qualified as an organist in Stockholm in 1933. He has taught pianoforte and theoretical subjects at the Conservatory since 1938 and has played as soloist in Sweden and Germany. In 1933 he was one of the founders of the Fylkingen Society in Stockholm for the performance of works by young composers, and since 1947 he has been chairman of the Association of Swedish Composers.

His compositions include a Symphony, Op. 15 (1941), a Symphonic poem 'Berget' ('The Mountain'), Op. 6, two suites and other works for orchestra; a Rhapsody, Op. 5, and a Concerto Op. 11, both for pianoforte and orchestra; a Divertimento for strings (1948); pianoforte pieces, songs, etc. K. D.

LILJEFORS, Ruben (Mattias) (b. Uppsala, 30 Sept. 1871; d. Uppsala, 4 Mar. 1936).

Swedish composer and conductor, father of the preceding. He was a pupil of I. Hedenblad at Uppsala and of Jadassohn at the Leipzig Conservatory in 1895-99. He also studied composition with F. Draeseke and conducting with Kutzschbach at Dresden, and composition with Reger at Leipzig in 1909-11. He held many appointments as conductor, especially of choirs. He edited 'Uppländsk folk-musik' in 1929.

His compositions include :

BIBL.—HÅKANSON, K., 'Svenska sångkomponister : No. 3, Ruben Liljefors' ('Ares', 1922, No. 13).

LILLIBURLERO. A 17th-century party tune, and used in the late 19th and early 20th centuries by Irish Orangemen to a song called 'Protestant Boys'. It has been attributed to Henry Purcell, but whether Purcell composed the melody or only fitted the bass is a question not finally settled.¹

The tune first appears as a "Quick Step" in the 2nd edition of 'The Delightful Companion, or Choice New Lessons for the Recorder or Flute' (1686), as follows :

The words are a doggerel set of satirical verses upon the appointment of General Talbot to the Lieutenancy of Ireland in 1687. They begin :

Ho! broder Teague, dost hear de decree,
Lilliburlero, bullen a la,
Dat we shall have a new deputie,
Lilliburlero, bullen a la,
Liero, lero, lilliburlero lero, lero, bullen a la.

Ho! by Shaint Tyburn it is de Talbote, Lilliburlero, etc.,
And he will cut all de English troate,
Lilliburlero, etc., etc.

The whole words will be found in Percy's 'Reliques of Ancient English Poetry'. The words or the tune quickly caught on, and Bishop Burnet in his 'History of His Own Time' mentions the effect that the "foolish ballad, treating the Papists and chiefly the Irish in a ridiculous manner", had upon the political events of that day. "The whole army and at last the people, both in the city and country, were singing it, and perhaps never had so slight a thing so great an effect." There were numerous songs set to the air, all having a strong Protestant bearing.

Whether the tune which we now know as 'Lilliburlero' is the original one for the song is rather doubtful, for in the Bodleian Library at Oxford is an early broadside, with music, headed 'A New Song', the words being the same as above quoted. The broadside formerly belonged to Antony à Wood.

The music is as follows :

It will be noticed that the tune is 'Cold and Raw' or 'Stingo'.

Henry Purcell's name was first associated with this tune in the second part of 'Musick's Hand Maid, containing the newest Lessons, Grounds, Sarabands, Minuets and Jiggs set forth for the Virginal and Spinnet' (1689). It is set down there as 'A New Irish Tune', and on the same line "H. Purcell", either as composer or merely responsible for the bass. There are no words given. Purcell used the air as a ground bass to the fifth piece in 'The Gordian Knot unty'd' in 1691.

An attempt has been made to fathom the mystery of the words "Lilliburlero", etc., but nothing that can be relied upon has been elicited. The chances are they are merely nonsense words.

Lillo, George. See Arnold (S., 'Fatal Curiosity'). Ballad Opera ('Silvia').

LILT (verb and noun), to sing, pipe or play cheerfully or, according to one authority, even sadly; also, a gay tune. The term, which is of Scottish origin, but is used in Ireland and occurs in Chaucer, would seem to be derived from the bagpipe, one variety of which is described in the 'Houlate' (an ancient allegorical Scottish poem dating 1450) as the "Lilt-pype". Whenever, in the absence of a musical instrument to play for dancing, the Irish peasant girls sing lively airs to the customary syllables la-la-la, it is called "lilting". The classical occurrence of the word is in the Scottish song 'The Flowers of the Forest', a lament for the disaster on the field of Flodden, where it is contrasted with a mournful tone :

I've heard them liltin' at the ewe milkin',
Lasses a-liltin' before dawn of day;
Now there's a moanin' on ilka green loanin',
The Flowers of the Forest are a' wede away.

Scotland, contains six lilt: 'Ladie Rothe-mayeis' (the air to the ballad of the burning of 'Castle Frindraught'), 'Lady Laudians' (Lothian's), 'Ladie Cassilles' (the air of the ballad of Johnny Faa), 'Leslies, Aderneis and Gilcreich's Lilt'. We quote 'Ladie Cassilles':

W. Dauncey, editor of the Skene Manuscript, supposes the liltpipe to have been a shepherd's pipe, not a bagpipe, and the lilt to have sprung from the pastoral districts of the Lowlands.

LIMA, Jeronymo Francisco de (b. Lisbon, 30 Sept. 1743; d. Lisbon, 19 Feb. 1822).

Portuguese conductor and composer. He came from a musical family; his younger brother, Bras Francisco de Lima (c. 1745-1813) was a composer of oratorios.¹ Jeronymo was soon recognized as a composer, as his early election to the Brotherhood of St. Cecilia (1767) shows. He visited Italy and afterwards (1798) succeeded Carvalho as conductor of the Royal Opera at Lisbon. His works¹ include occasional cantatas and church music.

J. B. T.

For the stage Lima wrote six Italian operas: 'Lo spirito di contradizione' (1772), 'Gli Orti Esperidi' (1779), 'Enea in Tracia' (1781), 'Teseo' (1783), 'Le nozze d' Ercole e d' Ebe' (1785) and 'La vera costanza' (the same libretto as that set by Haydn, 1785). All these were produced at Lisbon, and all the scores are extant, as well as those of 3 cantatas, one in Italian, 'La Galatea' (n.d.) and 2 in Portuguese, 'Hymeneo' (1783) and 'O templo da gloria' (1802).

LINCKE², Joseph (b. Trachenberg, Prussian Silesia, 8 June 1783; d. Vienna, 26 Mar. 1837).

German violoncellist and composer. He learnt the violin from his father, a violinist in the chapel of Prince Hatzfeld, and the cello from Oswald. At the age of ten he lost his parents and was obliged to support himself by copying music, until in 1800 he procured a place as violinist in the Dominican monastery at Breslau. There he studied the organ and harmony under Hanisch and also pursued the cello under Lose, after whose departure he became first cellist at the theatre of which Weber was then Kapellmeister. In 1808 he went to Vienna and was engaged by Prince Rasumovsky for his private quartet party, at the suggestion of Schuppanzigh. In that house he had the opportunity of playing Beethoven's works under his own supervision. Beethoven's two Sonatas for cello and piano-forte (Op. 102) were composed by Beethoven while he and Lincke were together at the Erdödy's in 1815.

Lincke played in Schuppanzigh's public quartets, and Schuppanzigh in turn assisted Lincke at his farewell concert, when the programme consisted entirely of Beethoven's music and the great composer himself was present. Lincke's playing appears to have been remarkable for its humour, and he is said to have been peculiarly happy in expressing Beethoven's characteristic style, whence no doubt the master's fondness for him. For a year and a half he was chamber virtuoso to Countess Erdödy at Pancovecz, near Agram, and in 1818 he was engaged by Freiherr von Braun as first cellist in the Theater an der Wien in Vienna. In 1831 he played in the orchestra of the Court Opera there.

Lincke's compositions consist of concertos, variations, capriccios, etc., his first three works only (variations) having been published.

English organist and critic, son of the preceding. He began as organist of Christ Church, Woburn Square, in London, and from 1846 was employed upon 'The Daily News', succeeding George Hogarth as its critic in 1866 and retaining the post till 1886. He lectured frequently on musical subjects in London, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Manchester, Liverpool, etc. In a lecture on Mendelssohn, at the Western Literary Institution, on 23 Dec. 1845, that master's violin Concerto was played for the first time in England by Kreutzer, with Lincoln at the pianoforte. LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS THEATRE.

There were successively three theatres in London occupying approximately the same site on the south side of Lincoln's Inn Fields, all in some way connected with music and opera:

(1) The first Duke's (Duke of York's) Theatre opened under the management of Sir William Davenant on 28 June 1661. On 2 July Pepys took coach and went to Sir William Davenant's Opera; this being the fourth day that it hath begun, and the first that I have seen it. To-day was acted the second part of 'The Siege of Rhodes'.

This was a revival of the first English opera, music by Matthew Locke and others (1656), notable also for the fact that scenery was for the first time seen on the Restoration stage. After 'The Siege of Rhodes' only plays were given at the Duke's Theatre, but many of them had incidental music, as for instance Davenant's and Dryden's version of 'The Tempest' (7 Nov. 1667) which contained at least one song each by Humfrey and Banister. The theatre was in use until 1673, when the company moved to Dorset Garden in the Strand.

(2) The New Theatre in Lincoln's Inn Fields, fited up from a tennis court, founded by Congreve, Betterton, Mrs. Bracegirdle, Mrs. Barry and other actors under special licence, after their having quarrelled with the patentees of Drury Lane. This theatre was opened on 30 Apr. 1695 with Congreve's 'Love for Love' and was in existence until 1705, when the company moved to the Haymarket.¹ Among the musical plays originally produced at the second Lincoln's Inn Fields Theatre may be mentioned Ravenscroft's 'The Sham Doctor', which contained as an interlude 'The Loves of Mars and Venus', with music by Finger and Eccles (14 Nov. 1696). Purcell's 'Dido and Aeneas' had its first public performance there in Feb. 1700, when it formed part of Charles Gildon's adaptation of 'Measure for Measure'.

(3) The third Lincoln's Inn Fields Theatre stood nearly in the centre of the south side of Lincoln's Inn Fields, the principal entrance being in Portugal Street. It was erected by Christopher Rich and opened (after his death) on 18 Nov. 1714 by his son, John Rich, who there first introduced his pantomimes, curious mixtures of masque and harlequinade in which he himself, under the name of Lun, performed the part of Harlequin. Leveridge, Galliard and Pepusch were among the composers who provided music for Rich's pantomimes and other pieces. The most notable event in the history of this theatre was of course the first production of 'The Beggar's Opera' on 29 Jan. 1728. In Dec. 1732 Rich and his company moved to the newly built theatre in Covent Garden, and the house in Lincoln's Inn Fields was let for a variety of purposes. There in 1733-34 Italian operas were given "for the English Nobility" in opposition to Handel's enterprise at the King's Theatre, with Porpora as composer and Senesino as principal singer; and Handel himself gave the first performances of his 'Ode on St. Cecilia's Day' (22 Nov. 1739), of 'L' Allegro, il Penseroso ed il Moderato' (27 Feb. 1740), 'Imeneo' (22 Nov. 1740) and of his last opera 'Deidamia' (10 Jan. 1741) at Lincoln's Inn Fields. The theatre was occasionally used until about the middle of the 18th century. In 1756 the building was converted into a barrack and later served as Spode & Copeland's Salopian China Warehouse, until it was taken down in 1848 for the enlargement of the Royal College of Surgeons. A. L.

LIND, Jenny (b. Stockholm, 6 Oct. 1820; d. Malvern, 2 Nov. 1887).

Swedish soprano singer. When she was nine years old the director of the court theatre at Stockholm admitted her to the school of singing attached to that establishment, and she received there her first lessons from the singing-master and court secretary Croelius, and later from a master named Berg. After appearing in children's parts from 1830 onwards she made her début at the Stockholm Opera on 7 Mar. 1838, as Agathe in Weber's 'Freischütz'. In 1840 she was made a member of the Royal Swedish Academy of Music, and was appointed court singer. In July 1841 she went to Paris in hope of improving her style of singing. There Manuel Garcia, after expressing the opinion that her voice had been worn out by faulty method and overwork, ultimately gave her lessons, during a period of eleven months. Meyerbeer arranged a private audition for her at the Opéra and recommended her for the Opera at Berlin. She returned to Stockholm for two years, and in 1844 went to Dresden to study German. In Sept. she was again at Stockholm and took part in the coronation festivities for King Oscar, but went to Berlin in Oct. and obtained an engagement at the Opera through the influence of Meyerbeer, who had written for her the principal part in his 'Feldlager in Schlesien', afterwards remodelled as 'L'Étoile du nord'. In the following spring she sang at Hanover and Hamburg. After this tour she returned again to Stockholm and once more enjoyed a triumphant success. She sang before Queen Victoria and Prince Albert at Stolzenfels in the following Aug. and appeared at Frankfurt o/M., Darmstadt and Copenhagen; she was again in Berlin in the winter and at the Gewandhaus, Leipzig, she made her first appearance on 4 Dec. 1845. Engaged soon after for Vienna, she appeared there on 22 Apr. 1846, and at Whitsuntide of the same year sang in the Lower Rhenish Festival at Aachen, appearing at Hanover and Hamburg in the summer. After engagements at Darmstadt, Munich, Stuttgart and various other German cities she returned to Vienna in the autumn.

Difficulties had arisen between the two London managers, Bunn and Lumley, as to the validity of a contract Jenny Lind had been induced to sign with the former, and it was not until 4 May 1847 that she appeared at Her Majesty's Theatre in 'Robert le Diable'. Moscheles had already met her in Berlin, and wrote thus (10 Jan. 1845) of her performances:

Jenny Lind has fairly enchanted me; she is unique in her way, and her song with two concertante flutes¹ is perhaps the most incredible feat in the way of bravura singing that can possibly be heard. . . . How lucky I was to find her at home! What a glorious singer she is, and so unpretentious withal!

This character, though true to life, was, however, shamefully belied by the management of the London theatre, both before and after her arrival. It is curious now to look back upon the artifices employed, the stories of broken contracts (this not without some foundation), of long diplomatic pourparlers, special messengers, persuasion, hesitation and vacillations, kept up during many months — all in order to excite the operatic public's interest.

Her great singing in the part of Alice disappointed none but a very few, and those were silenced by a tumultuous majority of idolaters. She certainly sang the music splendidly, and acted the part irreproachably:

From that first moment till the end of that season, nothing else was thought about, nothing else talked about, but the new Alice — the new Sonnambula — the new Maria in Donizetti's charming comic opera, — his best. Pages could be filled by describing the excesses of the public. Since the days when the world fought for hours at the pit-door to see the seventh farewell of Siddons, nothing had been seen in the least approaching the scenes at the entrance of the theatre when Mlle Lind sang. Prices rose to a fabulous height. In short, the town, sacred and profane, went mad about "the Swedish nightingale".²

Her voice, which even at its very best showed some signs of early wear, was a soprano of bright, thrilling and remarkably sympathetic quality, from b to g'''. The upper part of her register was rich and brilliant, and superior both in strength and purity to the lower. These two portions she managed, however, to unite in the most skilful way, moderating the power of her upper notes so as not to outshine the lower. She had also a wonderfully developed "length of breadth", which enabled her to perform long and difficult passages with ease and to fine down her tones to the softest pianissimo while still maintaining the quality unvaried. Her execution was very great, her shake true and brilliant, her taste in ornament altogether original, and she usually invented her own cadenzas.³

On 22 July 1847 Jenny Lind appeared, with Lablache, in the part of Amelia written for her in the only opera ever commissioned by a London theatre from Verdi, 'I masnadieri'. In 1848 she returned to Her Majesty's Theatre, but the next year she announced her intention not to appear on the stage again. However, she gave six more operatic performances, her last "on any stage" being on 10 May 1849.

The concert platform suited her better than the theatre. The wondrous effect with which she sang a simple ballad, in the simplest possible manner, can never be forgotten by those who ever heard her. After another season in London, and a visit to Ireland in 1848, she was engaged by Barnum⁴, the American speculator, to make a tour of the United States. She arrived there in 1850 and remained for nearly two years, during part of the time unfettered by an engagement with any impresario, but accompanied by Julius Benedict. The Americans everywhere welcomed her with frantic enthusiasm, and she made £20,000 in this progress. Here it was, at Boston on 5 Feb. 1852, that she married Otto Goldschmidt.

Returned to Europe, Mme Goldschmidt now travelled through Holland, and again visited Germany. Dresden was her home from 1852 to 1855. In 1856 she went once more to England, and for some years appeared frequently in oratorios and concerts. Her actual last appearance was at a concert for a charity at Malvern, 23 July 1883. In that year she accepted an appointment as teacher of singing at the R.C.M., which she held till 1886.

The whole of her American earnings was devoted to founding and endowing art scholarships and other charities in her native Sweden; while in England, the country of her adoption, among other charities she gave a whole hospital to Liverpool and a wing of another to London. In the winter of 1848-49 she raised a sum of £10,500 for charities. The scholarship founded in memory of her friend Felix Mendelssohn also benefited largely by her help and countenance.

Jenny Lind was respected and admired by all who knew her, the mother of a family, mixing in society, but in no degree losing her vivid interest in music. The Bach Choir, conducted by Goldschmidt, which gave the English public the first opportunity of hearing the B minor Mass in its entirety, profited in no small degree by the careful training bestowed on the female portion of the chorus by this great singer and the enthusiasm inspired by her presence among them. She died at Wynd's Point, the house she had bought at Malvern. On 20 Apr. 1894, H.R.H. Princess Christian unveiled a medallion of Jenny Lind in Westminster Abbey. J. M., rev.

LINDBLAD, Adolf Fredrik (b. Skeninga nr. Stockholm, 1 Feb. 1801; d. Linköping, 28 Aug. 1878).

Swedish composer. He passed several years of his early life in Berlin and studied music there under Zelter. In 1827 he returned to Stockholm and founded a music school, where he himself taught singing. In 1831 he was elected a member of the Swedish Academy. He remained in Stockholm until his death.

Lindblad composed comparatively little instrumental music: 2 symphonies, one of which, in C major'¹, was given under Mendelssohn's² direction at one of the Gewandhaus concerts at Leipzig in Nov. 1839, 7 string quartets, a pianoforte Trio (with viola) and a Duo for pianoforte and violin (Op. 9) are considered the best, but they aim so little at effect and are so full of the peculiar personality of their author that they never became popular. His vocal compositions, on the other hand, made him famous. He was eminently a rational composer. He published a large collection of songs for voice and piano to Swedish words, which are full of melody, grace and originality. Written for the most part in the minor mode, they are tinged with the melancholy which is characteristic of Swedish music. In such short songs as 'The Song of the Dalecarlian Maiden', 'Lament', 'The Wood by the Ären Lake', etc., the extreme simplicity of which is of the very essence of their charm, his success has been most conspicuous. In longer and more elaborate songs, where the simplicity at which he aimed in his accompaniments limits the variety of harmony and figures, the effect is often marred by repetition and consequent monotony. Yet even in this class of work there are many beautiful exceptions, and 'A Day in Spring', 'A Summer's Day' and 'Autumn Evening' are specially worthy of mention.

Jenny Lind, who was Lindblad's pupil, introduced his songs into Germany, and their rapidly acquired popularity earned for the author the title of "the Schubert of the North". His only opera, 'Fronörerna' ('The Frondists') was performed in Stockholm on 11 May 1835 and revived for the opening of the new opera-house there in 1898. Several of his vocal duets, trios and quartets have a considerable reputation in Sweden.

LINDBLAD, Otto Jonas (b. Karlstorp, Småland, 31 Mar. 1809; d. N. Mellby, Skåne, 24 Jan. 1864).

Swedish composer. He was sent to Växjö to be educated as a clergyman. Here he was also instructed in music by Svensson, whom Lindblad himself mentions as an excellent organ-player "à l'abbé Vogler". In 1829 he matriculated at Lund and about this time fell ill with smallpox. During his long convalescence he drifted, owing to his musical bent, farther and farther away from his academic studies. Together with two friends, Lindblad organized a trio, arranged for vocal as well as instrumental music, in which he took part as second tenor and also performed on the violin; it was by studying music and practising it that he developed his own talent in composition, in which he only had a few lessons from Krebs during a visit to Copenhagen. He was taught the violin by K. M. Lundholm, in whose home he lived for three years. Of great significance to Lindblad's musical education became the Heuserska theatre company, which in 1836 visited the south of Sweden, producing operas by Mozart, Weber, Rossini, Boieldieu, etc. Lindblad took part in the orchestra and joined the company on their tour as orchestral leader. In 1841 he visited Hamburg, where he was invited as guest of honour to the musical festival. While Haefner and Geijer founded the Swedish Student Song Society at Uppsala, it was not long before Otto Lindblad organized the same at Lund, and it is due to him that it was raised to one of the foremost in the north.

Lindblad became parish clerk at N. Mellby in 1847 and was elected a member of the Swedish Academy of Music in 1857. He composed 124 songs, of which 66 were quartets, 5 choruses, with solos, 14 trios, 3 duets and 36 solo songs. The best-known of his quartets for men's voices are: 'Ur svenska hjärtans djup'; 'Du som världar har till rike'; 'Orpheus sång'; 'Ur Ossians dunkla sago-värld'; and of his solo songs with piano 'Barcarolle', 'Dalen', 'Trollhättan' and 'Livdrabanten och Kung Erik'. He is of some importance mainly as a vocal composer, but he also wrote pianoforte pieces. The manuscripts of his works, and of an autobiography, are in the library of the Royal Musical Academy, Stockholm.

LINDELHEIM (?), Johanna Maria (b. ?; d. ?).

This seems to have been the real name of a singer, ? of German origin, who made her first appearance in London at Drury Lane Theatre on 23 Jan. 1703. The 'Daily Courant' of 19 Jan. (No. 236) announces that "Signiora Joanna Maria Lindehlcim will sing several songs in Italian and French, compos'd by Signior Sajoni lately arriv'd from Italy". "Lindehlcim", a very improbable name, may be a slight misprint for "Lindelheim" — uncommon, but possible; unfortunately there is no means of checking it from other advertisements, as the very next day her surname was dropped for good; in further announcements and librettos she is called simply Joanna Maria and under this heading she has hitherto appeared in dictionaries and histories.

"Joanna Maria" has been wrongly identified with Maria Margherita Gallia; but she was perhaps the "Signiora Maria" who appeared at the Haymarket on 17 Nov. 1705 as "of late taught by Signior Nicolini Haym". On the operatic stage she made her début as Lavinia in M. A. Bononcini's 'Camilla' on 30 Mar. 1706; her name is given in the libretto as "Mrs. Joanna Maria . . .", whereas in the contemporary score, published by Walsh & Hare, that part is allotted to "the Baroness", a fact that seems to suggest¹ that Joanna Maria Lindelheim was also known by that designation. Her further appearances, as the "Baroness", were at Drury Lane on 15 Nov. (revival of 'Camilla') and 8 Dec. 1707 (name-part in 'Thomyris', which at the first production of that opera, 1 Apr. 1707 had been taken by "Signiora Margarita", i.e. Marguerite de l'Épine rather than Maria Margherita Gallia); Eurilla in 'Love's Triumph', Queen's Theatre, 26 Feb. 1708; Deidamia in Scarlatti's 'Pyrrhus and Demetrius', ibid., 14 Dec. 1708; finally once more Lavinia in 'Camilla' at the revival of 25 Jan. 1709. After that season, the "Baroness" disappears.

as "Joanna Maria Lindehleim" and "Joanna Maria" had disappeared before. A. L.

LINDEMAN. Norwegian family of musicians, probably of German origin, but established at Trondhjem during the 18th century.

(1) Ole Andreas Lindeman (b. Surnadal, 17 Jan. 1769; d. Trondhjem, 26 Feb. 1857). He was educated at Trondhjem cathedral school, graduated in 1789 and went to Copenhagen to study law. Musical inclinations becoming stronger, he studied violin, pianoforte, organ and composition, and in 1799 was appointed organist of Our Lady's Church at Trondhjem. In 1835 he edited the first Norwegian chorale-book.

(2) Fredrik Christian Lindeman (b. Trondhjem, 4 Dec. 1803; d. Trondhjem, 29 July 1868), son of the preceding. As a student in Christiania he deputized at the organ of Our Saviour's Church until 1826, when his brother Jacob (1805-46) took his place. In 1829 he became a teacher of the deaf, in which capacity he remained at Trondhjem for the rest of his life. He is said to have been a skilful improviser on the organ.

(3) Ludvig Mathias Lindeman (b. Trondhjem, 28 Nov. 1812; d. Christiania, 23 May 1887), brother of the preceding. At an early age he assisted his father as organist, but was not encouraged to think of music as a career. Coming to Christiania to study theology, he deputized for his brother Jacob at Our Saviour's Church and played the cello in the theatre orchestra. In 1839 he succeeded Jacob in his post at Our Saviour's Church, which he retained until his death. He was regarded as the foremost organ virtuoso in the country and composed a great deal of music for the instrument. He also wrote a number of hymns. But the work by which he is chiefly remembered is his great collection of Norwegian folk melodies. His interest in this field began in 1840, when he contributed a short melodic supplement to Jørgen Moe's 'Songs, Folk Tales and Sayings in the Norse Peasant Dialects'. This was followed in 1841 by '68 Norwegian Mountain Melodies, harmonized and arranged for Pianoforte'. In 1848 Lindeman received a State subsidy for the purpose of travelling about Norway and increasing his collection of material from the oral tradition of the peasantry. In the first summer alone he collected 220 melodies. The monumental work that resulted from this and other tours and researches was entitled 'Older and Newer Mountain Melodies collected and arranged for Pianoforte'. This was published in three volumes between 1853 and 1867 and contained in all nearly 600 melodies. Other publications by Lindeman included 'Fifty Norwegian Melodies arranged for male voices' (1862) and '30 Norwegian Ballads' (1863). In 1883 Lindeman founded, in collaboration with his son Peter Brynie Lindeman (1858-1930), a school of music in Christiania. Another son, K. T. M. Lindeman (1870-1934) became organist of Trondhjem Cathedral in 1894. J. H. (ii).

LINDEMANN, Johann (b. Gotha, c. 1550; d. ?).

German composer. He was cantor at Gotha from 1571 or 1572 and did not resign from the post until 1631. He wrote sacred songs, words and music, and published a collection of Christmas and New Year songs by various masters (1598). Only the second of three volumes has been rediscovered: it contains two songs by Pevernage.

LINDGREN, (Karl) Adolf (b. Trosa, 14 Mar. 1846; d. Stockholm, 8 Feb. 1905).

Swedish music critic and historian. He studied philosophy and theoretical musical subjects at Uppsala from 1863, graduated in 1873, and from 1874 until his death was music critic to the newspaper 'Aftonbladet'. In 1881 he founded, with F. Vult v. Steyern, the 'Svensk Musiktidning', the most important musical journal in Sweden, which he edited until 1884. He wrote articles for 'Illustrerade Tid' and was music correspondent to the 'Nordisk Musiktidende', Christiania, and to several German musical journals. The most important of his historical works were the sections on music in the first edition of the Scandinavian Encyclopaedia. He also contributed the section on Swedish music to H. Panum and W. LINDLEY, Robert (b. Rotherham, 4 Mar. 1776; d. London, 13 June 1855).

English violoncellist and composer. He showed so early a predilection for music that when he was about five years of age his father, an amateur performer, began teaching him the violin, and at nine years of age the cello also. He continued to practise the latter until he was sixteen, when Cervetto, hearing him play, encouraged him and undertook his gratuitous instruction. He left Yorkshire and obtained an engagement at the Brighton theatre.

In 1794 Lindley succeeded Sperati as principal cello at the Opera in London and all the principal concerts, retaining undisputed possession of that position until his retirement in 1851. His friendship with Dragonetti, with whom he shared a desk in the orchestras and appeared in duets for cello and double bass, lasted for half a century. He was appointed professor of his instrument in the R.A.M. on its foundation in 1822.

Lindley's tone was remarkable for its purity, richness, mellowness and volume. His technique, for that date, was remarkable, and his accompaniment of recitative was in its way perfection, though his style was wholly unsuited to recitativo secco.¹ He composed several concertos and other works for his instrument, but his composition was by no means equal to his execution. His daughter married John Barnett the composer. W. H. H.

LINDNER, Friedrich (b. Liegnitz, Silesia, c. 1540; d. Nuremberg, 15 Sept. 1597).

German composer and musical editor. He was at first a boy chorister in the electoral chapel at Dresden, received his further education at the famous school at Pforta and afterwards studied at Leipzig University. After serving for a while as Hof-Musikus to the Margrave of Brandenburg at Ansbach, he received in 1574 the appointment of cantor to the important Church of St. Giles (St. Aegidius) at Nuremberg.

Although Lindner published none of his own compositions, he is known to have sent to the Duke of Württemberg in 1567 a 'Cantionalbuch' for which he received the then considerable honorarium of 30 florins, and again in 1570 and 1572 he also sent two musical settings of the Passion for which he received 6 and 10 florins respectively.² But he is known chiefly as the meritorious editor of various collections of music, sacred and secular, published by the Nuremberg firm of Gerlach, which are important as testifying to the kind of music which continued to be cultivated and favoured in the Lutheran churches and schools of Nuremberg and elsewhere. They are as follows:

LINDPAINTNER, Peter Joseph von (b. Coblenz, 9 Dec. 1791; d. Nonnenhorn, Lake Constance, 21 Aug. 1856).

German conductor and composer. He studied the violin, pianoforte and counterpoint at Augsburg, and subsequently appears to have received some instruction at Munich from Winter. In 1812 he accepted the post of Musikdirector at the Isartor Theatre of Munich, and while so engaged completed his musical studies under Joseph Grätz, an excellent contrapuntist. In 1819 he was appointed Kapellmeister to the royal orchestra at Stuttgart, a post he held until his death, which took place during a summer holiday at Nonnenhorn. He died full of honours, a member of almost every musical institution of the Continent and the recipient of gifts from many crowned heads—among others a medal from Queen Victoria, in 1848, for the dedication of his oratorio of 'Abraham'. He was buried at Wasserburg.

By quiet and persistent labour Lindpaintner raised his orchestra to the level of the best in Germany and acquired a high reputation. "Lindpaintner", says Mendelssohn, describing a visit to Stuttgart in 1831, is in my belief the best conductor in Germany; it is as if he played the whole orchestra with his baton alone; and he is very industrious.

Of the many professional engagements offered him in other towns and foreign countries he accepted but one, and that, in 1853, three years before his death, was to conduct the New Philharmonic concerts in London, at which his cantata 'The Widow of Nain', his overtures to Goethe's 'Faust' and to his opera 'The Vampyre', and others of his compositions were given with success, including the song of 'The Standard-Bearer', at that time very popular. He conducted some of the New Philharmonic concerts in 1854. Lind-paintner wrote 28 operas, 3 ballets, 5 melodramas and oratorios, several cantatas, 6 masses, a 'Stabat Mater' and over 50 songs with pianoforte accompaniment. To these were added symphonies, overtures, concertos, fantasies, trios and quartets for different instruments. He re-scored Handel's 'Judas Macabaeus'. Some of his symphonies and operas, his ballet 'Joko', the overture to which was often heard at concerts, his music to Goethe's 'Faust' and setting of Schiller's 'Lied von der Glocke' have been pronounced to be among the best of his works. And two of his songs, 'The Standard-Bearer' and 'Roland', created at the time a veritable furore.

Though wanting in depth and originality, Lindpaintner's compositions pleased by their clearness and brilliancy, melody and well-developed form; and the hand of a clever and practised musician is everywhere visible in them. His most successful operas were the following:

- 'Der Bergkönig' (libretto by Carl Hanisch¹), prod. Stuttgart, 30 Jan. 1825.
- 'Der Vampyr' (lib. by Casar Max Heigel, based on John William Polidori's novel 'The Vampyre'), prod. Stuttgart, 21 Nov. 1828.
- 'Die Genueserin' (lib. by Carl Philipp Berger), prod. Vienna, Kärntnertheater, 8 Feb. 1839.
- 'Lichtenstein' (lib. by Franz von Dingelstedt, based on a novel by Wilhelm Hauff), prod. Stuttgart, 26 Aug. 1846.

LINEAR. A special way of writing music in parts, especially a new kind of counterpoint. It aims, not in the first place at euphony in the coincidence of separate parts, but at satisfactory lines traced by each part individually, often apparently regardless of the way in which they clash, though needless to say a composer worthy of the name never leaves this to chance. An advantage in writing linear counterpoint is to give each part to an instrument of different tone-colour rather than, for example, to string instruments, so that they should the more clearly strike the ear as separate strands in the fabric of sound. The least satisfactory medium is thus the pianoforte.

LING (De Hernando Balmori), Dorothy (Evelyn) (b. London, 27 Oct. 1906).

English musicologist and educationist. She was educated at the Mary Datchelor School 1918-25, L.R.A.M. (Aural Training teacher's degree); Turle Organ scholar, Girton College, ¹ The same subject, treated by a different librettist, as that of Spohr's opera 'Der Berggeist', produced at Cassel less than two months later, on 24 Mar. 1825.

² The same subject, at that time attributed to Byron, as that of Marschner's opera of the same name but by a different librettist, produced only a few months earlier, on 29 Mar. 1828, at Leipzig.

Cambridge, 1925–28. In 1926 she took her Mus.B., part 1, with first-class honours — being the first woman to obtain this distinction. Again, in 1928, she was the first woman to obtain the Stewart of Rannoch open scholarship for sacred music. 1929, Mus.B. part 2; first woman to obtain this degree at Cambridge. In 1928–30 she did research work on primitive music under Hornbostel at Berlin University. She then married and went to Spain, arriving in Argentina in Sept. 1939. In 1941 she was appointed director of music at the Escuela Vocacional Sarmiento by the University of Tucumán and 1946 became director of the Institute of Art projected and founded by her under the auspices of that University.

Dorothy Ling writes extensively on educational and artistic subjects and has made numerous arrangements of Spanish folksongs and dances.

LINIGKE (Linicke), Johann Georg (b. ?; d. ?, after 1737).

German violinist and composer. He was the son of Christian Bernhard Linigke (a cellist in the Berlin court orchestra and later in the orchestra at Coethen, under J. S. Bach) and, according to Mattheson, a pupil of Johann Theile. He entered the Berlin orchestra as a violinist in or before 1710. When three years later the orchestra was dissolved by King Frederick William I, Linigke was appointed leader of the orchestra at the small court of Weissenfels in Thuringia, where he stayed until at least 1720. Subsequently he entered the opera orchestra at Hamburg in the same capacity.

As a composer Linigke is known by a number of instrumental works: overtures, concertos, suites, trios and sonatas preserved in various libraries. A "mortorium" (?) for 5 instruments in the Schwerin library is dated 1737. For the Hamburg opera Linigke wrote a prologue, 'Wettstreit der Poesie, Musik und Malerei', in 1725, and in the same year he adapted Handel's 'Giulio Cesare' for the Hamburg stage, contributing the German recitatives and the accompaniments, as well as "symphonies" (according to the libretto, in which he is still called "hertzogl. Weissenfelscher Concert-Meister"). Mattheson, in his 'Critica Musica' of 1725 (II, 250 ff.) prints two letters by Linigke and states that after 1713 he spent some years in England; if this is true, his presence did not leave any trace.

LINJAMA (formerly Lindeman), Jaakko (Armas) (b. Äänekoski, 16 May 1909).

Finnish composer. He came of a very poor family, but contrived to study musical theory, composition and orchestration privately under Sulho Ranta, Aarre Merikanto and Leo Funtek. Later he taught at the Conservatory of Jyväskylä. He changed his name in 1935.

Linjama's output consists of partsongs, some cantatas, orchestral pieces, etc., which secured him no more than a local reputation; but in 1952 he suddenly became known the world over as the winner of the prize in a competition for the Olympic Hymn, performed with great success at the opening and closing of the Olympic Games (XV) in Helsingfors.

LINKO (formerly Lindroth), Ernst (Fredrik) (b. Tampere [Tammerfors], 14 July 1889).

Finnish pianist and composer. He changed his name in 1906. In 1909–11 he was a pupil of Sigrid Schneckvoigt and Karl Ekman in Helsingfors, in 1914–15 he studied in Berlin under Martin Krause (pianoforte), Wilhelm Klatte (theory) and E. Sandow (chamber music), later with Leonid Nikolayev in Petrograd and in 1925 with Jean Batalla in Paris. He has given recitals in Europe and the U.S.A., and in 1936 he was appointed professor and director of the Sibelius Academy in Helsingfors.

Linko's compositions include a 'Symphonie chevaleresque' (1949), 3 pianoforte Concertos, a string Quartet, pianoforte sonatas and pieces, songs, etc.

A. R.

LINKO-MALMIO, Liisa (Elina) (b. Käkisalmi [Kexholm], 28 May 1918).

Finnish soprano singer, daughter of the preceding. She studied in Finland, Sweden and London, and has been successful both as a recitalist and in opera (e.g. Britten's 'Peter Grimes'). Since 1951 she has been attached to the Copenhagen Opera and toured in other countries.

LINLEY. English family of musicians.

(1) Thomas Linley, sen. (b. Badminton, 17 Jan. 1733; d. London, 19 Nov. 1795), singing-master and composer. He began the study of music under Thomas Chilcot, organist of Bath Abbey church, and completed his education under Paradisi. He established himself as a singing-master at Bath and for many years carried on the concerts there with great success. On the retirement of John Christopher Smith in 1774 Linley went to London, though still carrying on his activities at Bath, and joined Stanley in the management of the oratorios at Drury Lane Theatre, and on the death of Stanley in 1786 he continued them in partnership with Arnold. In 1775, in conjunction with his eldest son, Thomas (3), he composed and compiled the music for 'The Duenna', by his son-in-law, Sheridan, which had the then unparalleled run of seventy-five nights in its first season. In 1776 he purchased part of Garrick's share in Drury Lane, settled permanently in London and undertook the management of the music of the theatre, for which he composed several pieces of merit. He became a member of the Royal Society of Musicians in 1777. He died at his house in Southampton Street, Covent Garden, and was buried in Wells Cathedral.

Apart from his stage works, tabulated below, Linley set such portions of Sheridan's Monody on the Death of Garrick, 1779, as were intended to be sung. 'Six Elegies' for three voices, composed at Bath (much commended by Burney) and 'Twelve Ballads' were published in his lifetime. The posthumous works of himself and his son Thomas, which appeared a few years after his death, in 2 vols., consist of songs, cantatas, madrigals and elegies, including the lovely five-part madrigal by him, 'Let me, careless', one of the most graceful productions of its kind.

As an English composer Linley takes high rank. The following is a complete list of his works for the stage:

(2) Elizabeth Ann Linley (b. Bath, 5 Sept. 1754; d. Bristol, 28 June 1792), soprano singer, daughter of the preceding. She received her musical education from her father (1) and appeared at an early age with great success at the Bath concerts as a soprano singer. In 1770 she sang at the oratorios in London and at the Worcester Festival, and rose high in public favour. In 1771 she sang at the Hereford Festival and in 1772 at that of Gloucester. On 13 Apr. 1773 she became, in romantic circumstances, the wife of Richard Brinsley Sheridan, and after fulfilling engagements at the Worcester Festival and at Oxford, contracted before her marriage, she retired at the zenith of her popularity. Her voice was of extensive compass and she sang with equal excellence in both the sustained and florid styles. She was painted by Reynolds as St. Cecilia and sat for the Virgin in his 'Nativity'. She died of consumption at Hotwells, Bristol.

(3) Thomas Linley, jun. (b. Bath, 5 May 1756; d. Grimsthorpe, 5 Aug. 1778), violinist and composer, brother of the preceding. He displayed at an early age extraordinary skill on the violin, and at eight years of age performed a concerto in public. After studying with his father (1) he was placed under Boyce. He then went to Florence and took lessons on the violin from Nardini, and while there became acquainted with Mozart, who was of his own age, and a warm attachment sprang up between them; when they parted they were each bathed in tears, and Mozart often afterwards spoke of Linley with the greatest affection.

On returning to England Linley became leader and solo player at his father's concerts at Bath, and subsequently in London, at the oratorios, etc., at Drury Lane. In 1773 he composed an anthem with orchestra ('Let God arise') for the Worcester Festival. In 1775 he assisted his father in supplying music for his brother-in-law's comic opera, 'The Duenna', by writing the overture, three or four airs, a duet and a trio. He subsequently composed a chorus and two songs for introduction into Shakespeare's 'The Tempest'. 'A Lyric Ode on the Fairies, Aerial Beings and Witches of Shakespeare' was performed in London, at Drury Lane, on 20 Mar. 1776, and a 3-act comic opera, 'The Cady of Bagdad', followed at the same theatre on 17 Feb. 1778. The scores of both works are preserved at the B.M., the opera in autograph, the ode in a transcription which also contains a biographical account of the composer, not so far published. The oratorio 'The Song of Moses', which is mentioned there, was apparently never performed², and is lost.

The young composer was unfortunately drowned, through the upsetting of a boat, while on a visit to the Duke of Ancaster, at Grimsthorpe in Lincolnshire. An anonymous 'Monody (after the manner of Milton's "Lycidas") on the Death of Mr. Linley' appeared in 1778. The greater part of his miscellaneous compositions are contained in the 2 vols. of posthumous works mentioned under (1) above.

(4) Mary Linley (b. Bath, 4 Jan. 1758; d. Clifton, Bristol, 27 July 1787), singer, sister of the preceding. She was also a pupil of her father (1) and sang with her sister Elizabeth (2) at oratorios, festivals, etc., and for a few years after the latter's retirement, until her marriage in 1780 to Richard Tickell, commissioner of stamps and dramatist, who wrote 'The Carnival of Venice' for his father-in-law and altered Ramsay's 'Gentle Shepherd' for him.

¹ C. Black (see Bibl.) states that it was heard at Drury Lane on 20 Mar. 1777, but the newspaper advertisements prove this to be wrong.

² All in London.

(5) Maria Linley (b. Bath, Sept. or Oct. 1763; d. Bath, 5 Sept. 1784), singer, sister of the preceding. She became a concert and oratorio singer, but her career was cut tragically short by her early death. Shortly before she died she raised herself in bed, and with momentary animation sang part of Handel's air 'I know that my Redeemer liveth', and then, exhausted with the effort, sank down and soon afterwards expired.

(6) Ozias Thurston Linley (b. Bath, Aug. 1765; d. London, 6 Mar. 1831), organist and clergyman, brother of the preceding. He was also instructed by his father (1), but entered the church and obtained a living, which he resigned on being appointed, on 5 May 1816, a junior fellow and organist at Dulwich College, where he died in that post.

(7) William Linley (b. Bath, Feb. 1771; d. London, 6 May 1835), author, civil servant and composer, brother of the preceding. He was educated at St. Paul's School in London and at Harrow, and learnt music from his father (1) and Abel. Fox procured for him a writership at Madras. He returned to England in 1796, joined his brother-in-law, Sheridan, in the management of Drury Lane theatre, and between that year and 1800 brought out three pieces, 'Harlequin Captive', 'The Honey Moon' and 'The Pavilion' (afterwards called 'The Ring'). They were unsuccessful, and in 1800 the author resumed his official duties at Madras. He was subsequently paymaster at Nellore and in 1805 sub-treasurer to the presidency, Fort St. George. In 1806 he returned from India with a competence and devoted his attention to literature and music, composed many glees ('At that dread hour' won the Glee Club prize in 1821), published a set of songs, two sets of canzonets and many detached pieces, edited 'Shakspeare's Dramatic Songs', 2 vols., fol., 1815-16, and wrote two novels and several pieces of poetry. Other musical plays of his are 'Vortigern', 'The Grave' and 'The Trip to the Nore'.

LINLEY, Francis (b. Doncaster, 1771; d. Doncaster, 13 Sept. 1800¹).

English organist, music dealer and composer. He was blind from birth. Having studied music under Dr. Miller, he became an able organist. He was chosen organist of St. James's Chapel, Pentonville, London, and soon afterwards married a blind lady of considerable fortune. He purchased the business of Bland, the music seller in Holborn, in 1796, but his affairs becoming embarrassed, his wife parted from him and he went to America in the same year, where his playing and compositions were much admired. He returned to England in 1799. His works consist of songs, pianoforte and organ pieces, flute solos and duets, and an 'Organ Tutor'. His greatest amusement was to explore churchyards and read the inscriptions on the tombstones by the sense of touch.

W. H. H. & F. K.

LINLEY, George (b. Leeds, 1798; d. London, 10 Sept. 1865).

English composer and author. His birthplace was a house in Briggate, Leeds², where his father, James Linley, carried on business as a tinplate worker. As a young man he amused himself with much satirical literature, directed against the magnates of the town. He removed to London, and besides doing much literary work of sundry kinds, wrote the words or the music (frequently both) of some of the most popular drawing-room lyrics of the day: 'Ever of thee', 'I cannot mind my wheel, mother', 'Thou art gone from my gaze', being among these productions.

His operas include 'Francesca Doria' (1849), 'The Toymaker', an adaptation of A. C. Adams's 'La Poupée de Nuremberg', with additional numbers, given at Covent Garden in 1861, and 'Law versus Love' (1862). He wrote the librettos of Balfe's 'Catherine Grey' (1837), Benedict's 'The Gypsy's Warning' (1838, with R. B. Peake) and Frank Mori's 'The River Sprite' (1865), and translated and adapted several foreign operas. He also edited and arranged several collections of songs such as 'Scottish Melodies', 'Songs of the Camp', 'Original Hymn Tunes', etc. Two books of Nursery Rhymes were among his latest musical works. His 'Musical Cynics of London' (1862) was an attack on the metropolitan music critics, H. F. Chorley being severely treated. The 'Modern Hudibras' was published in 1864. He is said to have been a skilled cellist and to have played at the Italian Opera.

F. K., adds.

LINNALA (formerly Bergman), Eino (Mauno Aleksanteri) (b. Helsingfors, 19 Aug. 1896).

Finnish composer. He changed his name in 1906. He was a pupil of Melartin at the Helsingfors Conservatory and of Arthur Willner in Vienna from 1924 to 1927. In 1921-24 he taught at the Conservatory of Viipuri (Viborg) and from 1924 at the Sibelius Academy in Helsingfors. His works include cantatas and partsongs, two Symphonies (1928 and 1936), several orchestral pieces and songs. Most of them are in the Finnish national style. He also published several musical textbooks, e.g. 'Soinnutuksen perusteet' ('Principles of Harmony') (1950).

Linstead, George Frederick (b. Melrose, 24 Jan. 1908).

Scottish composer, pianist and critic. He evinced considerable interest in music from an early age, as may be seen from the fact that his outstanding youthful compositions were an oratorio 'The Revelation of St. John' (composed at the age of thirteen) and an opera based on the 'Agamemnon' of Aeschylus (composed at the age of sixteen). Later he studied with Sir Edward Bairstow (composition), James Ching (pianoforte), and with Professor F. H. Shera at Sheffield University. He took the D.Mus. degree at Durham University. Most of his work has been done in the Sheffield district, where he is well known, for he was appointed organist and choirmaster at Walkley Parish Church in 1933 and music critic to 'The Sheffield Daily Telegraph' in 1940. During and after the war (from 1939 to 1946) he was a Regional Labour Officer in the Ministry of Supply, after which he was appointed assistant lecturer in music to the University of Sheffield (1947).

As a composer he is happiest when writing in the smaller forms (e.g. the short pianoforte pieces in which the influence of his friend Poulenc is evident). But his larger works are nevertheless vital and effective. The 'In Nomine' for orchestra (1940) was frequently performed during the 1939-45 war, and the string Quartet (1941) was selected by the British Selection Committee of the I.S.C.M. Festival, 1946, although it was not one of the works finally chosen for performance. K. A.

LINTERN, James & Walter (b. ? ; d. ?).

English 18th-19th-century music publishers and musical-instrument makers. They worked at Bath about 1782-1817, first at Abbey-Yard, later 3 Abbey Church-Yard. James Lintern carried on the business alone at 13 Grove (now Orange Grove), about 1813-17. He is said to have been a blacksmith and to have given the title 'The Harmonious Blacksmith' (a nickname bestowed on him) to Handel's well-known composition, which he published. But this story is open to question, and no copy of the work published by Lintern with this title has been traced. F. K., rev. W. C. S.

"LINZ" SYMPHONY. The familiar name of Mozart's Symphony in C major, K. 425, composed at the residence of Count Thun at Linz, where Mozart and his wife stayed on their return from Salzburg to Vienna in Oct.-Nov. 1783. The work was first performed at Linz by Thun's domestic orchestra on 4 Nov.

Among Lioncourt's works are the opera 'Jean de la lune' (1915-23), a liturgical drama, 'Le Mystère d'Emmanuel', 'Hyalis le petit faune' (Samain) for solo voices, chorus and orch. (1909), church music, sacred cantatas, chamber music, &c. E. B.

LIPATTI, Dinu (b. Bucharest, 19 Mar. 1917; d. Geneva, 2 Dec. 1950).

Rumanian pianist and composer. He studied the pianoforte under Florica Musicesco at the Bucharest Conservatory until 1931. After winning a prize at the international competition for pianists in Vienna in 1933, he went to Paris and took lessons from Cortot, Dukas and later Nadia Boulanger. By the year 1935 he was established as a pianist of unusual brilliance and power, and he brought to each work he played, whether it was by Schumann, Mozart, Bartók or whoever, the same appreciation of detail and mastery of technical difficulties. He played in England, Holland, Belgium, France and Switzerland with exceptional success, and in 1943 he accepted the post of professor of the virtuoso class at Geneva Conservatory.

Unhappily his very precarious health forced him to cancel many of his later engagements; but, although he died so young, he had reached the topmost rank as a pianist.

Lipatti's first composition, the symphonic suite 'Satrarii' composed in 1933, won him the first prize in the Georges Enesco competition in Bucharest a year later. His other compositions include the Concertino in classical style for pianoforte and orchestra (1935), a 'Symphonie concertante' for two pianofortes and string orchestra, 'Three Nocturnes' and Sonatina for the left hand for pianoforte and 'Three Rumanian Dances' for two pianofortes.

LIPIŃSKI, Karol (Józef) (b. Radzyń, 30 Oct. 1790; d. Urłów nr. Lwów, 16 Dec. 1861).

Polish violinist, conductor and composer. His father, Feliks Lipiński (1765-1847), who taught him the elements of fingering and the rudiments of music, recognizing his unusual gift, wished to show him off as a child prodigy; but the young boy's strong opposition prevailed, and he was allowed to concentrate on his studies and acquire the necessary knowledge of violin technique. In 1810 he became the leader and then the conductor of the Opera orchestra at Lwów. Not being able to play the pianoforte, he led the rehearsals with his violin, thus acquiring that skill in part-playing which was one of his great characteristics as a virtuoso. After four years (1814) he resigned his post and gave himself up to private study. In 1817 he went to Italy, chiefly in the hope of hearing Paganini. They met at Milan. Lipiński attracted the attention of Paganini, who played with him daily and even performed publicly with him at two concerts (17 and 30 Apr. 1818). Undoubtedly these two appearances with Paganini greatly increased Lipiński's reputation. Towards the end of that year Lipiński returned to Germany, but soon went back to Italy wanting to hear and see Dr. Mazzurana, the famous pupil of Tartini. Mazzurana, dissatisfied with Lipiński's performance of one of Tartini's sonatas, but unable on account of his old age (ninety) to correct him by playing it himself, gave him a poem he had written to explain the master's intentions. With this aid Lipiński mastered the sonata and in consequence endeavoured in future to embody some poetical idea in his playing — the secret of his own success and of that of many others who imitated him in this respect. In 1829 Lipiński and Paganini again met, in Warsaw, but unfortunately a rivalry was incited between them which destroyed the old friendship. In 1835-36, in the course of a prolonged musical tour, Lipiński visited Leipzig and there made the acquaintance of Schumann, who, it is worth noting, besides dedicating 'Carneval' (Op. 9) to Lipiński wrote: "Ich habe die grossen Violinisten der neueren Zeit fast alle gehört von Lipiński an bis zu Prume herab".

Lipiński visited England and played his 'Military Concerto' in London, at the Philharmonic concert of 25 Apr. 1836. In 1839 he discontinued touring as a virtuoso and accepted the post of Konzertmeister at Dresden, where he entirely reorganized the royal orchestra and, instead of appearing as soloist, turned his attention towards chamber music, cultivating especially the Beethoven string Quartets. It was at Dresden that Lipiński gave a joint recital with Liszt, performing Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata.

At the age of seventy he retired with a pension and moved to his own estate of Urłów near Lwów, where he died of a sudden paralysis of the lungs.

Lipiński's reputation as a violin virtuoso was great and recognized by all critics, and he was frequently spoken of as the only rival to Paganini. In W. J. Wasielewski's book 'Die Violine und ihre Meister' the author gave a description of Lipiński's technique from which the following passage is quoted:

Lipiński was an eminent violinist of special gifts. Although he had neither a beautiful trill nor a staccato discoverable in his playing, he balanced that lack partly by his spiritual virtues and partly by his marvellous technique of the bow. The sound produced was deep and penetrating. There was absolute certainty in double and triple stops, arpeggio chords and beautiful, clear intonation. He took his bow across the strings slowly and heavily, as do all the great virtuosos who wish to produce a sound of particular strength. He was an eminent exponent of Beethoven, on whose works as well as those of J. S. Bach he spent hours of detailed study. The works of these two masters allowed him to develop successfully his individual style, especially his attitude towards a subjective emotion imbued with mysticism, as well as gravity and emphasis almost pathetic in their expression.

Lipiński's compositions (now forgotten) are numerous. His studies (Opp. 3, 10, 27 and 29), forming a useful complement to the fundamental works of this type by Nardini, Locatelli and Tartini, were included in 'Die Kunst des Violinspiels', a huge collection of violin music (in 8 large volumes) compiled by G. Witting.

Next in importance to the studies are Lipiński's concertos for violin, amounting to four, the third of which (Op. 24, in E minor), called 'Military Concerto', was much played. He wrote several polonaises: two in Op. 6 and three in Op. 9, and the 'Rondos alla polacca' (Opp. 7 & 13), which stand half-way between the strikingly beautiful but elementary polonaises of Ogiński and the masterpieces of Chopin. He also wrote many variations and capriccios for violin, and interludes for an operetta: 'The Quarrel provoked by a Bet' (libretto by J. N. Kamiński). He further adapted for the Polish stage a Viennese opera, Kauer's 'Donauweibchen', with additional music of his own, staged at Lwów in 1814 and repeated every season for nearly thirty years. The music for both these works is lost.

LIPKOVSKA, Lydia (b. Poltava, c. 1887).

Russian soprano singer. She studied in St. Petersburg during the three or four years preceding 1910, when she made her début there at the Maryinsky Theatre. She was engaged for London in the following year for the summer season at Covent Garden and made her first appearance on 11 July in Wolf-Ferrari's 'Segreto di Susanna'. To a voice of singular purity and sweetness, not lacking power in the head register, mounting easily to E♭^{'''}, and admirably trained, she added the charm of an engaging stage presence and a refined, intelligent style. Her success as Susanna she followed up with others as Mimi, Gilda and Violetta, sustaining the last-named part on 22 May 1912, when 'La Traviata' was given at Covent Garden for the 150th time. In these same years she also sang with marked acceptance in New York, Boston and Chicago, extending her repertory by singing Tatiana (in Tchaikovsky's 'Eugene Onegin'), Manon Lescaut and Juliette.

LIPOWSKY, Felix Joseph (b. Wiesensteig, 25 Jan. 1764; d. Munich, 21 Mar. 1844).

German musical lexicographer and composer. He was a high official and councillor in the Bavarian government. On the dissolution of the religious orders under Napoleon he saved the documents and collected them in the State Library, of which he became the head. In 1811 he produced his 'Baierisches Musik-Lexikon'. He composed a Mass for 4 voices (1789) and a number of pianoforte solos and sonatas with and without other instruments, which remained in manuscript.

LIPPHARDT, Walther (b. Wiescherhöfen, Westphalia, 14 Oct. 1906).

German musicologist. He went to school at Cassel and studied musicology under Gur-litt and Bessler at the Universities of Freiburg i/B. and Heidelberg respectively, taking his doctor's degree in 1932. In 1943 he became adviser in German, history and music at the schools of Frankfurt o/M. and in 1947 lecturer in Gregorian music and Catholic church music at the High School for Music there. He also directs song-gatherings of Catholic youth at Altenberg. He has edited various sociable and religious song-books as well as works by Leonhard Lechner (Cassel, 1928–34). He is working at a palaeographic investigation of the 10th-century neumes of Metz, and his finished literary works include:

LIPSIUS, Marie (b. Leipzig, 30 Dec. 1837; d. Leipzig, 2 Mar. 1927).

German writer on musicians, known under the pseudonym of La Mara. She was a member of a literary family. Her works consist of the following: 'Musikalische Studienköpfe' (5 vols., 1868–82, of which the first series went through nine editions); 'Musikalische Gedanken-Polyphonie' (1873), a collection of musicians' sayings about their art; 'Beethoven' (2nd ed. 1873); 'Das Bühnenfestspiel in Bayreuth' (1877); a translation of Liszt's 'Chopin' (1880); 'Musikerbriefe aus fünf Jahrhunderten' (1886); 'Klassisches und Romantisches aus der Tonwelt' (1892). Many other books of hers are of some slight biographical value. She edited several collections of letters, such as Liszt's correspondence of 1828–86 (translated into English by Constance Bache and issued, with some additional letters, in 1894); three volumes of letters to Liszt from various contemporaries (1893–1904); the correspondence between Liszt and Bülow (1898); Berlioz's letters to the Princess Carolyne Sayn-Wittgenstein (1903). Further volumes of Liszt records include 'Liszt und die Frauen' (1911) and 'Briefe F. Liszts an seine Mutter' (1918).

In her book 'Beethoven und die Brunsviks' (1920) La Mara held that the "unsterbliche Gebiete" was Josephine, Therese's younger sister, but, whatever the merits of the claim as such, she is not to be taken seriously as an investigator. She held the title of Royal Professor till her eightieth birthday and in that year published her autobiography, 'Durch Musik und Leben im Dienste des Ideals' (2 vols.). J. A. F.-M., adds.

LIPSKI, Stanisław (b. Warsaw, 9 Apr. 1880; d. Cracow, Sept. 1937).

Polish pianist and composer. He studied music first at the Cracow Conservatory with Żeleński (1892-1900), later in Berlin with Jedliczka and Leichtentritt, and later still in Vienna with Leschetizky and Robert Fuchs. In 1910 he became teacher of the pianoforte at the Cracow Conservatory. As a composer he cultivated the miniature form, in songs as well as in choral works and pianoforte pieces. He undoubtedly was a melodist. The sincerity and striking beauty of his tunes, combined with refined and independently treated pianoforte parts, produce fullness of musical expression. He published numerous songs for solo voice and for male-voice quartet, for which he was awarded many prizes, as well as pianoforte pieces. C. R. H.

LIRA. See LYRA.

LIRA DA BRACCIO (Ital.; lira di sette corde; lira moderna). A bowed instrument, of great popularity in Renaissance times, that passed out of use in the early 17th century. It was a direct development of the flat and waistless "fidel" of the Middle Ages that is always shown played on the shoulder. The tunings given by Jerome of Moravia (c. 1270) for the "fidel" have an affinity with the tunings given later for the lira proper. The instrument had a large, shallow body, often with only a slight waist; the bridge was flat, to allow two or more strings to be played together. The characteristic head is flat and heart-shaped, with vertical pegs. There were seven strings, only three of which were on the fingerboard: the other four formed two bourdons in pairs. In the 15th century a single bourdon was more usual, and sometimes more stopped strings are shown. Ganassi¹ (1543) compares the use of a solo viol for music of several parts (see LYRA-VIOL) with the lira de sette corde. Lanfranco² (1533) gives precise intervals, translated into definite notes by Cerone (1613):

Praetorius³ (1618) gives a slightly different setting, in the same pitch. Lanfranco and Bottrigaro⁴ (1599) distinctly say that the lira was unfretted, but the illustration in Praetorius shows frets. In spite of its long and widespread use, no music specially intended for the lira is known. Apart from its own interest, the lira da braccio may have been an important factor in the evolution of the violin.

G. H. (ii).

LIRA DA GAMBA (Ital.; archiviola da lira; lirone). A bass form of the lira da braccio, but much elaborated. It was evolved in the early part of the 16th century and had a vigorous life in Italy and, later, in France, until the mid-17th century, when it passes from sight. The Italian instrument was large and rested on the ground, but the French form was smaller and could be held on the knees. The number of strings varied from eleven to fifteen, or even sixteen. Five or six varieties of tuning are recorded, though all follow a general pattern: the alternate strings are tuned to diatonic scales pitched a fifth apart. There are two bourdons of pairs in octaves. The purpose of this tuning was to facilitate the performance of music of several parts, such as transcribed madrigals, on this solo instrument. The fingerboard was always fretted. There is a considerable amount of information about the lira da gamba, its technique and its music, in contemporary works: Cerreto⁵ (1601) and Mersenne⁶ (1636) are especially useful. In spite of the obvious technical difficulty of such an instrument, the names of a number of 16th-century virtuosi are recorded: the great French violist Maugars⁷ heard it played in Rome as late as 1639. LISINSKI, Vatroslav (b. Zagreb, 8 July 1819; d. Zagreb, 31 May 1854).

Yugoslav composer. He studied at his birthplace and later with Kittl in Prague. Although he composed assiduously, he failed to make his way, living to the end in obscurity and dying in poverty. Only the first of his two operas, 'Ljubav i zloba' ('Love and Malice'), to a Croatian libretto by Dimitrije Demeter, was produced in his lifetime, at Zagreb on 28 Mar. 1846, and even then only by amateurs and with the music orchestrated, according to contemporary papers, by F. Wiesner von Morgenstern.⁸ The work was revived at Zagreb in 1871 and 1895, and Lisinski's second opera, 'Porin', again to a Croatian libretto by Demeter set about 1848-1849, was produced at Zagreb forty-three years after his death, on 2 Oct. 1897.

Lisinski's other works include 7 overtures and 'Evening' for orchestra, many dances, choruses, songs, etc.

LISLEY, John (b. ?; d. ?).

English 16th-17th-century composer. He contributed a six-part madrigal — 'Faire Citharea presents hir doves' — to 'The Triumphes of Oriana', 1601 (see Eng. Madr. Sch., Vol. XXXII), but no other composition by him has survived, nor is anything known of his biography.

LISSA, Zofia (b. Lwów, 19 Oct. 1908).

Polish musicologist. After completing her musical and general education at Lwów in 1924 and 1925 respectively, she took an academic course at the University there (Professor Chybiński), obtaining the degree of B.Mus. in 1930 and later that of Ph.D. From 1930 she pursued a pedagogic career at the Lwów Conservatory, teaching the theory of music until 1941. After the second world war she acted as cultural attaché at the Polish Embassy in Moscow (1945-47) and after her return to Poland she was appointed to the post of vice director of the Music Department in the Ministry of Art and Culture in Warsaw (1947-49). In 1948 she was made lecturer of Warsaw University, becoming Professor of Musicology there in 1950. For her activities she was awarded the silver and gold Medals of Merit. She has been a member of the committee of management of the Polish Composers Association since 1948.

Zofia Lissa has written scores of books, essays and articles, including 'The Social Significance of Music in the History of Mankind' (Lwów, 1930); 'The Harmony of A. N. LISSENKO, Nikolay Vitalevich (b. Grinsky, Ukraine, 22 Mar. 1842; d. Kiev, 6 Nov. 1912).

Russian composer. Coming of a family of small landowners — his father was an officer in the Cossack army — he displayed an early interest in the music performed by the private bands which in those days were attached to neighbouring great houses. He attended the Universities of Kharkov and Kiev, from which latter he graduated in 1864 as a physicist; but it was decided to develop his apparent musical aptitude, and he migrated to Leipzig to enter the Conservatory, studying composition and pianoforte with Reinecke and theory with Richter. He returned to Kiev in 1868, but later spent two years (1874-76) in St. Petersburg studying orchestration with Rimsky-Korsakov, after which he began to devote himself to researches in musical ethnography. On publication of his series of songs of the Kobzars (minstrels) to words by Shevchenko he was acclaimed as a Ukrainian hero and was affectionately dubbed "the Little-Russian nightingale". In a brochure published in 1874 Lissenko traces the origin of Ukrainian folksong to the ancient Greek modes and explains their difference from those of Great Russia. In the latter are to be found a more or less strict adherence to the church modes of the middle ages, and they are consistently diatonic, whereas in the songs of the Ukraine there is a measure of chromaticism — due to the Ukrainian urge to express the emotions felt by the singer. In them also is a consistency of rhythm in place of the constant changes to be observed in the songs of Great Russia. Such differences appear to have inspired his disinclination to permit the translation of his Ukrainian operatic librettos into Russian when performances of them were mooted outside his country, and this, in turn, is evidence of his profound anxiety to resist the "russification" so prevalent in his day. He was a patriot who suffered from and repeatedly protested against the suppression of his country's music, art, literature and language during the tsarist rule. He greatly assisted in immortalizing the martyr-poet Shevchenko, whose poems he set to music.

Lissenko's principal operas were based on texts from Gogol. 'Rizdiviana Nich' is the Ukrainian title bestowed on 'Christmas Eve Revels' and 'The Drowned Woman' is a version of 'A Night in May'. 'Taras Bulba', based on the "Russian Dickens's" famous novel, attracted the favourable attention of Tchaikovsky, who attempted to secure a performance in Moscow, but became disenchanted owing to its composer's dislike of translation from the Ukrainian vernacular. In his Memoirs Rimsky-Korsakov refers to an evening spent with his former pupil, Lissenko, in 1896, when the 'Snow Maiden' was being staged at Kiev, at which party he became acquainted with a Ukrainian dish called varenik and parts of 'Taras Bulba' — expressing a distinct preference for the gastronomic example. Referring to the characterization of Oxana, the heroine of 'Christmas Eve Revels', Cheshikhin expresses the opinion that Lissenko's portrait is much nearer to Gogol's lively young village maiden than Tchaikovsky's presentation in his 'Tcherevichky'.

In celebration of thirty-five years of his activity Lissenko resolved to found a musico-dramatic school. Thoroughly dissatisfied with the dry methods of teaching music adopted by the Imperial Russian Musical Society's branch establishment at Kiev, which he described as "a withered flower daubed over with rouge", he was able to carry out this project with the assistance of a number of loyal and patriotic subscribers. He had every reason for dissatisfaction with the Society. Ivanov, considering that he was writing long before the Revolution, was surprisingly candid when he wrote that the Imperial Society, doubtless for political reasons, completely ignored Lissenko's music for some forty years and even its Kiev branch behaved as though he did not exist. Such an attitude is the more astonishing in consideration of the widespread esteem in which the composer was held in all parts of the Ukraine. It should be understood that post-revolutionary communications describing him as a prophet of the present administration of the Ukraine — an agricultural country which now objects so strongly to being considered "ripe for development" of myriad industrial enterprises — should be accepted with reserve.

The following are Lissenko's principal compositions:

OPERAS

- 'Taras Bulba', after Gogol.
- 'Sappho.'
- 'Christmas Eve Revels', after Gogol.
- 'Aeneid', after Virgil.

OPERETTAS

- 'Chronomortsy.'
- 'Night in May' ('The Drowned Woman'), after Gogol.
- 'Pan Kotsky', for children.
- 'The Goat' for children.
- 'Winter and Spring.'

CHORAL WORK

- 'Zapovit' (Shevchenko) for tenor & men's chorus.

VIOLIN AND PIANOFORTE

- 3 Rhapsodies.

FLUTE AND PIANOFORTE

- Fantasy.

PIANOFORTE MUSIC

- 40 works, chiefly on Ukrainian themes.

SONGS

- Numerous songs with pf., incl. settings of Heine trans. into Little-Russian by Lesia Ukrainka.

FOLKSONG COLLECTIONS

- 40 Ukrainian Songs for voice & pf.
- 80 Songs (2 books).
- 100 Songs (10 books).

WRITINGS

LIST, Eugene (b. Philadelphia, 6 July 1918).

American pianist. A year after his birth his family moved to Kiverside, California, where he began to study the pianoforte at an early age with Julius V. Seyler. When twelve years old he appeared as soloist with the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra. A benefit concert provided funds to send him east for further study; going to Philadelphia at the age of thirteen, he won a competition for a scholarship for study with Olga Samaroff-Stokowski. In 1934 he was the winner in a competition held by the Philadelphia Orchestra, with which he made his first appearance that Dec. in the American première of Shostakovich's Concerto. This was also the vehicle of his New York début with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in Dec. 1935, followed by his first New York recital on 6 Jan. 1936.

In Mar. 1942, when he was nationally known as an unusually promising young pianist, List joined the U.S. Army, with which he served for nearly four years. While stationed in New York he was able to make occasional public appearances. In 1944-45 he served in the European war theatre for nine months, entertaining for the Army's Special Services. On 19 July 1945 he played for President Truman, Winston Churchill and Josef Stalin during their meeting at Potsdam, and he was discharged with the rank of technical sergeant in Jan. 1946. He made European tours in 1946 and 1947. In 1943 he married Carroll Glenn, a young concert violinist, with whom he has made many joint concert appearances in recent years. In 1952 they were the soloists in Paris in the first performance of Manuel Rosenthal's 'Aesopi Convivium', with the composer conducting the Orchestre National.

LISTOV, Konstantin (b. ?, 1900).

Russian composer. He was of working-class origin, but as a child played the mandoline, balalaika and the pianoforte by ear and in 1914 entered a school for music at Tsaritsin — now Stalingrad. He graduated in 1917, having completed courses in pianoforte and composition. The following year he enlisted voluntarily in the ranks of the Red Army and was frequently in action; he was seriously wounded at the time of the heroic defence of Tsaritsin. The soldiers of the Tenth Army, to which he belonged, often sang songs composed by him at the front. The command of the Army, having noticed his talent, decided to send him to Saratov to continue his musical education. There he spent three years, 1919-1921, and graduated from the Conservatory after studying composition under Rudolph, a pupil of Sergey Taneyev. But even during these years he often went to the front and visited units of the Red Army and Navy, teaching the men the songs which he had written. From the atmosphere of the front line he derived inspiration for new songs.

In 1923 Listov moved to Moscow, where he devoted himself to creative work. In the course of his years of study he wrote several symphonic compositions and a Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra. On his arrival in Moscow he spent much time on a number of musical comedies, among them 'The Queen is Wrong', 'The Ice House' and 'Jenny', which were successfully produced in several theatres. In addition, he wrote music for a production of Molière's 'Bourgeois gentilhomme', 'Money Box' by Labiche ('La Cagnotte'), and for satirical revues produced in the Moscow Maly Theatre.

Listov's main field remains, however, the song of battle. He is thoroughly acquainted with the life of the Red Army and Navy, with the moods and aspirations of the men, with whom he fought shoulder to shoulder during the years of the Civil War. This is why his songs are so popular in the Red Army and Navy, and among the whole Soviet people—for example, the famous 'Song of Tachanka', 'Beloved Grass', 'On Guard', 'In the Dugout', etc. In all he has written over two hundred such songs, many of them composed in the course of the war. LISZT, Ferencz (Franz) (b. Raiding, Hungary, 22 Oct. 1811; d. Bayreuth, 31 July 1886).

Hungarian pianist and composer. He was the son of Adam Liszt, a steward in the service of Prince Esterházy and a musical amateur of sufficient attainment to instruct his son in the rudiments of pianoforte playing. The family spoke German, and although part of Liszt's career was devoted to the teaching of music in Hungary and to the cultivation of what was then regarded as national Hungarian music, he never spoke Hungarian well. He became a thorough cosmopolitan, living mainly at Weimar and in Rome, and speaking and writing French by preference.

At the age of nine he made his first appearances in public at Sopron and Bratislava with such success that several Hungarian noblemen guaranteed him sufficient means to continue his studies for six years. For that purpose he went to Vienna, where he made his first public appearance on 1 Dec. 1822. His genius was acknowledged with an enthusiasm in which the whole musical public of the Austrian capital joined unanimously. Liszt gave a second concert on 13 Apr. 1823, at which Beethoven was present and at the end publicly kissed him on the forehead. Liszt took lessons from Czerny on the pianoforte and from Salieri and possibly Randhartinger in composition. The latter introduced the lad to his friend Schubert. His first appearance in print was with a variation (the 24th) on the waltz by Diabelli which prompted Beethoven's famous set. Liszt's variation was part of another set contributed to by numerous composers.¹

In 1823 Liszt proceeded to Paris, where it was hoped that his rapidly growing reputation would gain him admission to the Conservatoire in spite of his foreign origin. But Cherubini refused to make an exception in his favour, and he continued his studies under Reicha and Paer. In 1824 he paid his first visit to England, appearing in the Argyll Rooms, London, on 21 June, and on 29 June at Drury Lane, having, in the words of the original playbill, "consented to display his inimitable powers on the New Grand Piano Forte, invented by Sébastien Erard". In the following season he visited London again and played at the Duke of Devonshire's on 13 May 1825 and elsewhere, and in June he played twice at Manchester. Shortly afterwards he made his first serious attempt at composition: an operetta in one act, called 'Don Sanche', was produced at the Académie Royale, Paris, on 17 Oct. 1825.² Artistic tours to Switzerland, France and England occupied Liszt till 1827, when he lost his father and was thrown on his own resources to provide for himself and his mother. During his stay in Paris, where he settled for some years, he became acquainted with the leaders of French literature, Victor Hugo, Lamartine and George Sand, the influence of whose works may be discovered in his compositions. More important still was his intercourse with Chopin and Berlioz, who both profoundly influenced his development as a composer. For a time he was attracted by the tenets of the Saint-Simonians, but in later years he denied that he had ever joined that body.³ In 1833 he became acquainted with the Countess d'Agoult, better known by her literary name of Daniel Stern, with whom he formed an intimacy which lasted till 1839

(though they continued to meet at regular intervals till 1844), and by whom he had three children, a son, one daughter who became the wife of Émile Ollivier, the French statesman, and another, Cosima, married first to Hans von Bulow and later to Wagner. He spent a good part of the years 1835-39 with the countess in Switzerland and Italy, and composed the 'Années de pèlerinage' at this period.

The public concerts which Liszt gave during the latter part of his stay in Paris placed his claim to the first rank among pianists on a firm basis, and at last he was induced, much against his will, to adopt the career of a virtuoso. The dazzling career of Paganini, to which his own was to be in some sort a parallel, no doubt attracted him forcibly, as did also that artist's compositions: Liszt's transcriptions for pianoforte of five of his Caprices and 'La Campanella' were first published in 1840. The years 1839-47 Liszt spent in travelling almost incessantly from one country to another. This was the period of his greatest brilliance and success; he was lionized everywhere he went as no virtuoso had been before. His travels covered the whole of Europe, from Portugal to Turkey and Russia. In London he played at the Philharmonic concerts of 21 May 1827, 11 May 1840, 8 June 1840 and 14 June 1841. His reception seems to have been less warm than was expected¹, and Liszt, with his usual generosity, at once undertook to bear the loss that might have fallen on his agent. Of this generosity numerous instances might be cited. The disaster caused at Pest by the inundation of the Danube (1838) was considerably alleviated by the princely sum — the result of several concerts — which he contributed. When two years later a sum had been collected for a statue to be erected to him at Pest, he insisted that the money should be given to a struggling young sculptor, whom he, moreover, assisted from his private means. The poor of Raiding also had cause to remember the visit paid by Liszt to his native village about the same time. It is well known that Beethoven's monument at Bonn, erected in 1845, owed its existence, or at least its speedy completion, to Liszt's liberality. When the subscriptions for the purpose began to fail, Liszt offered to pay the balance required from his own pocket, provided only that the choice of the sculptor should be left to him.

From 1842 dates Liszt's more intimate connection with Weimar, where in 1848 he settled for thirteen years. This stay was to be fruitful in more than one sense. The Princess Carolyne von Sayn-Wittgenstein united her life with his in 1848, and their house at Weimar, the Altenburg, was for many years a centre of artistic influence, always exerted on behalf of the most modern tendencies in music. The princess undoubtedly collaborated with Liszt in the composition of various literary efforts that made a considerable stir at the time: including the Life of Chopin and some pamphlets on the early works of Wagner², whom Liszt had first met in 1841, and whose genius he had quickly recognized. When Liszt closed his career as a virtuoso and accepted a permanent engagement as conductor of the court theatre at Weimar, he did so with the distinct purpose of becoming the advocate of the rising musical generation, by the performance of such works as were written regardless of immediate success, and therefore had little chance of seeing the light of the stage. At short intervals some twenty operas by living composers were either performed for the first time or revived on the Weimar stage. Among these there may be mentioned Wagner's 'Lohengrin', 'Tannhäuser' and 'The Flying Dutchman', 'Benvenuto Cellini' by Berlioz, and Schumann's 'Genève' and music to Byron's 'Manfred'. Schubert's 'Alfonso und Estrella' was also rescued from oblivion by Liszt's exertions. For a time it seemed as if this small provincial city were once more to be the artistic centre of Germany, as it had been in the days of Goethe, Schiller and Herder. From all sides musicians and amateurs flocked to Weimar, to witness the astonishing feats to which a small but excellent community of singers and instrumentalists were inspired by the genius of their leader. It was, indeed, at these Weimar gatherings that the musicians who formed the so-called School of the Future, till then unknown to each other and divided locally and mentally, came first to a clear understanding of their powers and aspirations.

But in a still higher sense the soil of Weimar, with its great traditions, was to prove a field of rich harvest. When, as early as 1842, Liszt undertook the direction of a certain number of concerts each year at Weimar, his friend Duverger wrote: "Cette place, qui oblige Liszt à séjourner trois mois de l'année à Weimar, doit marquer peut-être pour lui la transition de sa carrière de virtuose à celle de compositeur", a prophecy that was before long to come true.

The last concert given by Liszt for his own benefit was that at Elisabethgrad towards the end of 1847³, after which his artistic activity was exclusively devoted to the benefit of others. No more striking evidence of the nobility of Liszt's purpose and of the gracious manner in which he fulfilled it could be wished for than that contained in the published correspondence between Liszt and Wagner.⁴ The first two volumes cover the Weimar period, but by no means represent the extent of the friendship between these two great men, which suffered somewhat when Wagner induced Cosima to leave Bulow for him, but remained fundamentally sound until the younger master's death.

Liszt made Weimar, during the thirteen years of his residence, the centre of a new musical life in Germany. "I had dreamed for Weimar a new art period", he wrote in 1860, "similar to that of Karl August, in which Wagner and I would have been the leaders as formerly Goethe and Schiller had been; but unfavourable circumstances brought these dreams to nothing." Though he did not accomplish all he wished for Weimar, the little town continued to rank high among German art centres, and in some degree the work of advancement so firmly established between the years 1844 and 1861 was carried on in subsequent years.

The aspect of Liszt's everyday life at Weimar has become known through the accounts of some of the host of aspiring pianists and music-lovers who gathered round him there. Liszt's teaching had already borne fruit in the achievements of his most distinguished pupils — Bulow, Tausig and others — and no wonder that the music-room which the generous artist had thrown open to all comers was thronged by a number of gifted young people in search of inspiration.

Liszt held his classes in the afternoon, during which several of the pupils would play in the presence of the rest — some dozen or more, perhaps — all being expected to attend. At times he would seat himself at the piano and play, but this supreme pleasure could never be counted upon. A lively description of this professorial life has been given by an American lady who visited Weimar in 1873.¹ In 1853 Liszt left his official position at the Weimar Opera² owing to the captious opposition made to the production of Cornelius's 'Barber of Bagdad'. There then ensued a period with Rome as his headquarters which Liszt called his vie trifurquée, divided between Budapest, Weimar and Rome. The Hungarian government, in order to ensure Liszt's presence in Budapest during part of the year, created him a Royal Hungarian councillor (1871); a proposal to found a National Academy of Music with Liszt as president was at first rejected, but accepted in 1875. Impressive scenes occurred when the Magyars publicly fêted their compatriot³, and hero-worship was at its height on such occasions as the jubilee of the master's career in 1873, when 'Christus' was performed at the Hungarian capital. 'The Legend of St. Elizabeth' had already been given there in 1865.

In Rome again Liszt found himself the centre of an artistic circle. The significance, however, of his residence there lies rather in the view he took of it as his années de recueillement, which ultimately led to his binding himself as closely as he could to the Church of Rome. He who in his youth, with the thirst for knowledge upon him, had enjoyed the writings of freethinkers and atheists (without being convinced by them), was now content with his breviary and book of hours; the impetuous artist who had felt the fascination of Saint-Simonianism before he had thoroughly understood its raison d'être, who had been carried away by the currents of the Revolution and had even in 1841 joined the Freemasons⁴, received the tonsure on 25 Apr. 1865 and thus became a secular priest. Three months later he received the other three minor orders. In 1879 he was made an honorary canon of St. Albano in Rome. The Abbé Liszt, who as a boy had wished to enter the priesthood but was dissuaded therefrom by his parents and his confessor, now rejoiced in the public avowal of his creed as conveyed by his priestly garb, although he could neither say Mass nor hear a confession and was at liberty to discard his cassock, and even to marry if he chose, without causing scandal. But marriage with the Princess Sayn-Wittgenstein, by which he had long desired to legalize his union with her, had been frustrated at the very moment when success seemed to be at hand, by a papal decree which refused to sanction a divorce from her Russian husband. Thus, in the struggle with the world which the youth of sixteen had so much dreaded, his religious fervour was destined to carry the day. Extracts from Liszt's private papers throwing further light on his inmost thoughts have been published.⁵

In the last year of his life he received special honours in the two capitals where his earliest successes had been won. On 25 Mar. 1886 his 'Gran Mass', first performed at the consecration of Gran cathedral on 31 Aug. 1856, was given at Saint-Eustache, Paris, while his former triumphs in England were destined to be eclipsed by the enthusiasm of the reception which awaited him upon his long-deferred return. In 1824 George IV had given the sign to the aristocracy of homage to the child prodigy; and his visits in the following year and in 1827 had been successful enough. In 1840-41⁶ Queen Victoria's favour was granted to him, and he shared with Thalberg a reputation as a skilful pianist in fashionable circles.

But it was not until 1886 that the vast success which had hitherto been withheld from him was accorded him in full measure.

Liszt paused a while in Paris on his way to London and received much attention, his musical friends and followers gathering to meet him at the concerts of Colonne, Lamoureux and Padeloup. At length, on 3 Apr., he reached the English shores, and on the same evening three or four hundred people met at Mr. Littleton's house at Sydenham to do him honour, and a programme consisting entirely of his compositions was gone through by his pupil Walter Bache and others. Liszt, however, chose to play Chopin's Nocturne in A \flat . On the following day he played part of his E \flat Concerto before a few friends. On the Monday he attended the rehearsal of his oratorio 'St. Elizabeth' in St. James's Hall, and in the evening he astonished his host and a circle of friends by an improvisation on some of the themes. The date of the concert, which was conducted by Mackenzie, was 6 Apr., and when the composer walked into the hall he received such ovations as had probably never been offered to an artist in England before. Even before he entered his arrival was announced by the shouts of the crowd outside, who hailed him as if he were a king returning to his kingdom. During the afternoon Liszt had been entertained at the R.A.M., where the Liszt Scholarship, raised by the zeal of Walter Bache, was presented by him to the master. A short programme was performed, Shakespeare and Mackenzie conducting, and then Liszt rose, moved to the piano and played, to the delight of all present. A visit to Windsor, where he played to the queen a reminiscence of the Rose Miracle scene from 'St. Elizabeth', filled up most of the following day (7 Apr.); on the next evening Bache's reception at the Grosvenor Gallery took place. The events which followed in the course of the visit included a performance of 'St. Elizabeth' at the Crystal Palace on the 17th. On the 20th, a week later than he intended, Liszt left England, pleased with his reception and promising to repeat his visit. But he did not return and his death was felt by English people as the loss of a personal friend. The last music he wrote was a bar or two of Mackenzie's 'Troubadour', upon which he had intended to write a fantasia.

Paris gave him a performance of 'St. Elizabeth' at the Trocadéro. Leaving Paris in May, Liszt visited in turn Antwerp, Jena and Sondershausen. He attended the summer festival there while suffering from weakness and cold. "On m'a mis les bottes pour le grand voyage", he said, excusing himself to a friend for remaining seated. His last appearance on a concert platform was on 19 July, when, accompanied by M. and Mme Munkácsy, he attended a concert of the Musical Society of Luxemburg. At the end of the concert he was prevailed upon to seat himself at the piano. He played a fantasia and a 'Soirée de Vienne'. In the pages of Janka Wohl's 'François Liszt' there is an account of a scene during Liszt's stay at the Munkácsys' house, according to the writer a record of the last time the greatest master of the pianoforte touched his instrument. A flying visit had been paid to Bayreuth on the marriage of Daniela von Bülow — Liszt's granddaughter — on 3 July. Liszt returned again for the performance of 'Parsifal' on the 23rd. He was suffering from a bronchial attack, but the cough for a day or two became less troublesome, and he ventured to attend another performance, an exceptionally fine one of 'Tristan', during which his face shone full of life and happiness, though his weakness was so great that he had been almost carried between the carriage and Cosima Wagner's box. This memorable performance, in which the singers (Sucher, Vogl, etc.) and players surpassed themselves, lingered in Liszt's mind until his death. When he returned home he was prostrate, and those surrounding him feared the worst. The patient was confined to his bed and kept perfectly quiet. The case was from the first hopeless, the immediate cause of death being general weakness rather than the severe cold and inflammation of the lungs which supervened on 31 July 1886. His death that night was painless.

Liszt's memory has been honoured in a practical way in many places. Liszt societies existed during his lifetime, and after his death they multiplied. Immediately after the funeral a meeting of the leading musicians was held at Bayreuth, at which Richter made a speech and urged that all the living forces of the artistic world should unite to preserve the master's memory by perfect renderings of his own and other modern works. The Grand Duke of Weimar, Liszt's friend and protector, sent the intendant of the theatre to Bayreuth to confer with Richter upon the best means of perpetuating Liszt's intentions. He proposed a Liszt foundation after the manner of the Mozarteum at Salzburg. A Liszt museum was to be established in the house where he lived at Weimar, and scholarships were to be offered to promising young musicians, and on similar lines scholarships have been instituted elsewhere. The outcome of this project was the Fondation Liszt.

Among portraits of the master the bust executed by Boehm, and exhibited in 1886 at the Grosvenor Gallery in London, has great interest for English people, as Liszt sat for it during his visit to Sydenham in the same year. The head of Liszt upon his death-bed has been successfully represented in a plaster cast by Weissbrod & Schnappauf of Bayreuth. On pp. 149 and 219 of Janka Wohl's volume, and in the second volume of L. Ramann's Life, a detailed account and list of portraits and paintings may be found.

LISZT AS A PIANIST.—The subject of Liszt's playing is more fully discussed elsewhere.¹ It must suffice here to quote two descriptions dating from different periods in his life. Sir Charles Hallé heard him for the first time in 1836, and wrote²:

Such marvels of executive skill and power I could never have imagined. He was a giant, and Rubinstein spoke the truth when, at a time when his own triumphs were greatest, he said that in comparison with Liszt all other pianists were children. Chopin carried you with him into a dreamland, in which you would have liked to dwell for ever; Liszt was all sunshine and dazzling splendour, subjugating his hearers with a power that none could withstand. For him there were no difficulties of execution, the most incredible seeming child's play under his fingers. One of the transcendent merits of his playing was the crystal-like clearness which never failed for a moment even in the most complicated and, to anybody else, impossible passages; it was as if he had photographed them in their minutest detail upon the ear of his listener. The power he drew from his instrument was such as I have never heard since, but never harsh, never suggesting "thumping".

Fifty years later J. A. Fuller-Maitland heard him on the occasion of his last visit to London in 1886, and wrote in an earlier edition of this Dictionary:

... his playing was a thing never to be forgotten or approached by later artists. The peculiar quiet brilliance of his rapid passages, the noble proportion kept between the parts and the meaning and effect which he put into the music were the most striking points.

The general consensus of opinion seems to be that Liszt was unrivalled as a pianist in his own age, and has probably remained so; and a study of his earlier and more brilliant pianoforte works will show the formidable nature of the technical difficulties which he surmounted with such apparent ease.

ORIGINAL PIANOFORTE WORKS.—As a composer Liszt explored practically every field of activity; but, as might be expected, a large part of his output is for pianoforte solo. His earliest surviving works, written in his teens, show a Czernian technical brilliance, but little personality; the most interesting are the original versions of the 'Transcendental Studies'. His first mature works, the 'Apparitions' and the single piece 'Harmonies poétiques et religieuses' (1834) mark an astonishing step forward: they show a romantic sensitivity and contain daring harmonic and rhythmic experiments. The third 'Apparition' is also interesting as being Liszt's first transcription of Schubert, written only six years after the latter's death. The 'Album d'un voyageur' and 'Années de pèlerinage', also dating in their original versions from the 1830s, show the same sensitivity and a remarkable faculty for mood-painting. Finally, in the Transcendental and Paganini Studies, Liszt translated Paganini's virtuosity into terms of the pianoforte and thereby laid the foundations of modern pianoforte technique.

His travels as a virtuoso in the 1840s kept Liszt too busy to write much more than pieces of a fairly superficial character, but after settling at Weimar he produced the bulk of the pianoforte music by which he is chiefly known. Apart from revised versions of the two sets of studies and the 'Années de pèlerinage', this included the 'Grosses Konzertsolo' and the Sonata, to which Liszt applied the system of "transformation of themes" he had evolved in his symphonic poems, the second 'Ballade' and the set of 'Harmonies poétiques et religieuses'. Though the last-named collection is uneven in value, it contains at least two masterpieces, the 'Bénédiction de Dieu dans la solitude' and 'Funérailles'. At the same time he published the first fifteen Hungarian Rhapsodies, which date in their original form from the previous decade; they are brilliant if superficial exploitations of gypsy music, as opposed to the native Hungarian folk music.

The pianoforte works of the 1860s are few, and mainly religious in character; they include the two 'Legends' and the 'Weinen, Klagen' Variations, which show an advanced use of chromaticism. But it is the works of Liszt's last years which are the most remarkable: these sombre, austere and desolate pieces look forward harmonically to Debussy and even Bartók, and it is almost unbelievable that the composer of 'La lugubre gondola', 'Nuages gris' or the third 'Mephisto Waltz' should be the same man who wrote brilliant fantasies on themes of Donizetti and Rossini. These late pieces are unique in music and are unjustly neglected to-day.

PIANOFORTE TRANSCRIPTIONS.—Liszt's transcriptions fall mainly into two categories: the partitions de piano, which are more or less straight arrangements of orchestral works and songs, and the operatic fantasies. The former fulfilled in their day the function of the modern gramophone record, that of enabling audiences and amateurs to become familiar with new or underplayed works when no orchestra or singer was available. In this way Liszt was able to popularize the symphonies of Beethoven and Berlioz, the songs of Schubert and the operas of Wagner at a time when these composers' music was either controversial or unknown. His capacity for translating orchestral effects into pianistic terms is certainly astonishing; who would have believed it possible to transcribe Berlioz's 'Fantastic Symphony' successfully for pianoforte? Yet

Liszt's performance of the 'March to the Scaffold' is said by Sir Charles Hallé¹, who was present, to have made an even greater effect than the orchestral version at a concert where both were played. But brilliant though many of these transcriptions are, their usefulness is not great in a world equipped with more realistic means of reproduction.

The operatic fantasies are a different matter; they are original compositions on other composers' themes, and not mere conventional pot-pourris. The best of them, such as those on 'Norma' and 'Don Giovanni' and the waltz from Gounod's 'Faust' give, as it were, a miniature survey of the operas they derive from, and though many of them are not first-class musically, there is no mistaking the brilliance with which they are carried out. A further point is that Liszt was able to help a number of younger composers, such as Cui, Raff, Saint-Saëns and Tchaikovsky by making transcriptions of their works.

ORCHESTRAL WORKS.—Liszt's principal achievement here was the evolution of the one-movement symphonic poem, based on the principle of "transformation of themes". This idea was not new: it had been used, for instance, by Schubert in his "Wanderer" Fantasy, but Liszt developed it to a far greater degree than ever before, and it became the genesis of the Wagnerian system of Leitmotive. The symphonic poems in general attempt to portray the over-all mood of their subject (e.g. 'Hamlet') rather than to tell a detailed story like those of Strauss; but in some cases there is a simple literary programme which is followed in the music (e.g. 'Hunnenschlacht', 'Mazeppa'). Harmonically they show an advanced degree of chromaticism which had a considerable influence on Wagner, as he himself admitted.

Liszt began the study of orchestration late in life, and the early versions of the symphonic poems were mainly scored by Raff and Conradi; but he quickly achieved considerable mastery in this direction, and the final published versions of all his orchestral pieces are the work of his own hand.

Liszt applied the principles of his symphonic poems to his 'Faust' and 'Dante' symphonies, the former of which is generally considered his masterpiece. His later orchestral works include the 'Two Episodes from Lenau's "Faust"' (of which the second is the well-known first 'Mephisto Waltz'), the remarkable symphonic poem 'From the Cradle to the Grave' and the 'Trois Odes funèbres', of which the first, 'Les Morts', is a moving elegy in memory of his son Daniel. The middle section of the first 'Mephisto Waltz' contains some interesting anticipations of Skriabin's harmonic methods, while 'From the Cradle to the Grave' goes even farther in its experimental use of harmony. The second 'Mephisto Waltz', of a rather different character from the first, is remarkable for the extraordinary violence of its final pages.

WORKS FOR PIANOFORTE AND ORCHESTRA.—Liszt's works in this category also follow the one-movement form of the symphonic poems in the main. One of the most interesting is the so-called 'Malediction' concerto for pianoforte and strings, written probably some time in the 1840s; it presents a varied selection of mood-pictures and some remarkable harmonic effects. It also appears to be one of Liszt's earliest attempts at original orchestration; the string writing, though undeniably effective in sound, is extremely awkward for the players. This defect disappears in the two concertos, which are most skilfully written for both soloist and orchestra; the second is the longer and the more important musically, though the first tends to be underrated because of the modern practice of playing it much too fast. Liszt's most important work in this form is the 'Totentanz', a set of variations on the 'Dies irae' inspired by Orcagna's 'Triumph of Death' at Pisa; here his romantic and macabre imagination is seen at its finest. His transcription for pianoforte and orchestra of Schubert's "Wanderer" Fantasy is both extremely effective and also faithful to Schubert.

ORGAN MUSIC.—Apart from numerous arrangements for pianoforte duet and two pianos, Liszt wrote little in the way of other instrumental music. He did, however, produce some important works for the organ, of which the finest are the Fantasy and Fugue on "Ad nos, ad salutarem undam" (from Meyerbeer's 'Le Prophète') and the Prelude and Fugue on B.A.C.H. In these works Liszt introduced his new chromatic technique to a field which had produced little but academic music since Bach's day; and his example influenced a number of later composers, including, for instance, Julius Reubke in his Sonata on Psalm XCIV. The opening section of the Fugue on B.A.C.H. is so chromatic as to be almost atonal, and the whole work is full of dramatic effects which had hitherto been considered outside the sphere of organ music.

CHORAL WORKS.—Liszt's interest in choral music began with his Weimar period and culminated in the two big oratorios, 'St. Elizabeth' and 'Christus'. In these he attempted to vivify the academicism of much of contemporary choral writing by introducing the dramatic effects of his symphonies and symphonic poems. They are uneven works, which do not always seem to fulfil the composer's aspirations, but they contain a good deal of fine and effective music which deserves to be heard more often than it is to-day. The same may be said of the Gran and Hungarian Coronation Masses and the dramatic setting of Psalm XIII for tenor solo, chorus and orchestra. Liszt also composed a number of smaller choral works which he intended for liturgical use, but the conservatism of the ecclesiastical authorities of the time prevented him from carrying out his aim of revolutionizing church music. Some of these later choral works are extremely remarkable harmonically, especially the 'Via Crucis' (the 14 Stations of the Cross) for soloists, chorus and organ (1878-79). Among a number of secular choral works the most important are the two Beethoven cantatas (the first being written for the unveiling of the Beethoven memorial at Bonn in 1845) and the choruses from Herder's 'Prometheus Unbound'. On the whole this category does not represent Liszt at his most characteristic.

SONGS.—Liszt's first songs date from 1839, and between then and the end of his life he composed over seventy. They are settings in the original languages of French, German, Italian, Hungarian and English poems, and show a lyrical feeling and a sensitivity of mood comparable to the best of the pianoforte pieces. Particularly successful are the settings of Goethe, Heine and Hugo, mostly composed in the 1840s and revised later. The songs of the last period are similar to the late pianoforte pieces in their desolate gloom and extraordinary harmonic effects. All in all, Liszt's songs can certainly be ranked with the finest of 19th-century romantic Lieder and deserve more attention than they normally get.

CATALOGUE OF WORKS

The original sources for a catalogue of Liszt's works are: (i) two thematic catalogues compiled by Liszt himself and published in 1855 and 1877 respectively (Leipzig, B. & H.); (ii) a MS list of the works played by Liszt at his concerts between 1838 and 1848, together with a catalogue of his compositions; (iii) a MS catalogue compiled by the Princess Savn-Wittgenstein. The two latter are in the Liszt Museum at Weimar. Further useful sources are the 'Musikalsch-literarischer Monatsbericht' of the publishing-house of Hofmeister, Ludwig Friewitzer's 'Chronologisch-systematisches Verzeichnis sämtlicher Tonwerke Franz Liszts' (Vienna, 1887) and the catalogue in August Gollerich's 'Franz Liszt' (Berlin, 1908). The best and most complete catalogue is that in the second volume of Peter Raabe's 'Franz Liszt' (Stuttgart, 1931), and Raabe's numbering is given below, so that his catalogue may be consulted for further details, though it needs some additions and corrections, some of which will be found in Emil Haraszti's article 'Le Problème Liszt' (see Bibl.). The detailed corrections to Raabe's catalogue kindly supplied by Dr. Friedrich Schnapp, Hamburg, have also been invaluable. The section and volume in which each work appears in the collected edition, published by Breitkopf & Hartel under the auspices of the Franz Liszt-Stiftung, is also added.

The following catalogue attempts to include all Liszt's works, except for a number of unpublished pieces of only a few bars' length written for private albums. In so complicated a task it cannot be hoped that all errors will have been avoided; corrections and additions will be welcomed. The order is chronological as far as possible, except that works of the same type are grouped together. The catalogue has been revised and the works renumbered in this edition to conform to other catalogues. No arrangements of Liszt's works are mentioned except those made by the composer himself. The titles are given in their original languages except where it would be pedantic to insist on this.

The three principal private collections of Liszt MSS are those of Busoni, now in the Prussian State Library, Berlin, of the late August Gollerich at Linz and of the late Marchese Silvio della Valle di Casanova at Pallanza Lago Maggiore. The Busoni collection also contains numerous first editions.

The following abbreviations are used:

Aut.	= Liszt's autograph manuscript.	G.R.	= Gottschalg's 'Repertorium für Orgel, Harmonium oder Pedalfußel'.
MS	= manuscript copy in another hand.	H.	= Catalogue of the former Heyer Museum at Cologne, ed. Georg Kinsky.
Copy	= printed copy.	H.N.M.	= Hungarian National Museum, Budapest.
A.M.Z.	= 'Allgemeine Musik-Zeitung.'	L. d'A. Corr.	= 'Correspondance de Liszt et de la Comtesse d'Agoult', Paris, 1933.
B. & H.	= Breitkopf & Hartel.	L.M.	= Liszt Museum, Weimar.
B.d.L.	= 'Buch der Lieder.'	M.A.	= Franz Liszt Music Academy, Budapest.
Br.	= 'Franz Liszt's Briefe', ed. La Mara.	N.Z.f.M.	= 'Neue Zeitung für Musik.'
Br. L.-B.	= 'Letters of Liszt and Hans von Bulow', ed. La Mara.	P.C.	= Paris Conservatoire.
Br. L.-R.	= 'Letters of Liszt and Raff' ('Die Musik', Vol. 1).	P.S.L.	= Prussian State Library, Berlin.
B.M.	= British Museum.	R.	= Raabe, 'Franz Liszt'.
Ges.d.M.f.	= Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, Vienna.	R. & G.	= 'Revue et Gazette Musicale', Paris.
G.L.	= Franz Liszt's 'Gesammelte Lieder'.

An asterisk against the number of a work implies that a thematic quotation from that work is given at the end of the catalogue.

Liszt also took part, together with Marschner, Reissiger and Spohr, in Eduard Bernsdorf's 'Neues Universal-Lexicon der Tonkunst' (Dresden and Offenbach, 1856-65). Much of the literature published under his name during the Paris and Weimar periods is really the work of Mme d'Agout and Princess Sayn-Wittgenstein respectively. A manual of pf. technique, written for the Geneva Conservatoire, is apparently lost.

LISZT SOCIETY. An association formed in London in 1950, with Professor Edward J. Dent as President and Humphrey Searle as Hon. Secretary. Among its founder members were Ralph Hill and Constant Lambert. Its object is to promote the republication, recording and performance of works by Liszt, particularly those which are, in the Society's view, undeservedly neglected, and those which are for some reason or other difficult to obtain. An annual subscription of 5s. entitles members to the purchase of the Society's publications at a reduced rate. The first volume of printed music, issued by Messrs. Schott & Co., is a collection of pianoforte pieces of Liszt's final period, including the first complete publication of the 'Csárdás macabre' and both versions of 'La lugubre gondola'. The second volume, also of pianoforte music, includes some of the early romantic pieces and also first publications of 'Am Grabe Richard Wagners' and 'Mephisto Waltz No. 4'. The third contains pianoforte music in the Hungarian style, some previously unpublished. The address of the Society is 44a Ordinance Hill, London, N.W.8.

LITANIAE LAURETANAE (Litany of Loreto). A solemn litany, sung in the Roman Catholic Church in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary. It is no longer possible to ascertain when, where or by whom this litany was originally written; but, if we may trust the very generally received tradition that it was first chanted at Loreto, and carried thence by pilgrims to all parts of the world, it cannot be of earlier date than the closing years of the 13th century. In other places than Loreto (where it is sung every evening) it is most frequently sung either in solemn processions or during the exposition of the Blessed Sacrament at Benediction; but its use — especially on the Continent — is by no means restricted to those particular occasions. In Rome, for instance, it is constantly sung, at almost every popular service, to a simple plain-song melody familiar to all Italians and printed in the Ratisbon edition of the 'Directorium Chori'. This is probably the oldest music to which the words were ever adapted. Its date, like theirs, is uncertain; but it is at least old enough to have attracted the attention of the great polyphonic composers of the 16th century, some of whom have treated it in their best and most devout style. The most ancient printed copy is that of Dillingen (1558). Costanzo Porta set it 1575. The Litany of Loreto was officially approved by Pope Sixtus V (1587).

Palestrina was especially devoted to the litany; in 1593 he published a volume containing, in two books, ten different settings of exquisite beauty, composed for the use of the Confraternity of the Holy Rosary. One of the most beautiful divisions of the work is reprinted in the fourth volume of Proske's 'Musica divina', and all are published in the complete edition of Palestrina's works.

Another volume of litanies, by various authors, was published at Munich in 1596 by Georgius Victorinus, under the title of 'The-saurus litaniarum'. We here find among other interesting works a charming litany, by Lassus, founded entirely upon the plainsong canto fermo and so simple in construction that the most modest choir need feel no hesitation in attempting it. This litany is also reprinted entire in the fourth volume of 'Musica divina', together with some others from the same rare work, which fortunately is not the only collection that has been preserved from the 16th century. Under the title of 'Litaniae Catholicae ad Christum, Beatam Virginem, et Sanctos' a highly interesting work was printed by Wolfgang Eder at Ingolstadt in 1539. Another, called 'Sacrae Litaniae variae', was published at Antwerp in 1595. A precious volume, believed to be unique, wanting the title and first nine pages — and therefore without date — is preserved in the library bequeathed by Proske to the Cathedral of Ratisbon. Many other printed collections are still extant, containing quite a little treasury of art.

At Notre-Dame in Paris the litany is annually sung, in grand procession, on the afternoon of the Feast of the Assumption, to a form of the first mode, which, set with the melody in the tenor, produces an indescribably solemn effect. Settings by later composers of any eminence are rare, but there are two by Mozart (K. 109 and 195).

LITERES, Antonio (b. nr. Madrid, c. 1670; d. Madrid, 18 Jan. 1747).

Spanish organist and composer. The earliest dated work in the National Library, Madrid, is 'Jupiter y Danae' (1700), a piece in three acts and ballet, scored for violins and bass. 'Accis y Galatea' is dated 1709, while the libretto of a lost oratorio, 'S. Vicente', belongs to 1720. In a collection of 'Psalmos de vespæe . . .', printed at Madrid in 1731 (Bibl. Provincial, Toledo), Literes is described as músico violón (musician, bass viol) in the royal chapel. After the disastrous fire at the royal palace in Madrid (1734), in which most of the music was lost, Literes and Nebra were ordered to arrange the manuscripts which had survived and write what music was necessary for services in the chapel.

Literes was possibly second organist at the time, and he certainly held that appointment up to his death. He was praised by the moralist Padre Feijoo for the loftiness and sweetness of his style: an example of his music is given by Mitjana.¹ Besides the opera mentioned above, the National Library in Madrid possesses manuscript scores of 'Los elementos' and 'Dido y Eneas', both described as ópera armónica al estilo Italiano, and 'Coronis', a zarzuela in 2 acts (the last two unsigned). There exists a quantity of church music by him. Two hymns were printed by Eslava.

LITINSKY, Heinrich (b. Lipovets, Ukraine, 17 Mar. 1901).

Russian composer. He studied composition under Glière at the Moscow Conservatory. He is a fine technician, classically inclined and greatly interested in problems of form, structure and working-out. His output includes five string quartets (the fifth, entitled 'Turkmeniana', based on native Turcoman tunes), sonatas for violin solo, viola solo and cello solo, two symphonies and a violin Concerto.

LITOLFF, Henry (Charles) (b. London, 6 Feb. 1818; d. Bois-le-Combes nr. Paris, 6 Aug. 1891).

French pianist and composer. His father was an Alsatian soldier taken prisoner by the English in the Peninsular War, who had settled in London as a violinist after the declaration of peace and married an Englishwoman. In the beginning of the year 1831 Henry Litolff was brought by his father to Moscheles who, on hearing the boy play the pianoforte, was so much struck by his unusual talent that he offered to take him gratis as a pupil; and under his generous care Litolff studied for several years. He made his first appearance (or one of his first) at Covent Garden Theatre on 24 July 1832, as "a pupil of Moscheles, 12 years of age". In his seventeenth year a marriage of which the parents disapproved obliged him to leave England and settle for a time in France. For several years after this event Litolff led a wandering life and visited Paris, Brussels, Leipzig, Prague, Dresden, Berlin and Amsterdam, giving in these towns a series of very successful concerts. In 1851 he went to Brunswick and took over the business of the music publisher Meyer, marrying, as his second wife, the former owner's widow. In 1860 he transferred this business to his adopted son Theodor Litolff, and he, in 1861, started the well-known 'Collection Litolff' as a cheap and accurate edition of classical music, which was among the earliest of the many series of similar size and aim now existing. It opened with the sonatas of Beethoven, Mozart and Haydn (Vols. I-IV). Henry Litolff himself went to Paris. His third wife was a Comtesse de Laroche-foucauld. His opera 'Die Braut von Kynast' was produced at Brunswick in 1847, another, 'Rodrigue de Tolède', was not performed, and a third, 'Les Templiers', was produced at Brussels on 25 Jan. 1886.

About 115 of his works, including a violin Concerto, a short oratorio 'Ruth et Boaz' (1869) and much chamber music have been published. Among the best of them may be reckoned some of his pianoforte pieces, such as the well-known 'Spinnlé', a few of his overtures (including 'Robespierre', which quotes the 'Marseillaise' and contains a realistic description of an execution) and his symphony-concertos, especially Nos. 3, 4 and 5; the latter are remarkable for their wealth of original ideas in harmony, melody and rhythm, and for their beautiful instrumentation (see Berlioz's 'Les Musiciens', p. 303).

LITURGICAL MUSIC-DRAMA. In the period between the beginning of the 10th century and the end of the 13th there was achieved in the Church of western Europe a remarkable literary and musical development. This, the liturgical music-drama, represents a spontaneous growth within the confines of Christian worship and seems to owe little or nothing to outside influence. The vernacular drama, which grew from it and emerged from the Church during the later middle ages, came under various secular influences, ancient and contemporary, and continued in evolutionary progress towards modern drama. But the works here referred to, written in Latin and primarily religious in their outlook and purpose, were strangely spontaneous in their origin and development. They continued in independence until their gradual disappearance from the service-books during the generations following the Reformation.

The original texts can still be studied in surviving manuscripts of various types of medieval service-book. Their occurrence or otherwise seems rather fortuitous. When they are included they are usually, but not always, found in their relative seasonal positions. There are a few manuscript volumes that seem deliberately to have "collected" examples of them, such as the 13th-century 'Fleury Play-Book'. Some versions survived to the early printed service-books.

Their value in the history of drama has long been recognized. Authoritative and monumental works such as Karl Young's 'The Drama of the Medieval Church' and Sir E. K. Chambers's 'The Medieval Stage' have dealt fully and faithfully with their literary aspects. What has been insufficiently realized is their contribution to the history of music. They are something more than drama, for every text must be thought of as a libretto for music. From the earliest stages these works were sung, to music that was sometimes adapted, but usually specially composed, by anonymous creators. There are many examples where the curve and character of the melody emphasize the meaning of the words. They were presented by clerical singers who were definitely impersonating certain characters, who were directed by the texts to make appropriate movements and dramatic gestures, who were dressed in suitable costumes and who were aided by primitive "properties", and at times stage-machinery. They were listened to by appreciative audiences, who saw and heard a well-known and well-loved sacred story unfolding before them as in reality.

These dramatic works, therefore, must be thought of as being not essentially different from operas.

ORIGINS.—The movement developed, it would seem, from the most elementary of beginnings, a very simple example of that primitive urge — felt by all humanity, ancient or modern, pagan or Christian — the desire to "act a part". In this particular case the spontaneity of the emotion can be all the more clearly appreciated when it is realized how sternly the early Christian Church had fought against the contamination, as she felt it to be, of classical drama. Early popes and bishops had seen and loathed the degradation of the decadent Roman stage, and when Christianity gained the necessary power they had accomplished its destruction — with the unwitting assistance of a strange ally, the barbarian invader, who in sacking imperial cities had destroyed also the great theatres. But when the time came for the rebirth of drama it was found to have occurred, by a supreme irony, within the fortress of its former bitterest enemy.

This artistic event occurred at the time when, after the dark ages, some of the graces of life were attempting once more to assert themselves. One of the results of the revival of learning inaugurated by Charlemagne was a greatly increased splendour in every aspect of the service of religion: finer buildings, more gorgeous vestments, highly trained choirs, more elaborate ceremonial, more pageantry. The liturgy itself did not escape "improvement". At many points it received additions and interpolations which served to explain or comment upon the official text.¹ Many of these "tropes", as they were called, were in a form that suggested a dialogue between definite characters, especially those which attached themselves to the Introit of the Mass. Some of them seem to hover very closely on the brink of becoming dramatic, but with one exception we have no evidence that among these early exchanges there was any development towards actual impersonation, the test of true drama.

This exception is of the utmost importance. In it we have the seed from which, in western Europe, drama and music-drama were reborn. (Lest we should cavil at the suggestion that "music-drama" had an earlier existence, let us recall that the mighty works of Aeschylus, Sophocles and Euripides, long forgotten in the early middle ages, certainly came under that category, being produced with the best musical resources that the age could provide.) The trope in question was an Easter one, preceding the Introit of the Mass and suggesting a picture — the Angels at the empty Tomb on Easter morning, interrogating the Marys, receiving their reply and dismissing them with an assurance of the Resurrection — the Resurrection being the subject of the Introit. The simplest version of this trope, of which there are scores of surviving variants, is contained in a manuscript belonging to the monastic library of St. Gall² and dating from the middle of the 10th century. It consists of three brief sections of dialogue and is given below together with its music (the latter transcribed from the original unheighted St. Gall neums to modern plainsong notation by the present writer):

² St. Gall, Stiftsbibl. MS 484, p. 111.

INT(errogatio)

Quem que - ri - tis in se-pul-cho (o) Chri-sti-co-le?
(Whom seek ye at the sepulchre, o followers of Christ?)

R(esponsio)

Jhesum na-za-re-num cru-ci-fi-xum, o cae-li-co-lae.
(Jesus of Nazareth who was crucified, o heavenly ones.)

Non est hic, sur-re-xit si-cut pre-di-xe-rat; i-te,
(He is not here, he is risen as he foretold; go, annun-ti-a-te qui-a sur-re-xit de se-pul-cho.

(announce that he is risen from the sepulchre.)

Resurrexi.¹

The question of the original home of the trope is complicated by the fact that another version of the same dialogue, but further "troped" by the addition of a few lines, is found in the equally ancient ecclesiastical centre of Limoges, dating perhaps some thirty years earlier, the music written in characteristic Limoges (Aquitaine) style. It would appear, then, that the trope arose not far from the beginning of the 10th century, but that its home must remain uncertain. What slender evidence there is, in the present writer's opinion, favours Limoges.

This Easter trope, which from its two opening words is usually termed the "Quem quaeritis" trope, was destined for greater development, but nevertheless won wide popularity in the service-books of the 10th, 11th and even 12th centuries, throughout western Europe merely as a trope of the Introit. The various versions are distinguished from each other in various ways, mainly by the different sentences, usually expressive of choral rejoicing and chosen according to regional preferences, which were added before and after the core of the dialogue. But the original dialogue interchange, apart from minor variations, remains substantially the same, whether belonging to Spain, France, Italy or elsewhere. A remarkable fact is that the musical setting of the dialogue is also recognizably constant, but shows characteristic regional variations. The additional sentences, the "tropes of the trope", are in the main original creations, not borrowings from the liturgy — the work of local "makers". It must be emphasized that the "Quem quaeritis" trope itself, words and music, is an original composition. Suggestions for the words of the dialogue there certainly are both in the Gospels and the Easter liturgy, but the sentences represent an independent shaping. The only parallel that the present writer can discover between the setting and any liturgical music may be found by comparing the melody of the first two words with the start of the Alleluia of the succeeding Introit:

Al-le-lu-ia.

This would be quite in accordance with the practice of the anonymous composers of the sequelae melodies expanded from the Alleluias of various masses, who started with such a melodic germ taken from the Gregorian music and then launched forth independently.

Such, then, was the nature of the expanded "Quem quaeritis" trope. From what can be gathered from the ancient service-books, its performance took place at the altar, sometimes across it, the altar taking on the symbolism of the Sepulchre. The participants were clergy in normal vestments. Only occasionally do we find any exact number of participants detailed — one, or two, for the angelic question; two, or three, for the Marys' reply. Even then we have no evidence that there was any purpose of impersonation behind this.

THE EASTER DRAMAS.—Although examples are met of the performance of the trope during elaborate Easter processions, the fact is that while it remained in the overwhelming proximity of the central rite of the Mass all actions remained symbolic; no movement towards dramatization seems to have been attempted. But some time during the second half of the 10th century a fructifying change occurred. Suddenly the dialogue appears at the end of Easter Matins, between the last responsory and the concluding Te Deum. Liturgically and practically no more appropriate place could be found. Tradition, dating from Carolingian times, regarded the Te Deum as marking the transition between night and day; the events suggested by the dialogue, according to the Gospel accounts, took place at dawn on Easter morning; the third and last responsory of Easter Matins itself related the journey of the Marys to the Tomb. Finally, in such a position the dialogue was free to expand into dramatic form while causing the minimum of disturbance to liturgical ceremony. The result was the emergence of real if simple drama. Scores of surviving examples of the "Visitatio Sepulchri" (this title is commonly found in the manuscripts) consist merely of the original dialogue with the addition of some well-established antiphon, e.g. "Surrexit Dominus de sepulchro . . .", which made a simple but appropriately exultant conclusion. The important factor is that rubrics from various manuscripts show that those approaching the Sepulchre are hooded to represent women, that the angel or angels are dressed in white and are sometimes even winged, and in general all concerned act a part. The progress of the Visitatio Sepulchri, the Easter Sepulchre music-drama, is now the addition of further dramatic details, accompanied by new compositions or the adaptation of appropriate antiphons or other liturgical pieces. The little music-drama is fairly launched on its career. This simple type seems always to have been popular. Many of the several hundred surviving examples of the Visitatio Sepulchri did not pass beyond this stage — the essential dialogue, with brief additions which introduced and rounded it off. As their limited scope made them easy to perform, they were put to practical use throughout the history of the liturgical drama. Nevertheless, more ambitious forms were devised and staged. Expansion was contrived in various ways: by elaborating the approach of the three Marys to the tomb, by the introduction of Peter and John, who race to the tomb and recover the grave-cloths, and by the introduction of the scene of the encounter of Mary Magdalen with the risen Christ. Some few longer Sepulchre dramas not only expanded these incidents considerably but introduced other dramatic scenes, which included a merchant to sell ointment to the Marys, Pilate, the Roman guard on the tomb, the angel of the flaming sword, and "doubting Thomas" desiring material proof of the Resurrection.

Another incident of the Easter season developed as a separate drama, the "Peregrinus" — telling of the meeting of the risen Christ with the two disciples on the road to Emmaus. There were some few efforts to establish a comprehensive drama which should tell the whole Easter-season story, with the Crucifixion as its central point, but these must have proved too unwieldy for frequent performance; for it must be emphasized that all these works were performed within church walls, closely connected with the services.

CHRISTMAS.—Only a little later, it would seem, Christmas dramas developed in imitation of those of Easter. The dramatic starting-point was the arrival of the shepherds at the manger, found in the first instance as a trope of the Introit of one of the Christmas masses. Again, further Gospel events were used for the dramatic developments. More important than the "shepherd" motif was the expansion of the journey of the Magi, which introduced that favourite figure of medieval drama, the "raging" Herod. Again we find attempts to create a single comprehensive drama which should include all the relevant Christmas events.

OTHER DRAMAS.—While both the Christmas and Easter themes were developing, clerical playwrights were seeking other subjects in both New and Old Testaments, from such promising themes as the raising of Lazarus, the conversion of St. Paul, Isaac and Jacob, and Daniel. Stories of the saints playing such a large part in the life of the medieval community, there were dramatizations of the miracles of the very popular St. Nicholas. The subject of the Last Judgment, which claimed so much of medieval thought, produced at least two striking works.

No doubt the longer dramas — of various types — were performed but rarely, since they must have needed large spaces, a considerable number of participants and long preparation. They must have presented, at their best, brilliant spectacles of pageantry, calling for great technical resource.

THE MUSIC.—Some generalizations can be made before the music is considered in relation to the individual texts. In the manuscripts the settings are written above the words, sometimes as neums, sometimes as definitely "heighted" notation with anything from one to four lines, which permits exact pitch to be realized. A considerable majority of the earlier manuscripts, and many of the later German ones, present the problem of the unheighted neum, a good "reminder" for the trained singer of the period, but a difficult task for the modern investigator. Though fortunate in possessing photographs of almost all surviving examples of the liturgical music-drama, the writer was able to interpret many of the neum melodies only after much comparison with later manuscripts and the construction of a large number of comparative charts. In the absence of a satisfactory exact notation, musicians in early medieval times were obliged to rely on their memories — the trained choir-singer, for example, had to know by heart his music for the whole liturgical year. But so developed was this faculty that liturgical melodies of late medieval times can be traced back through the centuries to their neum forms with surprisingly little variation. The notations given represent a single vocal line, even in the long and elaborate later dramas. This seems to point to a performance consisting only of unaccompanied monody. This may well have been the case in the earlier stages, but it is difficult to imagine that liturgical drama escaped the influence of the fast-developing medieval harmony.

There are mentions in some texts of the use of the organ, and in at least two of the longer works, of solo instruments (harps, drums and the like). Notational evidence is lacking, but there seems to be little doubt that "accompaniment" was achieved, how frequently we cannot say.

To understand and appreciate the music of these dramas, especially the earlier ones, we need ears attuned to the tonalities and subtle prose-rhythms of the Gregorian chant. But the influence of secular melody will also be found. The Ionian mode — major scale, as we term it — occurs quite frequently.

The setting of the fruitful "Quem quaeritis" dialogue was, as we have seen, an original one, but it would seem to a listener acquainted with the chant to be a normal sort of "second-mode" melody. The shorter versions of the Easter Sepulchre drama, when adding other sentences, added music of the same type, even when it was specially composed and not a borrowed antiphon. Hymns, "proses" and sequences — already part of the liturgy — were added unchanged or adapted in various ways, still preserving the Gregorian atmosphere. This atmosphere, one of style and tonality, is found in the specially composed settings of the prose dialogue of dramas other than the Easter Sepulchre ones, which at their best took the form of quick-moving, melodious and dramatic recitative, especially well used in some of the Magi dramas.

However, the growing taste for Latin versification, effectively spread by the "goliards" or wandering scholars, influenced the dramas in their later developments. In them ideas which had once been expressed in prose were reshaped in verse form, with new settings; whole scenes were constructed in regular stanzas, set strophically to a single melody for a number of repetitions — sometimes a greater number than modern taste would approve. The melodies themselves, influenced by the stanza form, took on a greater shapeliness and balance. They showed secular influence, some of the charming tunes in the longer dramas being hard to distinguish from those of the trouvères. But formality had its disadvantages. Some few dramas were constructed of stanzas of the same pattern throughout, and a musical setting which repeated with each stanza. All things considered, the practice of versification led to a certain loss in dramatic and musical values.

One last generalization with regard to the music. There is no doubt that up to the present the music of these dramas has not been given sufficient comprehensive study. The obstacles have been mainly paleographical. Certain individual manuscripts, certain groups, have received attention from time to time¹, but these in the main have proved to be versions with heightened notation which could be read with comparative ease. But very many of the versions, of all types, were written with neum settings which, generally speaking, could be interpreted only by a long process of collation and comparison. The technique of this Gregorian paleography is a comparatively modern development, the credit for which goes in the main to the Benedictines of Solesmes, to whose labours the Roman Catholic church owes the recovery of the true Gregorian music of the liturgy. The writer returned to the original manuscripts for his own transcriptions, which comprise, he believes, almost every surviving example of liturgical drama. This study is based on the large amount of data thus made available. A consideration of the more important music-dramas can now be undertaken.

THE EASTER MUSIC-DRAMAS.—Probably the earliest surviving example of true drama (located at the end of Matins) belongs to England. It is found in the venerable Winchester Troper and dates from c. 980.² There is a minimum of rubrics, and the music is in (only approximately heightened) Anglo-Saxon neums. However, the 'Regularis Concordia', an official ecclesiastical document drawn up at Winchester at about the same date, gives a version, without music, of what was undoubtedly the same drama, adding lavish directions for performance. There is an "angel" seated at the "place of the sepulchre"; three other brethren, hooded figures, assume the parts of "the women coming with spices to anoint the body of Jesus", carrying censers to represent ointment boxes. They come "slowly, as in the manner of seeking something", "straying about" until checked by the angel's question. The usual dialogue, to the usual music, takes place with some additions. Finally, after the three have announced the news of the Resurrection to the choir, they are recalled by the angel and shown the empty tomb "bare of the cross³, but only the cloths laid there". They then enter the Sepulchre (this seems to imply an artificial structure of some size), recover the grave-cloths and display them "before the eyes of the clergy" as they sing "Surrexit Dominus . . ." The whole body then sing 'Te Deum' to the chiming of bells.

Here, then, at this early date is a satisfactory

² Oxford, Bibl. Bodl. MS 775, fol. 17 r-17 v. See the writer's article 'The Easter Sepulchre Music-Drama' in M. & L., Jan. 1946, where a full transcription of the Winchester Troper version is given.

little music-drama, sung throughout, with full directions as to costume, properties and action. In continental examples minor expansions are soon found. The Marys no longer approach silently; a property, the entrance stone of the tomb, suggested the use of the question "Who will roll away the stone for us . . . ?" modified from an antiphon and fitted to new music. This in turn, in a 12th-century version from Madrid¹, called forth a dramatic cry from one of the Marys: "Behold the stone rolled away, and a young man clothed in a white robe!"

The most successful way of bringing on the principle of one syllable to one note. Early writings on the liturgical drama gave it a greater share of importance in the development of the Easter drama than it really deserved, probably owing to the fact that until comparatively recently not many Easter texts were well known, and among those extant "Victimae Paschali" was very prominent. All the same, it made a very successful rounding-off to the drama. The first three divisions of the composition are merely lyrical, a call for praise of the Paschal Victim. But the next two are in dialogue form:

1. Dic nobis, Ma - ri - a, quid vi - di - sti in vi - a? Sepulchrum Christi viventis, et glo - ri - am vi - di re - sur - gen - tis.
2. An - gel - i - cos tes - tes, su - da - ri - um et vestes. Surrexit Christus, spes mea, praecedet su - os in Ga - li - lae - a.²

Marys was the "planctus" or lament, a stanza usually being given to each, with at times a concerted conclusion. A number of such compositions are found, mostly in the longer versions, but the single-scene Norman-Sicilian drama mentioned above shows the earliest example of this dramatically satisfactory device, very tunefully managed. This little work is altogether a distinctive composition, which has passed the test of modern performance. It is probably the best of the scores of single-scene "Visitatio" which have survived.

Various other methods of introduction, too numerous for discussion here, are found in these many versions, e.g. the sentence "Ubi est Christus . . . ?" After the dialogue the Marys, in a large number of examples, sing a composition beginning "Ad monumentum venimus gementes . . .", which had an interesting development. The incident of the display of the grave-cloths — widely adopted — called forth a special composition "Cernitis, O socii . . .", but all these must escape special notice.

The rounding-off of these shorter dramas displays less originality, probably because there were to hand in the liturgy itself a number of Easter antiphons, e.g. "Surrexit Dominus . . .", "Christus resurgens . . .", which expressed appropriately the mood of rejoicing at the news of the Resurrection.

These are all overshadowed by one adaptation which was most valuable dramatically. This is the use of the famous 11th-century sequence "Victimae Paschali", which, slightly modified, still remains in the modern Roman liturgy. The melody is a fine, broad tune, arranged almost throughout on the

One of the Marys is being addressed ("Tell us, Mary, what thou sawest on the way!"). Her reply makes it clear that she is returning from the tomb with the assurance of the angels and the evidence of the grave-cloths. It would have been difficult to invent a better continuance of the action after the Marys leave the Sepulchre. Again, the two final sentences ("We know that Christ has indeed risen from the grave" and "Thou King of Victory, have mercy upon us") may be attributed to a chorus of disciples, and make a sonorous and impressive conclusion, especially, one may imagine, in certain versions where the organ is called on to bear a part. We find "Victimae Paschali" used in Easter dramas at least as early as the 12th century. Although there are examples where the whole sequence is sung straight through, many versions, with sound dramatic instinct, omitted the opening reflective sentences and concentrated on the dialogued part, the choir questioning and the Marys replying, with a chorus of disciples to conclude — an early example of a choral "grand finale".

Some few single-scene "Visitatio" present us with a novelty, a revised version of the "Quem quaeritis" dialogue, dating probably from the early 12th century. After this time German and German-influenced versions used it in preference to the old one, upon which, however, it had plainly been modelled. In the thirty or more versions containing it very little textual or musical variation from the example given on p. 323 is found. This is from a 14th-century Klosterneuburg manuscript.

A few further matters concerning the mise en scène should be mentioned. The history of the "sepulchre" is a full and complicated one that can only be glanced at. In the Easter drama the altar served this purpose at first, or curtained-off areas around it. But quite frequently it is apparent that improvised structures were being used. Later permanent "Easter sepulchres" of wood or stone were built, some of which still survive. Under Crusader influence imitations of the "Holy Sepulchre" at Jerusalem were attempted. The representation of the three as women seems in most cases to have been accomplished by the wearing of garments such as copes, that allowed for the hooding of the head. In rare instances — the "nunnery" versions — the Marys actually were women. On a few occasions rubrics are found specifically mentioning the handing of vessels to the Marys in preparation for the "Visitatio". This may seem of small importance but, probably, from this simple incident grew up the "merchant scene". The "unguentarius" in more ambitious versions of the drama, acquired a speaking-part and, especially after the introduction of a second merchant, there are hints that the scene is turning towards comedy, as was afterwards the case in the medieval miracle play. The costume of the angel was usually white, an alb or dalmatic, but more vivid colouring is sometimes detailed. Some rubrics mention wings. Occasionally (on the authority of St. Luke and St. John) two angels are found. There is sometimes mention of the congregation, the "populus", as taking part in the choral conclusion. One German version gives the composition sung as being "Christ ist erstanden", the famous vernacular hymn, strangely like "Victimae Paschali" in its opening.

The incidents related in the first few verses of St. John xx served to suggest what may be considered as a new scene. Most to the point was the 4th verse: "So they ran both together: and the other disciple did outrun Peter, and came first to the sepulchre". What apparently happened was that two clerical actors carried out the action in dumb-show, racing the length of the building to the "sepulchre", from which one of them retrieved the grave-cloths. Something over a score of extant dramas have this incident, forming a second stage of development. With one exception all come from German or

German-influenced sources. The race concluded, some versions finish the drama by allowing the apostles (contrary to the Gospel accounts) to display the cloths to the "disciples", the choir replying with a concluding antiphon. Others extend the action by tacking on the "Victimae Paschali" in whole or part, a rather inept procedure, since the request to Mary and her news could be used much better as a reason for the race. Only a few second-stage versions perceive this, and give the V.P. dialogue first. It is also unfortunate for dramatic realism that the relevant verse from St. John was already a liturgical antiphon ("Currebant duo simul . . ."). As a result, in many of the versions the choir sing this as a sort of descriptive commentary, while the actual incident is being represented.

The one second-stage drama which is not German is altogether superior to its companions. It shows original thought and good workmanship, and, whatever outside influences there are, seem to be French. This is the so-called "Dublin Play", a 14th-century version existing in two manuscripts, one in Dublin, the other in the Bodleian Library.¹ Here is a little work that would be well worth a modern revival. The borrowings, which include a planctus, are well assimilated, and the blending of the race with the V.P. material is neatly accomplished, leading to a very satisfactory choral conclusion. "Currebant duo simul . . ." is conspicuous by its absence. From the rubrics we learn that the apostles are bare-footed; Peter in red, holding symbolic keys, John white-robed, carrying a palm.

With the addition of a further scene the "Visitatio Sepulchri" reaches its third stage. This addition, the appearance of the risen Christ to Mary Magdalen, or all three Marys, is related by SS. Matthew, Mark and John, each in his own way. The differing details account in part for the variety of treatment which the episode receives in the couple of dozen or so third-stage examples which survive. Both Matthew and John give spoken words, which we frequently find transferred, unchanged, to the dramas and set to music.

This expansion seems to have taken place early in the second half of the 12th century.

The earliest version yet discovered comes from Ripoll in Spain¹, a confused and badly written text of no acting-value, but important inasmuch as it shows the encounter (related by St. John) of Mary Magdalen with the supposed gardener and her recognition of him with the joyful cry of "Rabboni!". There is another important "first appearance": the Marys exchange rhymed stanzas with the "mercator", bargaining for ointment—the earliest known version of the "merchant scene", set to a fine "major" melody, given below:

Various centres develop the "risen Christ" scene, as well as the whole drama, in various ways. Rouen has several almost identical versions, which omit the race and the V.P. finish, carrying through the drama in straightforward and plain fashion, but with a good deal of individual music. A 14th-century group from Prague is similarly independent and direct, and has a rudimentary "merchant scene". We have also the rare advent of a surviving English version, a 14th-century manuscript from Barking, Essex.² Unfortunately it is an "ordinarium"—the music omitted and only "incipits" for most of the sents original composition, both words and music, the latter always being melodically interesting, often with a secular—certainly non-Gregorian—atmosphere. A good example of this may be seen in the opening laments. Stanzas of the first and third Marys are quoted:

Certainly the flourish in regular descending thirds on the word "plebs" is unlike any Gregorian melisma.

A good example of originality is seen in the episode of the race, where, having recovered the grave-cloths, Peter and John debate the matter in newly invented rhyming lines. Even when using borrowed material the dramatist gives it an individual twist. Several of the familiar themes used are versified, new music being supplied. One example is the couplet which replaces "Quis revolvat nobis lapidem . . .":

sung texts. This is a great loss, for, to judge by the incipits, a proportion of the material appears in no other version. Incidentally, the work came from the local nunnery and was performed wholly by women.

Probably the best of the group—well planned, individual and artistically attractive—is the example from the famous "Fleury" manuscript.³ The bulk of the drama repre-

There are careful directions as to gesture and movement, and some interesting details of costume. For example, the angel of the first scene is dressed in a gilded alb with a coif on his head; he holds a palm in his left hand and a candelabrum in his right. The actor representing Christ has the semblance of a gardener on his first appearance. But for his second entry he is clad in a white dalmatic with a white "infula", a phylactery of great price on his head, a cross in his right hand and in his left a cloth of gold.

We turn finally to a German group (ranging from the 12th century onwards) of a very different content, something over half a dozen manuscripts representing variations on one general plan. Much of the material has not been encountered before and consists of rhyming stanzas, mainly of the type with ten syllables to a line. A great deal of literary effort has been expended on the subject of the origin of the Zehnsilbenspiele — Easter dramas of this type — especially by German scholars, some of whom make what the writer feels to be extravagant claims for them and the Germanic origin of the Easter play in general.¹ Two things seem certain: the ten-syllable line first arose in France and was used there dramatically before it was cultivated in Germany; and the "merchant scene" stanzas with their original melody were created in France or Spain. The third-stage dramas under discussion contain groups of stanzas of the same type, of German origin, which deal with other situations — the lament of Mary Magdalen at the Sepulchre; Christ's parting words to Mary; Mary's announcement to the disciples and the other Marys; the opening lament of the three Marys (this last in fifteen-syllable lines). These groups of stanzas act as it were as a "pool" of material for the dramas in question (the most relevant are from Engelberg, Einsiedeln, Nuremberg, Zürich, Zwickau and Cividale respectively), each with individual omissions and variations of stanzas. To each group of stanzas is attached, generally speaking, one particular strophic melody. Again there are individual variations in the details of these melodies, but they remain recognizably constant throughout the group and in other, longer Easter dramas, where, with their stanzas, they will be found. In the writer's opinion too much attention has been paid in the past to the Zehnsilbenspiel type, as if it represented the acme, the only successful presentation of the "Visitatio Sepulchri". To some it may seem that the slow progress due to the long stretches of rhyming stanzas, frequently set to melismatic tunes, tends to blunt the dramatic action and that these dramas compare unfavourably in performance with the more direct versions having a greater proportion of quick-moving prose.

It is impossible here to give the progress of the dramas in detail. We may note that certain standard prose features remain — the "Quem quaeritis" revised dialogue (paraphrased in verse in the Einsiedeln version), and the "Maria" — "Rabboni" encounter. All the versions but one employ "Victimae Paschali", placing it after the appearance of Christ, not a happy position dramatically, as the "evidence of the grave-cloths" now matters very little.

The 14th-century version from Cividale differs from the rest in a number of ways and is probably the most interesting and adroit arrangement of the group, with a high proportion of original texts and settings.² There is a distinct melodic beauty in the music of the "Christ-Magdalen" encounter, peculiar to the version, which deserves notice. A portion is here given:

Jesus admirans respondit ei dicendo:

Maria respondit ei dicens:

Jesus dicit statim:

Maria currendo ad Jesum dicit:

Tunc Jesus dicit:

¹ See, for example, 'Die Weisen der lateinischen Osterspiele des 12. und 13. Jahrhunderts' by Walther Lipphardt (Cassel, 1948). In spite of the comprehensive title Dr. Lipphardt is mainly concerned with the Zehnsilbenspiel group. At the same time, when he does deal with the Easter drama in general he leaves very little credit to any other country but Germany in the matter of origins, textual or musical.

² Cividale, Museo Archeologico MS C.I., fol. 77 r-79 v.

This scene is certainly an attractive and dramatically successful piece of music-drama. Mary's action is as striking as her high-pitched, ringing cry. Nevertheless, did space permit, it would be interesting to reproduce here, for purposes of comparison, the corresponding moments from the "Fleury" or "Rouen" dramas, much more tersely set, to see which style is the more effective.

A 15th-century Osterspiel from Wolfenbüttel seems to represent the perfect Zehnsilbenspiel pattern, since it contains a full complement of the types of stanza mentioned above, including the two groups comprising the "merchant scene". It also contains much vernacular verse.

There are four other Easter Sepulchre dramas extant (two German, two French) which seem to demand special attention, since they are a great deal longer than anything we have met so far. Three of them contain new incidents; the other owes its length mainly to the additional stanzas in certain familiar scenes.

The two German examples, which are, in the main, workings of the same material, will be considered first. The longer of the two comes from Klosterneuburg.¹ It has been suggested by H. Pfeiffer that the drama was arranged by a monk of Klosterneuburg in 1204 to entertain Duke Leopold VI when he paid an Easter visit to the monastery in that year. While some of the material may be traced to what might be earlier sources, there is much that, as far as the writer is aware, appears for the first time. Most of the text, original or otherwise, is in verse, and most of the stanzas are of the "ten-syllable" type. But there is much disorder. Two scribes have been at work; there are repetitions, displacements and plain blunders. Over seventy lines represent a recopying of part of the text, in order to change the position of one of the sections. Part of the setting is missing, and the music given is in a difficult, unheightened neum notation. Altogether, the manuscript has no acting-value. This remark applies also to the other version, taken from the famous 'Carmina Burana',² which breaks off only half completed. Even so, it is apparent that much of the text and music has been borrowed from Klosterneuburg, but occasionally enlarged and certainly improved in the borrowing. There are also some unique passages. Regarding both the dramas it may be said that though the music is in neum form several of the melodies are recognizable as familiar, appearing in the Zehnsilbenspiel dramas already discussed. There is a great deal of other neum notation which cannot be interpreted, but probably represents original composition.

We must be content to note only the unusual features in the dramas. Both versions introduce Pilate and the chief priests in conclave, interchanging stanzas of the ten-syllable line type. Benedictbeuern includes Pilate's wife and a chorus of "assessores". A Roman guard, duly bribed, is sent to the Tomb. The soldiers (five of them) march round it, each singing a solo verse with a German refrain-chorus. This music seems unique. Then comes the Angel with the flaming sword and to the sound of thunder the soldiers are smitten to the ground. In the merchant scene Benedictbeuern introduces the merchant's wife. It is she who names the price — a talent of gold. The merchant then courteously directs the Marys on their road to the Sepulchre! A most unusual later feature in both texts is a brief dramatization of the Harrowing of Hell, Christ being represented as shattering the infernal gates and confounding Satan, acclaimed by the imprisoned souls of the just. The fragments of music here given are liturgical. One other novelty is the apostles' first reaction to Mary's news — a stanza declaring that she must be crazy!

The 14th-century French version from the nunnery of Origny-Sainte-Benoîte, near Saint-Quentin³, is a beautifully written manuscript with music on four lines. It keeps within the third-stage framework, but the merchant scene and the interchange between Mary Magdalen and the two angels are much more extensive than usual, and though cast in eight- and ten-syllable lines are wholly in French (as are the rubrics throughout). Some of the French stanzas are transliterations of the original Latin ones. Elsewhere are new Latin stanzas of unusually varied rhythms, and prose passages. As to the borrowings, the opening laments are taken, words and music, from the Zehnsilbenspiel. The merchant scene, sixteen stanzas all to the same melody, is founded on a similar passage from the "prototype" (Vich MS 111), including the melody. The dialogue between the Magdalen and the angels consists of eight rhyming stanzas, all set to a very similar tune with a similar secular ring. There is much invention in these two sets of stanzas. In the first the Marys, as a result of their words to the merchant, seem to have succeeded in making a convert of him! There are a number of other versifications and settings which seem to be original; for example, the "Quem quaeritis" dialogue is paraphrased in unique fashion. At other times there are echoes from earlier French sources, such as Rouen. The conclusion is a "Victimae Paschali" one, with the race to the Sepulchre, the whole managed with some individuality. A page appears to be missing, and the drama breaks off just as it promises a final "an-teuene". Apart from the possible monotony to modern ears of the two long, strophically set passages, the work would be quite "actable".

The last and longest of the "Visitatio Sepulchri" to be considered, found in a 13th-century manuscript from Tours¹, has a text which has been much edited. In spite of this, it deserves very little credit as a practical art-form. The manuscript seems to be a very careless copy of a work which in itself is largely a clumsy and unwieldy compilation. A number of passages, both words and music, are clearly lifted from older sources, for they can be paralleled in Vich MS 111, Madrid MS C. 132, the "Fleury" drama and others of earlier date than Tours. Blunders are continually apparent in the writing down of both words and music, and there are obvious misplacements. The music is on four lines. At least a page is missing from the start of the manuscript and two or more from the middle. The result is that we begin as Pilate is sending the soldiers to the Tomb, and have to guess that half-way through we lose the encounter between the risen Christ and the Magdalen, and the race to the Tomb. However, there is a great deal to approve in the opening Pilate scene, short, swift-moving lines set to a formless but tuneful recitative; an effective style not easily paralleled in other Easter dramas. The merchant scene has borrowed material from Vich 111, together with the tune already quoted. The older manuscript uses, somewhat ambiguously, the term "mercator juvenis". The Tours playwright seems to take the hint and creates "alius mercator", assisting in the sale of the spices to what seems new music. This is an early glimpse of the "apprentice" who in later medieval drama became a comic figure. Then comes a very muddled sepulchrum scene, a great deal of which duplicates that of Madrid MS C. 132. The soldiers now revive and return to Pilate. Once again we have an effective section in swift, apparently novel stanzas. Pilate this time acquires two definite tunes of his own, each twice used. Here is the first:

The long Magdalen planctus that follows is a remarkable one, found nowhere else, as far as the writer is aware. The musical form is unique, and is based on the circumstance that half-way through the section there occur two lines of an ancient and famous prose — "O quam magno dies ista celebrando gaudio . . ." set to its traditional music. The music of the lament long before and after them is sown with anticipations and echoes of the two melodic sentences, a striking musical device. After the lacuna, with its lost scenes, we find Peter questioning Mary. He is doing so, strangely enough, to the "O quam magno . . ." music. Later comes a scene usually reserved for the "Peregrinus" dramas, the incredulity of Thomas. No credit is due to the Tours writer except for knowing where to look for his material, in "Peregrinus" dramas from Beauvais, Madrid and Fleury. The "Victimae Paschali" dialogue is used to conclude this patch-work drama. In spite of doubts one may have, the presence of a final Te Deum shows that it was intended for Easter Matins.

The rubrics at least are very satisfactory. All through there are careful details as to the actors' equipment, movements, gestures and gradations of voice. For example, at the climax of her grief Mary Magdalen swoons and would fall but for the support of her companions. Whoever took her part had a formidable task, for there is stretch after stretch of elaborate music to be memorized.

It is clear that the Tours manuscript, the most extensive of its kind, has suffered at the hand of its scribe. Perhaps the original intentions were not quite as confused as the present text would lead us to believe.

Before leaving these Sepulchre dramas some reference must be made to the "Shrewsbury Fragments", an English manuscript of the early 15th century still preserved in the library of Shrewsbury School. It consists of a single actor's part, with its cues, for three plays — a "Visitatio", a "Peregrinus" and a "Pastores" (the Shepherds at the Manger). The actor was "third Mary", "third Shepherd" and Cleophas in the "Peregrinus". Most of the text consists of vernacular verse in northern English dialect. A few brief but familiar Latin passages remain. Those which have music show a "measured" notation, probably representing one part of settings that were sung in harmony. From the rubrics it would appear that the plays were performed in a church, but they seem to show a transitional stage between the Latin music-drama and the religious play under secular auspices. The music factor is fast fading.

PEREGRINUS.—The "Peregrinus" dramas, dealing with further incidents of the Easter season, seem to have been in existence by the 12th century. As far as can be judged there are only seven surviving examples complete with words and music, mainly French — three of the 12th century, two of the 13th and one of the 14th — and a not very satisfactory German version of the 13th century.¹ There are also incomplete texts, such as that from Ripoll², and the "single part" of the Shrewsbury fragments. There is also evidence of other texts through medieval mention of performances, e.g. at Lichfield, Lille and Padua.

The simpler of the "Peregrinus" versions concern themselves only with the "Emmaus" incidents — the meeting of Jesus with the two disciples, their speaking together, the meal, the breaking of bread and Jesus "vanishing from sight". Others add the appearance of Jesus to the disciples at Jerusalem and the incredulity of Thomas, either as separate scenes or combined into one. The drama seems to have been performed on Easter Monday evening, during the elaborate three-fold Vespers which were sung on that day in medieval times, with much processional movement round the building.

As compared with the "Visitatio Sepulchri", the playwright's approach to the drama was very different in the "Peregrinus" incidents, which were reported in the Gospels with a great deal of direct speech, St. Luke (xxiv. 13-40) dealing with the journey to Emmaus and Christ's appearance to the eleven at Jerusalem; St. John (xx. 24-29) with his encounter with Thomas. The Vulgate was thus ready at hand for dialogue purposes. But in the case of a great deal of the text this was not the direct source, for a large proportion of the relevant material was already to be found in the liturgy, set to music as antiphons of the Easter season. It was thus possible to construct a music-drama of sorts consisting of words and melodies drawn entirely from the "liber responsalis", and this forbidding feat was actually carried out by the arranger of the 13th-century German (Munich) example³ previously mentioned. The result, as may be expected, was a stilted and unsatisfactory composition.

No other versions were as rigid and unenterprising as this. Even if they all used "transferred" antiphons for some of the speeches and choral narratives, the shortest of them, the single-scene Saintes drama, still contains some original composition, both words and music; some sentences from the Vulgate with non-liturgical settings.

It must also be realized that the use of antiphons was not so undramatic as it may sound. Antiphon music, in contrast with that of other parts of the liturgy, is usually simple and direct, and, as employed in these dramas, quite successful as "recitative". Some passages from the *Saintes*⁴ drama mentioned above, which we shall now give, may show this. At the same time we will survey the whole of this single-scene drama, which contains basic material closely similar to that found in the others.

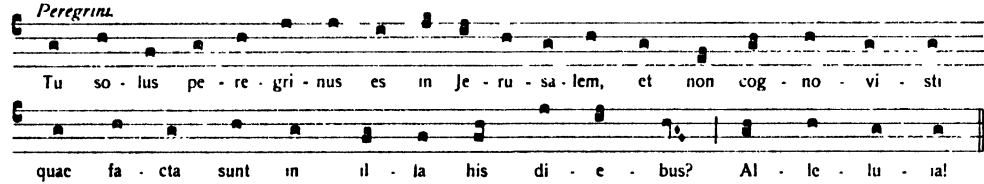

The first utterance of the two disciples, "To-day is the third day since these things were done", has apparently a setting peculiar to Saintes. Then comes the "antiphon" dialogue between the two and "Dominus". (The playwright supplies a couple of notes for the interrogatory "Que?" [sic].)

Meanwhile the action has brought the three near to some part of the building which represents Emmaus, "Dominus" pretending to continue his journey. Quantly enough, the choir in the meantime sings of these actions, an adaptation of St. Luke xxiv. 28 to a new setting. The disciples' invitation to the stranger to remain with them is partly an antiphon, partly new composition, words and music. They enter the inn, and a meal takes place in dumb-show, while once again the chorus describes the actions (v. 29 and 30). We then learn from a rubric that "their eyes were opened" (no doubt this was adequately acted) and that "Jesus vanished out of their sight". The disciples' comment, "Did not our hearts burn within us . . .", begins liturgically but soon becomes free composition.

The playwright now decides that he is going to have "unity of place" even to the extent of contradicting the Gospel account. Jesus reappears at the same spot instead of at Jerusalem, to reassure the two disciples. He uses verses 36 and 39 for this. Liturgical music existed for these words, but the setting here is original.

This review of the shortest of the group gives some idea of the general technique. In all the dramas there is some use of antiphon material, but the Munich version is an extreme case. Especially in the examples from Beauvais¹ and Fleury² there is a good proportion of originality, together with versification of prose texts, set to smooth melodies. Each of these dramas uses the incidents of Christ's meeting the assembly at Jerusalem and his encounter with doubting Thomas. The drama from Rouen³ is unique in using "Victimæ Paschali" as a conclusion, the disciples replacing Peter and John; not a happy device, since Mary's evidence is a decided anticlimax.

Most of the versions are well supplied with stage directions. From Fleury, for example, we learn that the two disciples and Thomas have cloak-like garments, hats and staves. At "Emmaus", seats and a table are provided, with an uncut loaf, three wafers and a cup of wine. Water is brought for the washing of hands. "Dominus" has three changes of costume carefully detailed, each appropriate to the occasion; and his feet and hands are marked with red. "Jerusalem", we note, is located in the choir.

ASCENSION AND PENTECOST.—This next great event of the Easter season might well have been expected to have inspired the liturgical playwright. But though symbolism in plenty can be found, only one example has survived of any attempt towards real drama, contained in a 14th-century "ordinarium" from Moosburg.⁴ Its climax is the drawing up through the roof of an image of Christ. Though the text is sung throughout, the music is wholly liturgical. Pentecost also developed a number of symbolic ceremonies but no true drama.

THE PASSION.—It is a strange fact that the Crucifixion itself was very infrequently treated by playwrights of the liturgical drama. Perhaps it may have been generally felt that no commemoration was needed other than the central rite of the Mass. However, attempts to construct Passion dramas did occur, though nothing has survived which is earlier than the 13th century.

One could imagine such a drama arising from the symbolical "depositio" or a number of other semi-dramatic ceremonies of Holy Week, yet it would seem that the real core of the Passion drama was the planctus, or lament, represented as being sung by one or another of the mourners at the Cross. The Visitatio Sepulchri has shown similar metrical laments which seem to have come into existence at the same period, during the 12th century. The favourite Passion planctus was a solo one, sung by the Virgin Mary at the foot of the Cross. Yet there were a number with two or more participants. If impersonation were introduced, these compositions would become true music-dramas, and this in some cases is what seems to have happened.

The most striking of the dramatic Passion planctus is found in a 14th-century processional from Cividale.⁵ There are five singing-parts: for the Virgin, the three other Marys and St. John. The composition is incomplete in the manuscript, but there remain 125 lines of verse together with the music, which is pleasantly melodious. The most striking feature is the wealth of stage directions. There are nearly eighty of them, written over the text and giving painstaking directions as to the movements and gestures of the actors.

But something more was needed than this to make a real Passion drama. There survive only two complete texts which have attempted to dramatize the events of which the Crucifixion is the climax, both found in the famous 13th-century 'Carmina Burana', that strange storehouse of goliardic verse, pious and otherwise. The first⁶, which is without music, tells the story from the Last Supper to the Burial in words drawn from the Vulgate and with a great deal of dumb-show. Since a rubric seems to indicate some link with the Visitatio Sepulchri of the same manuscript, we may assume that it was set to music in the same manner. It is altogether a crude effort.

The other⁷, much longer, is of such dimensions as to make its association with any service very improbable, but the liturgical choruses seem to indicate a clerical choir. The "station" technique is employed, fixed places representing such localities as the house of Simon, the Mount of Olives and the house of Pilate. The range of incidents includes the calling of Andrew and Peter, the worldly career and repentance of Mary Magdalen, the raising of Lazarus, the Betrayal, Trial and Crucifixion. The Vulgate is drawn upon for much of the dialogue, but the playwright invents a good deal of incident, supplying stanzas in the vernacular. Even the long Crucifixion planctus sung by the Virgin Mary and St. John has a German section. Mary Magdalen attracts a large amount of the invented material. The evil and good influences that sway her are represented by "Diabolus" and "Angelus"—an early appearance of those popular figures of medieval secular drama, the bad and good angels.

The musical notation is baffling, as it consists of unheighted neums for which the present writer has no clue. All that can be said is that when liturgical pieces are not involved the music seems to represent free composition not found elsewhere.

For completeness' sake there should be mentioned a 14th-century fragment from Sulmona, consisting of an actor's single part, wholly metrical, the "Fourth Soldier" of Pilate's guard, together with some of the soldiers' choruses. It was probably sung, though no music is given. The incidents dealt with are the Trial and Crucifixion, together with the soldiers' part in the Resurrection. The evidence points to a lost Easter drama of considerable dimensions.

THE SHEPHERDS AT THE MANGER.—As may be expected, the subject of the Nativity was the basis of another dramatic evolution. Its first stage was similar to that of the Visitatio Sepulchri or, to be more exact, was imitated from it. Once again the start was made from a trope of a Mass which suggested a dialogue; once again this became truly dramatic after being transferred to the end of Matins. Based on St. Luke's account of the Nativity (ii. 7-20), the trope, in translation, begins as follows:

"Whom seek ye at the Manger, O shepherds? Say!"
 "Christ the Saviour, the infant Lord wrapped in swaddling-clothes, according to the words of the Angel."
 "The little one is here with Mary his mother . . ."

continues by recalling the prophecy of Isaiah and ends on a note of rejoicing which leads to the Introit "Puer natus est nobis . . .".

Since there are no spoken words at the Manger in the Gospel account it had been necessary to invent a dialogue. Its similarity to the "Quem quaeritis" trope is apparent. Since investigation has proved the Easter trope to be the older of the two, the Christmas trope must be the debtor.

Again we have a single act of composition, for though it is found widely distributed in 11th-century troopers of France and Italy, the texts remain constant, together with the music, which seems to be independent of the Easter setting. No evidence of dramatic action is apparent in any of the Introit trope versions, but as in the case of its Easter companion the move to the end of Matins signalized details of costume and gesture—genuine impersonation. Once again it was the natural position of the drama, since the events related took place at an early hour. Incidentally, the Christmas drama is usually found, not before, but after the Te Deum, that is, just outside the service.

With regard to the characters, there is no doubt as to the shepherds; but who are their questioners? These prove to be the "midwives" (obstetrices) attending the Manger, a tradition which dated from the 2nd century. The praesepe or crib was a necessary property, usually placed behind the altar. The presence of the Virgin and Child, in effigy, is recorded on several occasions. Here, by the 11th century, was a small but complete "shepherds' drama, or "Officium Pastorum", as the manuscripts frequently called it. Yet surprisingly enough its expansion was very limited, and very few examples survive as separate compositions.

The most extensive example of the "Officium Pastorum" is a 13th-century one from Rouen.¹ Five "shepherds" in tunics and hoods, bearing staves, enter the choir as a solo "angel" from "on high" sings "Nolite timere" (St. Luke ii. 10-12). He is answered by an "angelic chorus" of seven boys (also in the roof), singing "Gloria in excelsis". Both have straightforward, quick-moving settings that seem to be original. As the shepherds move towards the curtained praesepe behind the altar they sing five rhyming quatrains (founded on verses 14-15) which again represent free composition. Two lines are here given:

The melody has a strangely modern ring, with the illusion of tonic harmony followed by a dominant seventh!

The praesepe scene is made up mostly of trope dialogue and music. In this particular example we note that the scribe, in writing the music of "Quem quaeritis in praesepe . . .", makes use of the Easter melody for a few notes.

The "midwives" draw aside the curtain at the words "adest hic parvulus" and show the figures of the Child and Mother. The shepherds kneel and sing two stanzas. Here is one of them:

The joyful last sentence of the trope rounds off the drama. In the Midnight Mass which follows, the "shepherds" play a prominent part in the liturgical details of the service. Later in Lauds the very relevant antiphon "Quem vidistis, pastores, dicite . . ." is treated as a dramatic dialogue between priest and shepherds giving the effect of their being questioned, on returning from the Manger, by several successive people. In some of the Magi dramas this idea is taken up.

Except for the occasional use of this episode and the praesepe dialogue in these longer dramas the Officium Pastorum seems to have languished. The more dramatic figures of the Magi and Herod captured the playwrights' attention. The praesepe, however, has survived in another way. The "Christmas Crib" with its picturesque inanimate figures can still be met with seasonally as a silent expression of devotion.

MAGI.—We leave Christmas, then, and move to Epiphany, 6 Jan., for the most fruitful of the seasonal dramas. Using material provided by St. Matthew ii. 1-12 and 16, the playwrights told the story of the coming of the Wise Men, who guided by the star brought their gifts of gold, frankincense and myrrh to Bethlehem, encountering Herod on the way. A long-established tradition, suggested no doubt by Psalm LXXII (10), gave them kingly rank, of Tharsis, Arabia and Sheba respectively. We find several alternative names given to the dramas, e.g. "Officium Stellae", "Officium Regum Trium" and, as they develop, "Ordo ad representandum Herodem".

The simplest example is a Limoges text (now lost) probably of the 12th century. In spite of being fully dramatic, it was actually within the liturgy — at the most appropriate point, the Offertory of the Epiphany Mass, where, crowned and robed in silk, the Magi bore their gifts in a gift-bearing ceremony. This dramatic use of the Epiphany Oblation was undoubtedly practised at other centres and probably represents the origin of the drama. We meet in this version the "property" common to all Magi dramas, the stella — a star-shaped candelabrum suspended from the roof and usually capable of lateral movement through the manipulation of cords. The Magi "followed the star" quite literally. In this brief text, though they "act a part" and are greeted by someone impersonating an angel, all words and music are of liturgical origin.

Disregarding some other similar semi-liturgical versions we turn to the simplest surviving form of the real Magi drama, from Rouen.¹ Though it is loosely linked with the Mass, we are presented suddenly with a quantity of original speech and music which with minor alterations we shall find in all other extant Magi dramas, whatever expansion may have occurred. It represents, indeed, the foundation, the core of the whole series. Since the development of the Magi drama seems to have been completed during the 11th century, and the Rouen example dates from the 13th, it may not represent the most primitive form, but it may well be that there was a prototype of not very different content.

The Rouen action takes place between Terce and Mass. The kings enter from different directions, robed and crowned, each followed by an attendant bearing gifts. They meet before the altar, above which hangs the star. Pointing to it, the first sings as on p. 332.

The suggestion for these sentences can be found in a Lauds antiphon, but they seem to represent new composition, words and music. The Magi greet each other with the kiss of peace, and sing what is apparently another new composition, expressing their intention of seeking the "king" and offering gifts. The star then moves away, the three following it, while relevant liturgical choruses are sung by the choir.

After they have "prayed and fallen into a sleep" they are awakened by an angel singing that they shall "return another way", a hint of the Herod peril that has not yet entered suggested by the Gospel account, but apparently a new composition.

Now comes a new, specially composed "praesepe dialogue". The first speakers are still the two "midwives":

and once again bringing gifts during the Offertory.

There are barely a dozen surviving Magi music-dramas, but fortunately these show an evolutionary growth which may well have been close to the actual development. All build themselves on the material we have just considered. Their normal position seems to have been just before the end, the Te Deum, of Epiphany Matins.

The most important step of all was soon accomplished — the appearance of Herod, the blustering tyrant beloved by audiences of medieval secular plays. Even in the few liturgical examples to be considered, a considerable evolution is to be noted. He first appears briefly, to question the Magi. Then later we have court scenes with messengers, scribes, courtiers and a military attendant (armiger), who tells of the flight of the Magi and ultimately advises the Massacre of the Innocents. Next, the shepherds are remembered. The Magi meet and question them in a scene the origin of which has already been described. Finally, in one instance the "Officium Pastorum" is used as a prelude.

Altogether the Magi dramas deserve much credit as original compositions. The actions at Herod's court had to be supplied from the imagination, and though the Vulgate and the Epiphany antiphons might sometimes suggest material, most of the texts, with their music, were new. Versification is found, but not very much, the swifter dramatic movement of prose usually being preferred. Antiphons and hymns are rare.

The first appearance of Herod occurs in a brief 11th-century drama from Nevers¹, otherwise very similar to the Rouen version. He enters to the Magi with apparently a good knowledge of their purpose, questions them, receives their reply and then asks that they shall report to him when they have seen the child — all original compositions, all used in subsequent versions. He disappears as suddenly as he came.

There may be a gap here in the evolution, for the scene in later versions is a much busier one. Herod's court comes alive, beginning with the messengers who receive and question the Magi and report to the king — more new material for subsequent use. An 11th-century version from Compiègne² has this, together with another Herod scene after the Magi have presented their gifts at the Manger. The king is warned by a messenger of their defection:

the 12th and 13th centuries, from Madrid (Norman-French in origin), Strasbourg, Montpellier and Bilsen, the character-drawing of Herod and his entourage becomes more and more vivid. The Madrid version³ introduces the shepherds, returning from the Manger and being questioned by the Magi. Montpellier⁴ causes two of the Magi to talk gibberish, apparently to convey the impression that they come "from a far land". This version closes with a great deal of bluster and sword-waving by Herod, Archelaus his son and their officers. The Bilsen version⁵ supplies a delightful touch. One of the court messengers, anxious to report the signs and wonders he has seen, enters crying in his excitement "Rex, rex, rex!" Great care is taken to paint Herod's fear, indecision and petulant anger. His greeting of the Magi is curt. Their dignified reply causes him to hurl his sword to the ground and order them to prison. He consults the scribes as to the prophecies, is again enraged and angrily returns their scrolls. After consulting his military attendants he releases and haughtily dismisses the Magi. The meeting with the shepherds and the praesepe dialogue follow, and the text breaks off with the attendant warning Herod of the deception of the Magi.

A very imperfect 11th-century manuscript from Freising⁶ gives us another fully developed version, the date showing how early the Magi drama arrived at full maturity. In it a few more touches to the portrait of Herod make him even more eccentric and arrogant.

For the fullest and most individual of the Magi dramas we turn to the Fleury Play-Book⁷ (pp. 205-14). Thanks to the generous rubrics we have a very good idea of the mise en scène. The throne of Herod is somewhere in the nave; the praesepe is at one of the side-doors. The three Magi enter from different directions and meet at the main altar, under the star, later to follow its overhead course through the choir to the door between choir and nave. Their words at this point show that this passage is intended to represent the journey from the East to Jerusalem. Herod's courtiers are dressed "as young men"; the scribes are bearded. A number of details are given as to bearing and gesture, especially concerning

As we have learned to expect from Fleury, originality is shown in a number of ways, but the first part consists of a complete "Officium Pastorum" very similar to that of Rouen. The one Fleury innovation in this section is the invitation of the shepherds to the congregation to share their adoration.

Much of the text of the court scene has been met before, but the music shows the usual Fleury desire to do things differently. There are sometimes new settings; more usually the music has an individual twist, or starting in the normal way branches off in its own fashion.

There is one matter of literary interest. It has been pointed out that the first questioning of the Magi by Herod's messenger is a close imitation of a passage from the 'Aeneid' (viii, 112-14).¹

The Magi's reply to this, a reshaping in verse of familiar sentences, may be quoted to show Fleury's normal tunefulness:

There are some novel touches in the Magi's encounter with the shepherds, and in the rounding off after the usual prae-sepe scene, when they return to the choir as to a friendly multitude, singing "Gaudete fratres . . . Deus homo factus est!"

THE MASSACRE OF THE INNOCENTS.—At least three of the Magi dramas have ended on a threatening note. In each case the playwright has left us in no doubt that Herod is about to order the "slaughter of the innocents" described in St. Matthew's account. There is only one surviving Magi version which actually includes this episode with the rest. This is found in a 13th-century service book from Laon. However, as the Magi part consists of familiar material, and the new action is very similar to the arrangement found in a separate "Interfectionem Puerorum" belonging to the Fleury Play-Book (pp. 214-20), we will disregard it and turn to the Fleury account, the "Massacre" as a separate composition. The new drama follows the Fleury "Magi" as a sequence, the first drama omitting the usual rage of Herod.

The "Massacre" contains a good deal of borrowed material, but skilfully adapted and enlarged, together with passages of original verse. Once again the music is inclined to go its own individual "Fleury" way. The construction and arrangement of the drama as a whole is admirable. The main "playing" site seems to have been on a space in front of the choir screen, with excursions to other parts of the nave.

The drama begins with a procession of children through the church singing liturgical music. Then the Holy Family appear and are warned by an angel to fly to Egypt. Words and music here are partly liturgical, partly quite new. Then Herod appears, and for some few lines the text is familiar. The attendant gives Herod the warning "Delusus es . . ." and the king is so overcome that he draws his sword with the intention of slaying himself! A diversion occurs: the children re-enter singing a new composition. At the suggestion of his military attendant Herod orders the massacre, which takes place there and then, in spite of the intervention of the "mothers". Then follows a scene of "Rachel's Lament" with two consolatrices, who support her when she is about to faint. The scene is a comparatively long one, and is a strange, skilfully combined patch-work—free composition, borrowings from a German version (unusual for Fleury) and actually an adaptation of a 10th-century sequence by Notker.

But all is not lost. An angel appears singing a liturgical antiphon ("Suffer little children . . ."), the children are restored to life, rise and once more move in procession. They pass through the choir singing a sequence. In dumb-show we see the dethronement of Herod, who is succeeded by Archelaus. Finally the Holy Family are summoned to return by an angel to music which is probably original. The concluding Te Deum again points to a performance at Matins.

The "Lament of Rachel" scene was a long-established one. A number of separate dramatic compositions, with music, were in existence representing the mourning mother being consoled by an angel.

THE PROCESSION OF THE PROPHETS.—Another dramatic activity, the "Ordo Prophetarum" or "Procession of the Prophets", deserves a brief mention. It was performed apparently during one or other of the Twelve Days following Christmas, and represented a dramatization of part of a famous 6th-century sermon (wrongly credited to St. Augustine). The preacher rhetorically called on various great names, e.g. Isaiah,

¹ K. Young, 'Drama of the Medieval Church', II, 90.

Jeremiah, Daniel, Moses, David — even Virgil and the Sybil — to testify concerning their prophecies as to the coming of Christ. A number of metrical compositions arose from it, some undoubtedly sung. A 13th-century version from Laon¹ has very full details as to the costuming and appearance of the characters. The "prophets" are called upon in turn by "summoners" to deliver their testaments. There are some interesting dramatic details, e.g. "Balaam, upon an ass, bent, bearded, holding a palm, plying his spurs". However, all this is pageantry rather than drama and deserves mention mainly because of its use as an episode in the longest of the Christmas dramas now to be considered.

THE "CHRISTMAS PLAY".—Remembering the Passion dramas of Easter, we may expect to find attempts to fuse the whole of the dramatic activity of the Christmas season into one comprehensive composition. Such ponderous dramatic efforts must have been very difficult to perform within church walls, for ecclesiastical space, time and perhaps patience had their limits. We shall not be surprised, then, to find that only one example of such a large-scale Christmas drama has survived, the so-called "Christmas Play" from the 'Carmina Burana'², dating from the 13th century.

There is no evidence as to the circumstances of its first production. It may have been composed within the monastery or may be another of the works of the wandering scholars. Its unwieldiness has aroused speculation as to whether it was merely an academic literary exercise, but if this were so it would be rather difficult to account for the care displayed in supplying the musical setting, unheighted neums written above the text, for which the writer has no clue. All that can be gathered regarding the music is that the stanzas were set strophically with a great deal of repetition of phrase, in very similar style to the settings of the other dramas from Benedictbeuern previously mentioned. For example, the two opening stanzas, sung by "Augustine", are both given the same tune, the form of which is A.B.A.B.C.D.C.D. There is very little relief from these long strophic settings.

To summarize the lengthy action briefly: It begins with a modified "Ordo Prophetarum". The principal figure is "Augustine" who "summons" the "Prophets", and who is opposed by the symbolic character "Archisynagogus". The latter lightens a very dull and acrimonious theological debate by being at times a figure of fun. Another medieval figure, the "Boy Bishop", also makes a brief and unexpectedly serious appearance.

The main action then begins. The Annunciation and the visit of Elizabeth to Mary are represented in the prose of the Vulgate. Even the Birth scene seems to be staged. What follows is familiar enough in story — the appearance of the star, the Three Kings, Herod's court, the shepherds, the scene at the Manger, the Slaying of the Innocents, the Flight to Egypt. Everything is related, however, in unvarying prolix verse, set strophically, except for a few borrowed liturgical moments. One or two new details may be noted: Archisynagogus transfers himself to Herod's court and takes over the office of adviser; "Diabolus" is also present, doing his worst. A dumb-show conclusion shows the horrible death of Herod and the crowning of Archelaus.

This last drama of the Christmas season has exceeded all the others in stature and, with its careful details as to costume, setting and grouping, must have been an impressive pageant. But in dramatic results it seems much less effective than other, less ambitious efforts. In the shorter versions the brief prose sentences, with their recitative-like settings and rapid dramatic action, seem much more likely to have produced satisfactory "stage" results compared with the unwieldy technique of the Benedictbeuern drama.

DRAMAS OF THE VIRGIN MARY.—In the later middle ages the greatly enhanced cult of the Virgin Mary is reflected in the number of sung dramas which grew up attached to the various feast-days devoted to her — the Presentation at the Temple, the Annunciation, the Purification, the Assumption. In these cases, though impersonation occurred, the atmosphere was mainly liturgical.

One remarkable example is worthy of mention. This is the "presentation" drama organized by Philippe de Mézières (1326–1406), crusader and man of letters. It was performed at Avignon before Mass on the feast-day of 1385. The "Ordo" drawn up by Philippe has survived, giving not only the text but a long introduction with the fullest details of a medieval mise en scène that we possess, recalling a most elaborate and brilliant spectacle. Unfortunately no music is given.

The cast comprised twenty-two performers besides apparently a crowd of supernumeraries. Among the twenty-two were included two "musicians" (instruments unspecified), who are directed to play while movement is taking place from "station" to "station". At every stage, movement and gesture are carefully described.

LEGENDS OF ST. NICHOLAS: THE LAST JUDGMENT: NEW AND OLD TESTAMENT DRAMAS.—During the late middle ages these and other religious subjects produced a wealth of "miracle" plays in the vernacular, no longer in contact with church services, and with the spoken texts only. We are concerned here solely with the Latin music-dramas which in the main precede the secular plays, and which are comparatively few in number. Six of them indeed come from a single manuscript, the extraordinary Fleury Play-Book.¹

All the examples belong to the 12th and 13th centuries. The playwright of any of these was in a different position from one who attempted, say, a Magi drama, where he could build on past tradition and technique, and need adventure only mildly. Left in isolation, as it were, to tell a biblical episode or a saintly legend the writers attempted no dramatic prose dialogues, but invariably launched into the regularity of rhyming stanzas, frequently of uniform construction. To this monotony, in some few instances, was added a strophic musical setting; that is, each stanza throughout was set to a single melody. Such a method resulted in compositions that would probably strain the patience of a modern hearer. But this extreme type was the exception; a number of instances will be met where there is a considerable variety of stanza construction in accordance with dramatic needs, and a similar relief in the settings. These points are best considered with the separate examples.

Let us start, then, with the Fleury Play-Book. The subject of "The Raising of Lazarus", (pp. 233-43) seems to offer dramatic possibilities. The rubrics are ample, using the locus or sedes device—set spaces or sometimes platforms which indicated definite localities. In this case these represent the House of Simon (Jesus meeting Mary Magdalen) and Bethany (where the miracle is accomplished). Various movements, gestures and even emotions are carefully detailed. The accounts of St. Luke and St. John are faithfully followed, competent six-line rhyming stanzas. But unfortunately for modern appreciation the drama, apart from an introductory "prose", is made up of fifty-one of these identically shaped stanzas. Furthermore, each is set to the same tune, with occasional variation of a few notes in the cadence. Here is the first stanza:

It is an attractive Dorian melody, but hardly able to stand up to a half-century of repetition. A concluding Te Deum shows that the drama was designed for performance at Matins.

"The Conversion of St. Paul" from the same manuscript (pp. 230-33) gives us much information about the mise en scène. Considerable church space is needed. One side of the area represents Jerusalem, with separate sedes for the High Priest and for Saul with his armed attendants. A similar pair of sedes in "Damascus" accommodates Judas and the High Priest of the local synagogue. Between is a bed wherein lies Ananias awaiting his "vision". The story follows Acts ix. 1-30 as adequately as the restrictive technique of the rhyming four-line stanza will allow. Once again the drama of the story is hampered by the monotony of the form of the verse. There are, however, some vivid stage-directions, including that for the lowering of Saul in a basket from a height, quasi a muro, in the concluding "escape" episode.

The music follows almost the opposite technique from that of "Lazarus". We have an embarrassment of different tunes. Certainly "Saul" and "Dominus" repeat a melody, the former once, the latter twice. But elsewhere each stanza has its own new melody, sometimes on the A.A.B.C pattern, more often merely wandering. The whole effect, musically, is one of shapelessness. Saul's first tune, a pleasant Dorian one, is here given:

and the characters speak in dignified and

A concluding Te Deum again marks a Matins performance.

The remaining "Fleury" dramas to be considered all deal with St. Nicholas, a favourite saint of medieval times, patron of scholars and travellers. "The Three Clerks" (pp. 183-87) is thus an appropriate beginning. The mise en scène is simple — the space outside a house or inn, and the interior. The story tells of three wandering scholars seeking shelter for the night and being received by an old man and his wife. Once in the house and asleep they are robbed and murdered. But a stranger appears, demands and is given shelter, rejects the supper he is offered and calls for "fresh meat". When the host expresses himself unable to meet the demand, the Saint (for it is St. Nicholas himself) replies grimly that he has "fresh meat in too great quantity". The criminals immediately confess, the bodies are produced, and after St. Nicholas has sung a prayer, are restored to life.

The monotony of the stanzas is enlivened by a certain amount of characterization in the case of the wife, who is the driving force,

The second St. Nicholas legend (pp. 176-182) was a favourite one in medieval times, the "dowry" story, sometimes called "Tres Filiae" — "The Three Daughters". The Fleury version is a very naive affair. Anonymous gifts of gold, flung through the window, enable a poverty-stricken father to marry off his daughters successively to suitors who arrive most opportunely for the purpose. The benefactor is found, in the end, to be the Saint himself.

Despite the wooden technique of the telling of the story there is a certain variety in the construction of the text, the long stanzas of the opening laments having a different pattern from the rest, the five-line main stanzas relieved by a periodic shorter line.

Some appreciation must be expressed for the music. The setting of the laments, a third-mode melody, is attractive and skilfully patterned, and if again we find a single (Dorian) tune used for the main stanzas, what a beautiful tune it is! Here is "Pater's" appeal:

the Lady Macbeth. There is occasional distinction in the verse, which is again hampered by being set to repetitions of a single tune of A.A.B.C pattern. One quotation will give us the music (a very shapely Dorian melody) and the momentary classical colouring of a particular stanza:

For all that, after over thirty repetitions (some partial), such as occur, it must have worn a little thin. If it is compared with the "Adeodatus" tune given at the end of the account of the "Son of Getron" drama below, a strong similarity will be noted.

A concluding antiphon points to perform-

The prayer of St. Nicholas — the concluding stanza — is set to a completely new tune. This seems a very effective melody, rising and falling as in supplication:

ance at Vespers or Lauds on the Saint-day.

Another long-established "miracle" of the Saint was that involving the "unbeliever" and the "image". The Fleury Performance seems again to have been at Matins on the Saint-day.

working (pp. 188-96) is of real literary merit. It tells in stanzas of considerable rhythmic variety of a Jew who, going on a journey, places his wealth under the protection of an image of St. Nicholas which he possesses, but does so with doubt and hesitation. In his absence three robbers arrive, loot the chest and depart to their own dwelling. The owner, returning, expresses first his grief and then his resentment against the Saint. He threatens the image with a beating! One can hardly suppose the Saint to be moved by the threat; nevertheless, he appears to the robbers and promises them condign punishment if they do not make restitution. Though terrified, two of them hesitate, but the third persuades them. (The third robber is the cannist; there is a real attempt here at characterization.) The Jew finding his treasure restored becomes a ready convert. The chorus at the end sings the Introit of the Mass of St. Nicholas.

The music is of real interest. Certainly groups of stanzas are set strophically, a setting being repeated a number of times, but this is always by the same character. Nearly a score of tunes are used, some of them striking as well as melodious. Here is the beginning of the robbers' first debate:

The Jew's dismay at his loss is thus pictured:

the eager promise of restitution by the frightened robbers thus:

Lastly, as far as the Fleury manuscript is concerned, we find the only known dramatization of another St. Nicholas legend, known as "Filius Getronis" — "Son of Getron" (pp. 196-205), which musically must be regarded as a noteworthy composition. The copious Fleury rubrics reveal an unusual range of time and space. At one point it is made clear that a year has elapsed since the previous speech. The mise en scène is clearly detailed. The sedes of the conquering King Marmorinus is on one side of the playing-space. There in his "capital" he sits enthroned with his attendants and soldiers. On the other side, in a "far land", is the city of Excoranda, with citizens and, particularly, Getron, Adeodatus his son and Euphrosina his wife with her consolatrices, who comfort her when in due course her son is torn from her by the invading forces of Marmorinus. The story continues with a scene in which the boy, cup-bearer at the court of the pagan king, engages Marmorinus in a spirited debate in defence of his faith; and it concludes with his miraculous "translation" and restoration to his parents by the intervention of St. Nicholas. The liturgical antiphon which winds up the drama points to a performance at Lauds.

Once again we have a text consisting of rhyming stanzas of unvarying pattern, but any monotony on this occasion is relieved by a striking and noteworthy device: all the characters have their own particular tune, even the attendants of the king and the citizens of Excoranda. There are two logical exceptions to this practice. The "Consolers" show their sympathy with Euphrosina to the extent of using her melody in comforting her. Adeodatus, who has a very good tune of his own, abandons it on one occasion — when he is expressing his longing for home, which he does appropriately enough to his mother's melody. It is indeed, for the time, a remarkable technique, a primitive Leitmotiv device. It is reinforced by the fine quality of the tunes themselves, which are given below:

(a) The King. This is a lovely Mixolydian melody. The "appoggiaturas" of the 3rd section should be noted.

(b) The King's Attendants(c) Adeodatus. Cf. the "Cara michi pignora"-melody in "The Three Daughters".(d) Euphrosina(e) Getron(f) The Citizens

The large number of vernacular "miracle" plays dealing with eschatological themes illustrates well enough the intense preoccupation of the medieval mind with the problems of the end of the world and the Last Judgment. There must have existed previously numerous Latin dramas inspired by the same sombre subject. Of these, however, only two are preserved.

The formidable 12th-century drama from Tergernsee¹, comprising over 400 lines of Latin verse, must be briefly dealt with. It calls for a wide playing-space (no less than eight sedes); its action ranges through all the kingdoms of the world and extends to the Last Day; it needs a large number of actors and supernumeraries. But there is no scrap of musical setting for the verses, though undoubtedly they were sung. We must be content with drawing from it evidence of the exacting technical demands made by 12th-century playwrights, which must have resulted in impressive dramatic spectacles.

A very different treatment of the theme is the "Sponsus" drama, a French composition of the 11th or 12th century.² It is of much more modest dimensions, just over ninety lines of verse. It is an early example of the invasion of the vernacular. Some stanzas are wholly Latin, some wholly French, others Latin with a French refrain. There is nothing to indicate attachment to any service.

The action is based on the parable of the Wise and Foolish Virgins (St. Matthew xxv. 1-13), but told in rhyming stanzas. After a choral introduction the Angel Gabriel gives warning of the coming of the Bridegroom in five-line stanzas which give the pattern for most of the text, of a different rhythm from the opening. His section is in French. The Foolish and Wise Virgins use mainly Latin. The concluding stanza in Latin uttered by "Christus" has a complete change of rhythm. The harsh sentiment of this close is rather startling. Christ consigns the "Fatuae" to Hell, and the only detailed rubric of the piece calls on "Demons" to do this, a first glimpse of a very popular medieval stage appearance.

The music, in Aquitaine neums carefully heightened round a single F-line, uses the device of "one speaker — one tune", and thus employs only four musical sections, since the merchants are allowed to borrow the tune of the "Fatuae" in replying to them. The "Prudentes", while having their own tune, share a vernacular refrain, and its music, with the "Fatuae". The two other melodies belong to Gabriel and the introductory chorus respectively. The solemn words of "Christus" at the end are without musical notation.

Overleaf is given the melody of the introductory chorus. It will be seen to bear a considerable likeness to the "Omnipotens Pater . . ." — merchant scene — tune of the "Visitatio" dramas from Vich, MS 111, Tours and Saint-Quentin:

² Paris, Bibl. Nat., MS lat. 1139, fol. 53 r-55 v (headed "Sponsus").

Here we have a definite "major" tune. There is no doubt in the manuscript as to the discrepancy marked.

Only four manuscripts survive showing liturgical dramas on Old Testament subjects. Two of them are fragments, without evidence as to their attachment to the liturgy, but both showing ambitious staging schemes. The first, a 12th-century text from Vorau (rescued from the binding of a 15th-century book of sermons), deals with the story of Isaac and his deception by Jacob and his mother Rebecca. Properties and stage directions are lavish, the story is told in realistic detail and there is a liturgical choir which acts as a kind of Greek chorus, breaking in upon the action intermittently to give allegorical explanations of an episode. The musical notation, unheighted neums for which there is no clue, has only partly been filled in.

The other incomplete work is "Joseph and His Brethren", found in a 13th-century manuscript from the cathedral of Laon. There is again an ambitious stage-setting, the biblical narrative being followed closely in stanzas that are agreeably varied in rhythm. But no musical setting is given.

These two works are of the nature of a tantalizing glimpse. It seems a reasonable assumption that music-dramas on a number of kindred Genesis subjects have perished without trace.

The remaining two survivals are some kind of consolation, for they deal with their subject in brilliant fashion. They share a theme that has attracted writers and composers up to modern times, "Belshazzar's Feast" occupying the first half of these two 12th-century dramas of "Daniel".

The first is a composition of the wandering scholar Hilarius.¹ Hilarius is an interesting figure. A pupil of Abélard, he was the author of at least three examples of this type of drama, the other two being a "Raising of Lazarus" version and an "Image of St. Nicholas". In spite of the excellence of his Latin verse, we must pass him over, since there is no trace of music in his manuscripts. This is a pity, for they were undoubtedly sung; Hilarius and his goliard companions probably carried the tunes in their heads. We turn therefore to the splendid Beauvais version², which possesses a clearly written musical setting on four lines.

The concluding Te Deum places the performance at Matins. As for the day, evidence, not altogether conclusive, points to 1 Jan., the Feast of the Circumcision, where it would be in proximity with that well-known office of misrule, "The Feast of Fools", which we know was carried through at Beauvais on that day. The famous "Prose of the Ass" contains a musical (or, more probably, unmusical) bray, "Hez, Sir Asne, hez!" In "Daniel" the great king Darius at the end of one of his most dignified pronouncements suddenly utters the cry:

for no apparent reason — an astonishing moment!

But whether or no this is a lapse, the prevailing note of "Daniel" is dignity and splendour. The rich cathedral treasury no doubt supplied the golden and silver vessels that Belshazzar calls for. The staging arrangements demand a king's court, a throne, tables and furnishings for the feast, and near by a representation of the lions' den. There are two "production" problems, the mystic writing on the wall and the lions, both of which seem to be represented realistically.

Both Belshazzar and Darius have, apparently, large entourages — nobles and soldiers. These are not merely "supers", for a large proportion of the drama consists of their long and vigorous choruses. A sentence from one of them — "Let us all sing loudly together with sonorous praises" — strikes their prevailing note. The ceremonial entry and departure of the queen is accompanied by her own attendants singing a processional in her honour. Harps and drums are mentioned as being played, together with other unspecified "instruments of music". Altogether we have a picture of a pageant of the utmost brilliance: a crowded "stage", rich costumes, ringing voices, the clang of instruments and the glitter of gold and steel.

The text is sung throughout, the musical scheme being that with some few exceptions each new utterance has its new setting. The result is that we meet over fifty different melodies! Occasionally these may be formless, following a stanza without repetition, but normally clear-cut patterns are found — A.B.repeated; A.B.C.D; A.B.C.C; A.B.A.C; or even such complications as A.A.B.C.B.D.D. B.C.B. The direct "sequence" style is most favoured, approximating to "one syllable — one note" most of the time, but there are occasionally more florid passages. The music in general seems to be original, the only liturgical piece being a verse of an ancient Christmas hymn, sung at the very end by an "angel".

The drama begins formally. There is a single stanza of dedication, perhaps sung solo; then comes the direction: "While King Belshazzar is coming to his place his nobles will sing this ode before him". This proves to be a summary — an "argument" — of the whole work. We assume, therefore, that the real action does not begin until these nine stanzas are completed. The first is given below, showing the fine vigorous tune to which they are set:

Then the king ascends his throne amid acclamations and calls for the Temple vessels in a single stanza set simply in "sequence" fashion. Another fine chorus of praise, twenty lines of verse, is sung while the vessels are being brought by the satraps. Three tunes are used. Here is the first:

As the vessels are presented there appears the vision of the hand, tracing the words "Mane; Thechel; Phares". The king cries out in amazement and then calls for his soothsayers:

These appear, are interrogated by the king (to another new tune), but reply:

It may not be too fanciful to imagine that their helpless lack of knowledge is underlined by the repetitive nature of the brief melody.

Then comes the queen, ushered by a stately processional, to a "major-key" tune:

together with three more stanzas.

The queen's solo is a very fine major one.

She tells of Daniel and advises that he shall be sent for. The king agrees and gives orders to his nobles. We note as exceptions to the general rule of "new utterance — new tune" that both Daniel and the nobles repeat melodies in their interchanges; furthermore, Daniel's music is a variant of the nobles'.

Three times does Daniel protest (in the vernacular!):

He is brought to the king, who promises rich rewards if he can solve the riddle of the words. The music of both the king's speech and Daniel's long reply (thirty lines of verse) is in "sequence" style of single notes, and rather arid. However, the grim interpretation is delivered, and the king, unflinching and true to his word, raises Daniel to a seat beside him.

The queen retires, to another processional. A further chorus, in praise of Daniel, accompanies the bearing away of the vessels.

Then comes a dramatic stroke: the interest is suddenly switched to King Darius the Mede.

Preceded by harp players he approaches with his nobles. The latter sing a long chorus in his praise with a rousing climax in the last few lines. From the evidence we have of the use of every conceivable kind of medieval musical instrument at church festivals, from pipes and viols to trumpets, cymbals and drums, it is difficult to think that Beauvais did not make full musical use of such moments as this:

— a fine Dorian tune with a lovely cadence !

A rubric follows. From its bare details we gather that there is a stage battle and that Belshazzar is slain. Darius is enthroned and is hailed by a phrase ("O king, live for ever !") which has already seen hard service. Further stanzas involving much stage traffic, and several solos and choruses, show Daniel established in the favour of the new ruler. But the plotters are at work. The king is persuaded to establish the decree that shall trap Daniel. He is observed "adoring his God" instead of the king, whereupon the conspirators hasten to Darius with the news. Daniel is brought before Darius, whose humanity and uneasiness are plainly shown. He tries to temporize :

But he is reminded of "lex Parthorum et Medorum" and reluctantly condemns Daniel to the lions, in spite of the prophet's eight-line lament. Daniel enters the den singing a prayer, but once there he is defended by an angel, who threatens the lions with a sword. One speculates how all this was managed — there seems to be no doubt that it was actually done in dumb-show with "stage lions". Meanwhile another angel has met the prophet Habakkuk in the harvest fields. The harvesters' dinner which he is carrying is diverted to Daniel. According to the rubric this is done rather drastically, Habakkuk being seized and conveyed to the den "by the hair of his head". He appears wholly co-operative, however. A scene between the king and Daniel shows the latter's release and his replacement, at the king's order, by the plotters. They show a very proper repentance before being devoured. Restored to favour, Daniel utters his prophecy of the coming of Christ :

after which a single hymn-verse by the angel, mentioned earlier, concludes the work, which could even now prove attractive in performance. What is "Daniel" but an opera? It deserves no less a name.

With this striking and ambitious 12th-century composition we end our survey.

CONCLUSION.—The history of this art-form from its beginnings to its greatest development within the confines of the Church having been traced, brief mention should be made of semi-dramatic movements of a very much earlier date which belong to the Byzantine Church. These took the form of hymn-cycles, the more important of which were associated with the great festivals of Christmas and Easter. The term "play" has been used somewhat loosely in connection with them, for though, as in one of the compositions, sung passages might be allotted in the text to "Joseph", "Mary" or a "Narrator", there is nowhere any evidence that anyone ever undertook to act a part, to impersonate the character concerned.

The eastern and western Churches, sharing as they did a faith and a sacred literature, had many religious links ; from the East, naturally enough, came many a legend and tradition ; the Byzantine Church music may have had considerable influence on western ecclesiastical plainsong in its revival of enterprise about the 9th century. But the West owes no debt for the liturgical drama. The "Visitatio Sepulchri" arose, as we have seen, from one independent and original germ, closely linked to the Roman liturgy, and its evolution is apparent at every stage. In the case of the "Magi" drama, which gathered to itself so many of the themes of the Christmas season, we have noted its development from the Oblation ceremony of the Roman Mass.

To summarize : our survey of these dramatic compositions of the western Church, which achieved their essential development between the 10th and 13th centuries, has revealed an importance other than that which has given them a recognized place in the history of drama, in which estimate their musical settings have played no part. Clothed again with their melodies, many of them show an intrinsic artistic merit in the realms of music-drama (a term on which the present writer has laid frequent emphasis), for they possess most features of their modern counterparts. We have noted the variety of the voice-groupings: solos, singing together in twos and threes, single voices and groups answering each other, solos with refrain choruses, various types of full chorus, including the triumphant "finale". There was even the "star" soloist, such as the part of Mary Magdalen in the longer "Visitatio Sepulchri" versions, or the name-part in "Daniel", which called for the memorizing and dramatic delivery of a considerable amount of music.

We have seen occasional evidence from the rubrics as to instrumental accompaniment to choral singing. There is no notational evidence of anything more than a single melodic line, but that statement is also true of the manuscripts of trouvère songs and we are certain enough that these were accompanied. It is a reasonable conjecture that the resources of both accompaniment and harmony were used far more often in these works than is at present believed.

We have noted often enough the "stage directions", giving vivid detail about costumes, properties, movement, gesture and general expression of emotion. Altogether, this was a conscious art, striving with every means possible to its age and situation to achieve realism, and in some cases succeeding so well that a modern revival would be a pleasurable and moving experience. Here, then, several centuries before the Italian nuove musiche, are the beginnings of opera and oratorio.

LITUUS (Lat.). An instrument used by the cavalry in ancient Rome, much as the "cavalry trumpet" is by modern armies. It was cylindrical in bore with an expanding bell-mouth and was turned back upon itself only at the bell-end, so that its general form was that of a crooked staff or the letter J (see PLATE 6, Vol. I, No. 1). The pitch of one specimen discovered in 1827 at Cervetri, and now preserved in the palace of the Vatican in Rome, is g, an octave higher than the cornu, and a major third higher than the modern cavalry trumpet of the British Army, which is in E♭. That the distinction between the Roman tuba and lituus is real needs for proof no more scholarship than is called for by Horace's 'First Ode to Maecenas':

Multos castra iuvant, et lituo tubae
Permixtus sonitus.

On this passage Torcellini comments: "Sunt qui lituum a tuba distinguunt, ex eo quod ille equitum sit, haec vero peditum". The distinction is good to-day. The tuba was the "infantry bugle", the lituus the "cavalry trumpet". Although longer than the tuba, the lituus, according to Acro, was acutus while the tuba was gravis when sounded.

The derivation of lituus may be originally Greek. Certainly it is related to the hooked augur's staff of the Oscans, which had been Mercury's wand and has become the bishop's crozier. Both tuba and lituus figure on Trajan's column, in the triumphal procession. Vegetius defines the former: "Tuba — quae directa est, appellatur". This straight form reappears even in more recent times, as in a fine picture by Baltazarini; but comparing it with the average height of the players we may estimate it at about seven feet long. The lituus is figured by Bartolini from a marble Roman tombstone with the inscription

M. Julius Victor
ex collegio
Liticinum Cornicinum, which is perhaps the first mention of a society of professional musicians.

Post-classical usages of the term lituus are varied. An Anglo-Saxon vocabulary of the 11th century (printed in Thomas Wright's collection of vocabularies) gives "lituus, anglice truð-horn or sarga", and "liticen, angl. truð". "Truð" is also given as the translation of "histriones", i.e. actors or entertainers, and it has been suggested that the truð-horn was the long, probably wooden horn which appears in miniatures as an accompaniment to dancing animals, etc. Sometimes it is fingered with two hands as if it had fingerholes like a cornett. A 15th-century vocabulary (Trinity Coll. Cambridge, MS, also in Wright) gives "Lituu, a lytyng-horne" — a horn on which merry tunes were played, again suggesting a kind of cornett. Chaucer, in 'The House of Fame' mentions "many floute and liltyng horne", and Holland (c. 1450) "lilt pipe" (see LILT).

The next interesting uses of the word lituus occur in the 18th century. In a 'Partita a Viola d' amore, 2 Hautbois, Lituu & Basso' by Joseph Brendtner (early 18th century), the lituus is clearly a natural brass instrument in F using harmonics Nos. 4-13 (written c' to a'' and apparently sounding a fifth lower). Whether it was a horn or a deep trumpet is hardly possible to say. The same uncertainty must be admitted in respect of Bach's Cantata No. 118 (c. 1737), which has parts for two litui. These are also natural instruments and employ the same range of harmonics plus a high b'', but here they are pitched in B♭, sounding a tone lower than written. Certainly the 1706 inventory of the Bohemian monastery of Osseg (printed in Z.M.W., IV) includes "Litui vulgo Waldhörner duo ex Tono G", suggesting G horns; but Kürzinger, in his 'Getreuer Unterricht' (Augsburg, 1763), says that Lituus can mean either a Trompette or a Waldhorn.

LITVINNE (Litvinova), Felia (b. St. Petersburg, 1861; d. Paris, 12 Oct. 1936).

Russian soprano singer. She was trained in Paris under Mme Barth-Banderoli and Victor Maurel. Her sister was the wife of Édouard de Reszke, and she married Dr. Emmanuel Depoux. After a promising début at the Théâtre des Italiens, Paris (1885), she joined Mapleson's American company and appeared at the Academy of Music, New York, in the following winter as Leonora in 'Trovatore', Arditì being the conductor. On her return she sang with success at St. Petersburg and Moscow; also at the Lamoureux concerts in Paris during a lengthy period of study entirely devoted, by the advice of the de Reszkes, to the mastery of the leading Wagnerian parts. In some of these — notably Isolde and Brünnhilde — she created a good impression in France, her fine voice and excellent declamation earning warm praise. She sang meanwhile under Cortot at the Château d'Eau in 1902, and afterwards at the Opéra-Comique and the Gaîté. Later on she appeared with Jean de Reszke in 'Tristan' and 'Siegfried' at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, and in 1899 made a successful début at Covent Garden as Isolde. She took part in subsequent seasons there up to 1901.

LIVERATI, Giovanni (b. Bologna, 27 Mar. 1772; d. ? Florence, ?).

Italian tenor singer and composer. He studied in his native town with Stanislao Mattei (composition) and Lorenzo Gibelli (singing) and started upon his musical career as a tenor singer in Spain (c. 1792). In 1796 he was a member of the Italian buffo company performing at Potsdam, and in the beginning of the new century we find him travelling all over Europe, producing a comic opera, 'La prova mancata' (also called 'Il maestro di musica' or '... di cappella') in the Rhineland (1801), Stockholm (1803), Trieste (1804), Paris (1808) and elsewhere. In 1809 he was in Prague, with a new opera called 'Enca in Cartagine', and then for a few years in Vienna, where his oratorio 'David' was sung in Lent 1811 and a ballet, 'Der Kranke aus Liebe', performed at the Kärntnertheater in Feb. 1812.

He left Vienna towards the end of 1814 and went to London to succeed Puccita as composer and conductor at the King's Theatre; there he wrote and produced two operas, 'I selvaggi' (27 June 1815) and 'Gastone e Bajardo' (lib. by Stefano Vestris, 26 Feb. 1820), and two cantatas, 'Il trionfo di Cesare sopra i Galli' (in honour of Wellington and Waterloo, 6 July 1815) and 'Il trionfo di Albione e di Roma'; the latter was privately performed in 1817 to celebrate the return of art treasures to Italy which had been looted by the French — a tribute by London's Italian colony to the British Government.

Liverati was presumably still in London in 1829 when the opera 'The Nymph of the Grotto', which he wrote jointly with G. A. Lee, was produced at Covent Garden, and it seems that he was still alive in 1844, when his 'David' was revived at the church of San Giovanni Evangelista there; in the libretto of that performance he is called a member of the Accademia Filarmonica di Bologna and professor of the Accademia di Belle Arti of Florence. The scores of 'La prova mancata', 'David' and 'I selvaggi' are preserved in the Istituto Musicale, Florence (the first two also in the library of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, Vienna), and numerous extracts from his operas as well as several collections of Italian airs, duets and trios were published in Vienna and London. He was one of the many composers — Beethoven among them — of Mollo's well-known collection of 63 settings of 'In questa tomba oscura' (1808). A. I.

LIVERMORE, Ann (Lapraik) (born Mason) (b. London, ?).

English singer and musicologist. Being precociously gifted, she began to have music lessons at the age of three, and at four she played in public at the recitations of her mother, an actress in Frank Benson's company. A Busoni pupil named Schwabe taught her when she was nine, and she played nothing but Bach for the next three years, having already become a keen student of Handel. She then left school owing to lack of family funds and played the pianoforte at girls' schools for the folk-dance classes. Later, unknown to her parents, she played at a cinema, where she attracted attention by her performances of music made familiar by the Russian Ballet. At the age of fifteen she managed to establish a teaching-connection and earned enough to enable her to go to Spain for further study under Ignacio Tabuyo at the Madrid Conservatory and later with Conchita Badia at Barcelona. She had further lessons from Vera Janacopoulos in Paris for one year and from Walter Ford and Carrie Tubb in London.

In Spain she made a point of making special studies of the music of various regions, spending six months in Montanesa, six months in Madrid, six months in Andalusia and a year in Catalonia and Valencia. After her marriage she lived much in Spain and Portugal, her husband being a scholar in Spanish and Portuguese attached to the Foreign Office. Her special knowledge was turned to good account in two ways: she introduced Spanish music, both folksong from various regions and works by Spanish composers, to English audiences, including many new songs and arias from little-known 17th- and 18th-century Spanish and Portuguese operas; and she wrote numerous studies of Spanish, Portuguese and Latin-American music for English and foreign journals. A literary essay of special importance was that in which she developed her theory (see Bibl.) that the masque in Shakespeare's 'Tempest' is derived from Gil Vicente's play 'O triunfo do inverno e verão', which also contains a very similar storm scene; and that the plot as a whole alludes to Philip II's usurpation of Portugal. LIVERPOOL. The foundations of Liverpool's musical life were laid in the early part of the 19th century. Previously, we read of musical festivals being held in 1784 and 1790, and an institution, the Apollo Glee Club, founded in 1796, survived down to the close of the 19th century. The Liverpool Musical Society (choral) and the Cecilian Orchestral Society combined at intervals to hold festivals, and in 1836 there emerged the Festival Choral Society, which began an independent existence in 1839.

ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.—The Liverpool Philharmonic Society, founded in 1840, began in a small way in the Lascelles Rooms, but its progress was so rapid that the directors made plans to build their own concert-hall, which was opened in 1849 and was generally accounted a masterpiece. It was burnt down in 1933, and the present hall, one of the best-equipped in Great Britain, replaced it in 1939.

The far-seeing policy of the Philharmonic Society enabled it to survive the vicissitudes of a century, and its choral and orchestral concerts, with the latter gradually assuming a preponderating place, attracted most of the great singers and executants of the 19th century. Up to the outbreak of the second world war it gave some dozen concerts annually with an orchestra made up of Liverpool and Manchester players under guest-conductors, but in 1940 Sir (then Dr.) Malcolm Sargent was appointed conductor-in-chief and three years later the orchestra was placed on a full-time basis. At the same time the hall was acquired by the Liverpool Corporation, part of the purchase price consisting of a perpetual annuity of £4000, and this was later increased by further grants of £4000 annually, the free use of the hall and certain other contributions for educational concerts being added. In 1949 Hugo Rignold became the resident conductor, and two years later his appointment was renewed and the constitution amended to allow a greater proportion of representatives of the City Council, which continued to interest itself in the Society's affairs, notwithstanding the heavy deficits which had been incurred. The Arts Council has also made annual grants.

During the 1930s popular orchestral music was sustained by the Merseyside Symphony Orchestra (conductor, Louis Cohen) but this was later absorbed by the Philharmonic when the latter was put on a permanent footing. Mr. Cohen also founded the Merseyside Chamber Orchestra.

CHORAL MUSIC.—Apart from the Philharmonic concerts, choral music is chiefly represented by the Welsh Choral Union, formed in 1901. Its conductors have been Harry Evans and Dr. Hopkin Evans. More recently the concerts have been conducted by Sir Malcolm Sargent (occasionally by the chorus-master, Dr. Caleb Jarvis) and assisted by the Philharmonic Orchestra. Though inclining to the traditional oratorio, the repertory has been broadened to include a number of significant modern works.

CHAMBER MUSIC.—This is chiefly cultivated by the Rodewald Society, founded in 1911 to perpetuate the memory of Alfred Rodewald, a wealthy musical amateur who for many years ran an orchestral society in the city. It gives half a dozen concerts during the season and has made a feature of engaging none but the finest quartets of the day, with the result more recently that its appeal has been considerably widened and it is now almost self-supporting, with an Arts Council guarantee. After the 1914-18 war the British Music Society enjoyed a firm standing at Liverpool, but it was later absorbed by the Rodewald Society and its policy and influence lapsed.

The Liverpool Music Guild for some years before the war maintained similar ideals, but with the avowed aim of employing mainly local artists. In the matter of recitals and solo concerts, celebrity concerts tended to go out of fashion with the vast increase of interest in orchestral music, but the tradition of the Mossel Concerts has been carried on by the Rushworth Concerts Committee, and visiting celebrities provide occasional displays.

ORGAN MUSIC.—Public provision of organ recitals dates from 1854, when the fine Willis instrument was opened at St. George's Hall. In the following year W. T. Best was appointed city organist, a post he held till 1894. Subsequent organists were A. L. Peace (1894-1912) and Herbert F. Ellingford (1912-43). The organ and hall were seriously damaged during the air-raids of 1941, and on Ellingford's retirement the post was not filled. The great organ at Liverpool Cathedral is another example of the Willis tradition and is extensively used for recitals. The organist since 1917 has been Harry Goss Custard.

EDUCATION.—The James W. Alsop Music Fund made provision for an annual course of public lectures at the University from 1925 onwards, and a distinguished series of lecturers including Gustav Holst, E. H. Fellowes, Sir Donald Tovey and others, occupied the post down to 1945, when Professor E. J. Dent was the last lecturer. Two years later a professorship was instituted and awarded to Gerald E. H. Abraham. Other activities at the University include weekly recitals and concerts by the Music Society. Liverpool still lacks an official school of music, though the nucleus of a fund exists, but musical training is well served by the Liverpool Matthay School, which offers an all-round education in music. Much work has been done in the schools, and as far back as 1923 the firm of Rushworth & Dreaper was instrumental in promoting orchestral concerts for school children. This task has since been taken over by the Education authority. Amateur orchestral music is cultivated in the evening institutes, and more recently the formation of a youth orchestra and choir has been undertaken.

LATER FESTIVALS.—Since 1874 no large-scale festivals appear to have been held at Liverpool (apart from the occasional isolated holding of a Welsh National Eisteddfod) until the Festival of Britain, 1951. In this an ambitious effort was made to give the event a representative national and local colour. It included a three weeks' season of opera (Covent Garden, the English Opera Group), of ballet by the principal Sadler's Wells company, of orchestral concerts by the London and Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestras, the Royal Philharmonic and the Hallé, with Sir Thomas Beecham, Leopold Stokowski, Sir Adrian Boult, Sir John Barbiroli, Sir Malcolm Sargent and Hugo Rignold as conductors, and a series of chamber concerts and choral performances. A number of new works were commissioned for first performance, including the second Symphony by Racine Fricker and concertos by Benjamin Frankel, Douglas Miller and T. B. Pitfield.

Liverpool has two principal competition festivals (apart from many smaller events of the kind in the districts). They are the Rushworth Festival of Music and Verse (which, however, awards only certificates of merit and is therefore strictly non-competitive) and the Liverpool Competitive Musical Festival. These, since the second world war, have vastly increased in numbers of entrants and in scope.

LIBRARY FACILITIES.—As far back as 1859 the Liverpool Public Library formed the nucleus of a collection of standard musical works. In 1930 the musical resources, scattered in various branches, were centralized and a music-room was set apart for the use of students. By 1933 the catalogue contained entries reaching the number of 12,500, and this continued to increase. But in 1941 the library was largely destroyed by enemy action, though some of the more valuable collected editions had been evacuated. This collection is now in process of being re-equipped. At the University the formation of a musical library on a comprehensive scale has been one of the foremost aims of the Professor of Music.

LLEWELLYN, Ernest Victor (b. Kurri Kurri, N.S.W., 21 June 1915).

Australian violinist. He began to study the violin at the age of seven. When he was thirteen Szigeti, who heard him, prophesied a brilliant future for him. Having become orchestral leader for the Australian tours of Georg Szell and Malcolm Sargent, he appeared as soloist at orchestral concerts conducted by Sargent, Szell, Schneevogt, Ormandy, Goossens and Braithwaite, and has given first Australian performances of concertos by Bax, Prokofiev and Walton. He served in the R.A.F. in 1942-44 and afterwards became leader and director of the Queensland State String Quartet.

LLEWELLYN, Redvers (b. South Wales, 4 Dec. 1903).

Welsh baritone singer. He received his musical education at Cardiff, London and Milan. He began his operatic career with the Carl Rosa Opera Company, but in 1934 was engaged as one of the principal baritones at Sadler's Wells. His voice is a high baritone admirably suited to the parts written for that voice in Verdi's operas, and his chief successes have been in 'Rigoletto', 'Il Trovatore' (Count di Luna) and 'Don Carlos' (Rodrigo di Posa). He has also given admirable performances as Escamillo in 'Carmen' and as

John the Butcher in Vaughan Williams's 'Hugh the Drover'. To his qualities as a singer Llewellyn adds exceptional ability as an actor and a good stage presence.

LLOYD, Charles Harford (b. Thornbury, Gloucestershire, 16 Oct. 1849; d. Slough, 16 Oct. 1919).

English organist and composer. The son of Edmund Lloyd, a solicitor, he was educated at Thornbury Grammar School and Rossall School. From the latter he went to Magdalen Hall (now Hertford College), Oxford, in Oct. 1868 as the holder of an open classical scholarship. He graduated B.Mus. 1871, B.A. 1872, M.A. 1875, taking a second class in the final Theological School, but it was not till 1892 that he proceeded to the degree of D.Mus. While an undergraduate he was instrumental in establishing the Oxford University Musical Club and was elected its first president.

Lloyd was appointed organist of Gloucester Cathedral in June 1876 as successor to S. S. Wesley, and the appointment was backed by the personal recommendation of Wesley, who had been greatly impressed by Lloyd's powers of improvisation. In this capacity he conducted the festivals of the Three Choirs in 1877 and 1880. In Sept. 1882 he succeeded Corfe as organist of Christ Church Cathedral, Oxford, and in the same year became conductor of the Oxford Choral Society in succession to Walter Parratt. From 1887 to 1892 he taught organ and composition at the R.C.M. In 1892 he succeeded Barnby as precentor and musical instructor of Eton College. On his retirement from that post he became (1914) organist of the Chapel Royal, St. James's. In 1902 he was placed on the Council of the R.C.M. He was at various times examiner in music to the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge and London, and was president of the R.C.O. A memorial window to Lloyd was placed in Gloucester Cathedral, and a scholarship for a chorister to continue his musical training after leaving the choir was founded there.

As a composer Lloyd was more than a writer of ephemeral works for festival performances. He left something of permanent value in two directions: Anglican church music and short works for unaccompanied choirs in the madrigal and partsong styles. While these show the influence of Wesley and Parry, and he may be described as a lesser light in the school of which they were the masters, an individual touch appears here and there. There is a poetic subtlety in his 'To Morning' (8 voices), dedicated to the Leeds Philharmonic, which is spontaneous, not derived, and the lyrical handling of the voices in 'Mark when she smiles' (Spencer) makes it an example of the English partsong at its best. The following are Lloyd's chief works:

INCIDENTAL MUSIC

'Alcestis' (Euripides) for men's chorus, flutes, clarinets & harp (1887).

CHURCH MUSIC

Cathedral Service, E♭ ma.
Evening Services, D ma., A ma. & F ma.
Parochial Evening Service, G ma.
Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis, F ma., for solo voices, chorus & orch. (Gloucester Festival, 1880).
Anthem 'Art thou weary?' for unaccomp. 8-part chorus.
Anthem 'Blessed is he' with orch. (Gloucester Festival, 1883).
Anthem 'Fear not, O land'.
Anthem 'Give the Lord the honour'.
'A Hymn of Thanksgiving' (Hereford Festival, 1897).
Motet 'The Souls of the righteous' (Gloucester Festival, 1901).

CHORAL WORKS

Cantata 'Hero and Leander' for solo voices, chorus & orch. (Worcester Festival, 1884).
Cantata 'Song of Balder' for soprano, chorus & orch. (Hereford Festival, 1885).
Cantata 'Andromeda' for solo voices, chorus & orch. (Gloucester Festival, 1886).
'The Longbeards' Saga' for male voices & orch. (1887).
Cantata 'A Song of Judgment' (Hereford Festival, 1891).
Cantata 'Sir Ogie and Lady Elsie' (Hereford Festival, 1894).
'The Leaver's Harvest' for women's voices.
5-part madrigal 'When at Corinna's eves'.
Partsong 'To Morning' (William Blake) for 8-part chorus.
Partsong 'Allen-a-Dale' with orch.
Partsong 'Twelve by the clock' for women's voices.
Numerous other partsongs.

ORGAN AND ORCHESTRA

Concerto, F mi. (Gloucester Festival, 1893).

CLARINET AND PIANOFORTE

'Duo concertante.'

ORGAN SOLO

Sonata, D mi.
Also several songs, &c.

LLOYD, David (George) (b. ?, 6 Apr. 1912).

British singer. He was educated privately and studied music at the G.S.M. in London, where he won the Knill Challenge Cup, the Sam Heilbut major scholarship and the Gold Medal. He has sung in opera at Glyndebourne where he made an immediate impression as Macduff in Verdi's Macbeth, and at many Promenade Concerts in London. He took part in Verdi's Requiem in Copenhagen, sang in opera at Brussels and has appeared at all the great festivals and concerts of the choral societies in the British Isles, including the National Eisteddfod concerts, the Hallé Society concerts and at Manchester, Huddersfield, Edinburgh and elsewhere. He has also made a number of recordings, and has broadcast many song recitals.

M. K. W.

LLOYD, David (John) de (b. Skewen, Glamorgan, 30 Apr. 1883; d. Aberystwyth, 20 Aug. 1948).

Welsh musical scholar and composer. After a general education at the Aberystwyth County School he studied music, first at the University College of Wales, Aberystwyth, where he graduated B.A. (1903) and B.Mus. (1905); later at the Leipzig Conservatory (1906-7). He graduated Mus. Doc. (Dublin) in 1915. For eight years (1911-19) he taught at the County School at Llanelly, where he became organist and conductor of the local choral society. Then, joining the staff of the University College of Wales, Aberystwyth, he became lecturer in music (1919-26) and subsequently, in succession to Sir Walford Davies, Gregynog Professor of Music (1926-48).

David de Lloyd's published works, traditional in inclination, are all vocal in some form. They reveal him as deeply interested in the musical setting of words, especially Welsh words. Of particular interest are his 'Chwech o Englynion ar Gân', settings of six songs on Welsh poems in the metre known as englyn, for voice and pianoforte. The englyn is a four-line stanza whose irregular rhythms and cross-consonance are musically very suggestive. In addition to this cycle, the composer leaves two operas, three works for mixed chorus, a folk-song cycle for chorus and orchestra, a Welsh hymnal, some minor choral works (unpublished) and over 400 arrangements of traditional Welsh tunes, for one or two voices and pianoforte. De Lloyd's works have been frequently performed at the National Eisteddfod and elsewhere, and show a musical sensitivity and technical accomplishment which ensure for them a lasting worth.

LLOYD, Edward (b. London, 7 Mar. 1845; d. Worthing, 31 Mar. 1927).

English tenor singer. The son of Richard Lloyd (b. 12 Mar. 1813; d. 28 June 1853), chorister and later assistant lay vicar of Westminster Abbey and assistant vicar-choral of St. Paul's Cathedral, and Louisa (born Hopkins), he received his early musical education in the choir of Westminster Abbey under James Turle. His was a curious instance of a voice which never "broke", but deepened gradually from treble to tenor. In 1866 he obtained the appointment of tenor singer in the chapels of Trinity and King's Colleges, Cambridge, which he resigned in 1867 in order to return to London and join the choir of St. Andrew's, Wells Street, under Barnby; he retained this post on being appointed a Gentleman of the Chapel Royal in 1869, a place he held about two years. Subsequently he devoted himself entirely to concert singing.

Lloyd made his first great success at the Gloucester Festival of 1871 in Bach's St. Matthew Passion and in 1874 won universal admiration by his singing of "Love in her eyes sits playing" in 'Acis and Galatea' at the Handel Festival in the Crystal Palace. In a very short time he reached a position of great importance as a concert singer. He was associated with the production of many important works in the concert-room.² The title-part in Elgar's 'Dream of Gerontius' was the last of importance studied by Lloyd before his retirement from the profession, while still at the top of his powers, in 1900. He emerged from his retirement to sing a solo in the anthem at King George V's coronation (1911), and again to sing at a Mansion House concert for the benefit of Belgian war refugees (3 Feb. 1915).

Lloyd's exceptional value as a festival tenor was perhaps not fully realized until his retirement, for not one of his successors had a voice equal to his in range and beauty, or so comprehensive a talent. In looking back on his career of about thirty years as a leading tenor, mention should be made of his unvarying success in singing Wagner's music in the concert-room.

W. H. H., abr.

LLOYD, George (b. St. Ives, 28 June 1913).

English composer. He began his musical career with the intention of becoming a violinist and worked for four years with Albert Sammons; but he soon began to study composition with Harry Farjeon. To complete his musical education in London he went for a year to the T.C.L., where he worked under Ludwig Lebell at ensemble-playing, orchestration and kindred studies. His first Symphony was performed at Penzance in 1932 and his first opera, 'Iernin', was produced there on 6 Nov. 1934; for he was not only born in Cornwall and spent a great part of his early life there, but the libretto, by his father, was based on a Cornish legend which deals with the "Nine Maidens" of a local stone circle. William Lloyd also provided the libretto for his second opera, 'The Serf', produced in London, at Covent Garden, on 20 Oct. 1938, under Albert Coates, who had seen 'Iernin' at its London production at the Lyceum Theatre on 19 June 1935 and expressed his interest in the composer's next essay. In 1933 two more symphonies followed the first, both being performed for the first time in 1935, No.

2 by the Eastbourne Municipal Orchestra and No. 3 by the B.B.C.

On the outbreak of the second world war in 1939 Lloyd joined the Fire Service, and soon afterwards he volunteered for the Royal Marines, which in due course drafted him to H.M.S. Trinidad, for which he composed the official March in 1941. This was later scored for the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande and played at Geneva in 1946. Another performance abroad was that of the overture to 'The Serf', recast in 1946 and included in the programme of an Anglo-French Music Festival held at Marseilles in 1948. In the meantime he had seen service afloat in the Arctic on convoy duty. After several engagements his ship was sunk and he was severely injured. Invalided out in 1942, he was unable to do any kind of work for over three years. In 1945 he was well enough to leave for Switzerland, where he lived for the next two and a half years, resuming work at composition — the fourth Symphony — in 1946.

An introduction to the musical world through a channel so unusual for a British composer as an opera is accountable from the nature of Lloyd's talent, which finds in music-drama a form that it has no difficulty in filling. This natural aptitude for the stage is the more remarkable in that he had no direct connections with the theatre. His first three symphonies provide some negative evidence of the essentially dramatic character of his music. Certainly the third, which is contemporary with 'Iernin', is too loosely knit to make a satisfactory symphonic structure, but it shows just that lesser degree of concentration which is right for the more expansive forms of operatic music. Similarly the fact that he had not yet found a distinctive idiom of melody and harmony, in which all the "influences" that are an essential part of a young composer's growth could be fully absorbed, served to throw into relief his extraordinary grasp of the essentials of writing for the stage. 'The Serf', which substitutes history for legend to the detriment of the drama, marks a musical advance only in the very striking writing for the chorus — the crowd in the very powerful trial scene becomes for the moment a principal personage in the drama, as Mussorgsky's crowds do. To have shown such mastery of the broad essentials of writing for the stage in two large-scale operas raised great hopes for Lloyd's future. If the actual achievement in them was not decisive, it nevertheless suggested that some kind of post-Wagnerian English music-drama on the lines explored by Rutland Boughton is still possible.

LLOYD, John¹ (b. ?, c. 1480; d. London, 3 Apr. 1523).

Welsh ecclesiastic and composer. He is first heard of as a priest in the Chapel Royal in 1505, but when he settled in London is not known. On 18 Sept. 1506 he was appointed to the parish church of Munslow in the diocese of Hereford. He does not appear to have taken part in any of the major functions of the Chapel Royal during the next few years, but though he is not listed at the funeral of Henry VII in 1509, he did appear at that of Prince Henry in 1511, having in the meantime been created a Gentleman of the Chapel Royal. Hawkins quotes an obituary describing him as a Mus.B., but Flood (see Bibl.) says he failed to find his name in the registers of Oxford and Cambridge.² In 1518 he was in London, taking part in Wolsey's "Grand Mumming" at Durham House in the Strand on 3 Oct., and in June 1520 he was in France with Henry VIII and the Chapel Royal, taking a share in the ceremonies of the Field of the Cloth of Gold. Soon after, he made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land in fulfilment of a vow. According to Flood he must have returned to England after 25 Mar. 1523, since he found Cornyshe retired from the Mastership of the Children of the Chapel Royal and William Crane, who succeeded on that day, established in the post. If so, Lloyd must have died almost immediately after his return. The obituary already mentioned says he died in the Chapel. He is said to have written much church music, including masses and motets, but only two pieces in 3 parts remain in a vellum MS of the time of Henry VIII.³ It is said here that he "in armonia graduat".

Science 'Tripos' in 1899. He became H.M. Inspector of Schools (Secondary Schools branch) in 1905 and in 1917 Assistant Secretary to the Department of Scientific Research. From 1935 to 1943 he was Principal Assistant Secretary. He was created C.B. (Civil) in 1921. From 1946 to 1950 he was chairman of the Committee on Standard Pitch, British Standards Institution.

Lloyd has written numerous articles for scientific and musical journals on the physical aspects of music: sound, acoustics, intonation, temperaments, standard pitch, bells, etc., as well as new articles dealing with such matters for the present edition of this Dictionary, which have thus been brought into line with modern ideas and research. His books, 'Music and Sound' (Oxford, 1937), 'A Musical Slide-Rule' (Oxford, 1938) and 'The Musical Ear' (Oxford, 1940) all approach their subjects from the musician's point of view.

The great value of the work done by Lloyd as a physicist on behalf of music lies in the fact that, although a scientist by training, he is also a musician by inclination and education. For him, whenever he deals with a musical subject, art comes first and science takes a secondary place. That is to say, if a scientific explanation does not account for a musical phenomenon to his satisfaction, he concludes that scientific knowledge is incomplete. With the true scientist's instinct he mistrusts all would-be scientific assumptions until he has found them to stand up to the test of the music of great masters. His criticism of 19th-century scientists who dealt with musical matters does not spare the most eminent where he thinks them at fault, but does not apply, among others, to William Pole and Blaikley, nor, in particular, to Helmholtz, for whose work he has a great admiration, but who, he thinks, has been largely misinterpreted in England.¹

LLOYD, (Harry) Powell (b. London, 6 May 1900).

English tenor singer, actor and producer. He first studied music with Holst at Morley College in London and then became a student at the G.S.M. there. He was also a pupil for singing of Amy Martin and later of Herbert Oliver. He began his stage career as an actor at the Old Vic Theatre, playing small Shakespearean parts and often singing the songs in the plays, and also appeared with Sir Philip Ben Greet's company. Afterwards he played many parts in opera at the Old Vic and went over to the Sadler's Wells Theatre with the opera company, becoming principal character tenor there, also resident producer in 1941. He sang a great variety of character parts, including Monostatos in 'The Magic Flute', Basilio in 'Figaro', Bardolph in 'Falstaff', Goro in 'Butterfly', Spoletta in 'Tosca', Bobyl in 'Snow Maiden', Vašek in 'The Bartered Bride', etc.; and he was so successful in creating unforgettable characters that special experiments were occasionally made for the sake of casting him. Thus he appeared as the Witch in 'Hänsel and Gretel', turning a mezzo into a tenor part, and Bartolo in 'The Barber of Seville', attempting a bass part. Not gifted with a great voice, he has made his mark as an interpreter of unusual intelligence, a sense of comedy amounting to genius and a rare ability to inspire other artists to share his understanding and enthusiasm.

Lloyd appeared as an actor at the Malvern Festivals of 1932-33 and sang David in Beecham's performances of 'Meistersinger' at Covent Garden in 1934 and 1936. As a producer he did valuable work for the Scarborough Open Air Theatre in 1939 and 1945-1946, for the Carl Rosa Opera Company in 1946-47, for the Dublin Grand Opera Society in 1948 and for the Johannesburg Civic Opera Season in 1949. He has also broadcast and televised in many operatic studio performances and designed scenery and dresses for some thirty operas.

LOBACZEWSKA, Stefania (b. Lwów, 31 July 1894).

Polish musicologist. After completing her studies at the Lwów Conservatory, she pursued an academic course, obtaining the Mus.D. degree at Lwów University (Prof. Chybiński) in 1928. After leaving the University she began her pedagogic career, lecturing on the theory and appreciation of music at the Szymanowski School of Music at Lwów (1931-39), during the second world war at the State Conservatory there (1940-41), and then she moved to Cracow, becoming a teacher at the Cracow High School of Music, where she has been since 1945. She also acted as music critic to the 'Gazeta Lwowska' (1928-32) and after the war to 'Dziennik krakowski' ('Cracow Daily') (1947-50). She was a member of the committee of management of the Polish Musicians' Union (1947-49) and represented Poland during two conferences of composers and musicologists in Prague (1947-48). She has been awarded the Polish Prime Minister Prize called Nagroda Ziemi krakowskiej.

Stefania Łobaczewska has published over 30 books, essays and dissertations, covering the fields of the musical aesthetics, psychology and sociology, and studies on 20th-century music, including a large publication, 'The Outlines of Musical Aesthetics' (1937). Other works are 'The History of Musical Forms' (1950) and 'Karol Szymanowski: his Life

LOBE, Johann Christian (b. Weimar, 30 May 1797; d. Leipzig, 27 July 1881).

German flautist, writer on music and composer. He owed his musical instruction to the Duke of Weimar's consort, the Grand Duchess Maria Pavlovna. The flute was his instrument, and after performing a solo at the Gewandhaus, Leipzig, in 1811, he settled at his native place as second flute in the ducal orchestra.

Lobe wrote five operas ('Wittekind', 'Die Flibustier', 'Die Fürstin von Granada', 'Der rote Domino', 'König und Pächter', all performed at Weimar), besides overtures and two symphonies for orchestra, pianoforte quartets and other compositions. The most successful of the operas, written between 1821 and 1844, was 'Die Fürstin von Granada, oder Der Zauberblick', produced on 28 Sept. 1833.

It is as a littérateur, however, that Lobe is most interesting. He resigned his place at Weimar in 1842 and in 1846 undertook the editing of the 'Allgemeine Musikzeitung' of Leipzig, which post he retained until the termination of that periodical in 1848. In 1853 he began a publication called 'Fliegende Blätter für Musik', of which about twenty numbers were published; he then edited the musical department of the Leipzig 'Illustrierte Zeitung' and made endless contributions to other periodicals. His principal books, some of which appeared first in the periodicals, are:

- 'Musikalische Briefe . . . von einer Wohlbekannten', 2 vols. (Leipzig, 1852).
- 'Aus dem Leben eines Musikers' (ibid., 1859).
- Catechism of Composition, and another of music (both translated into English).
- 'Consonanzen und Dissonanzen' (ibid., 1869).
- 'Lehrbuch der musikalischen Composition', 4 vols. (ibid., 1850-67).

LOBO, Alfonso (b. Borja, c. 1555; d. ? Seville, ?).

Spanish composer.¹ He held an appointment in Lisbon. His name appears in the records of Toledo Cathedral as having been elected maestro de capilla in 1593, and he is described as having been assistant to the maestro at Seville. In 1602 he published a book of masses:

'Liber primus missarum Alfonsi Lobo de Borja Sanctae Ecclesiae Toletanae Hisp. Primatis Portionarij Musicesque Praefecti . . .' (Madrid, 1602). (Córdoba; Valencia, Patriarca.)

This was seen through the press by Victoria. In 1604 Lobo was succeeded at Toledo by Alonso de Texeda; he returned to Seville, and was in charge of the choir-school until 1610. The following works are known in manuscript:

- 'Lectio prima de Ieremia propheta . . . In officio Tenebrarum. Sabbati Sancti. Ildephonso Lupo, auctore' (Seville).
- 'Credo Romano ad organo grande' (Escorial; Seville). Passions (Toledo, MS 21).

- 'Vivo Ego dicit Dominus', a 5 (Escorial).

J. B. T.

LOBO, Duarte ("Eduardus Lupus") (b. Alcáçovas, [bapt. 19] Sept. 1565; d. Lisbon, 24 Sept. 1646).

Portuguese composer. A protégé of Cardinal Henrique, he studied at Évora under Manuel Mendes and later became choir-master there. Afterwards he moved to Lisbon, where he held an appointment at the Royal Hospital, being transferred to the Cathedral before 1594. Many of his works were printed by Plantin at Antwerp, and letters are preserved from the composer to the printer. Lobo was for many years considered the most accomplished Portuguese master of vocal polyphony and counterpoint of his time, yet after the revival, in more recent times, of a great deal of polyphony composed by other Lusitanian masters belonging to the same school, this judgment can no longer be maintained to the same extent. Lobo's music occasionally lacks spontaneity and depth of intense religious feeling, his part-writing sometimes fails to avoid a certain stiffness, the harmony is frequently dull. His style has been compared with that of Benevoli, but unjustly. Lobo never employed as many voices or as many different groups as Benevoli; his style has more in common with the later manner of Victoria (in the ed. of 1600), but is without Victoria's imagination.

LOCATELLI, Pietro (b. Bergamo, 3 Sept. 1695; d. Amsterdam, 30 Mar. 1764).

Italian violinist and composer. He was still very young when he became a pupil of Corelli in Rome. Very little is known of his life, but he appears to have travelled a good deal. He finally settled in Amsterdam, where he established regular public concerts.

There can be no doubt that Locatelli was a great and original virtuoso. Among his compositions we must distinguish between caprices and studies — which he evidently wrote merely for practice, to suit his exceptional powers of execution, and which have no musical value — and the sonatas and concertos, which contain very graceful and pathetic movements, and certainly prove him to have been an excellent musician. In these serious works he shows himself as a worthy disciple of his great master. All the more striking is the contrast when we look at his caprices and studies. Here his sole aim appears to have been to endeavour to enlarge at any price the powers of execution on the violin, and no doubt in this respect he succeeded only too well; for, not content with legitimately developing the natural resources of the instrument, he oversteps all reasonable limits and aims at effects which, being adverse to the very nature of the violin, are neither beautiful nor musical, but ludicrous and absurd. A striking example of this tendency of his is to be found in a caprice entitled 'Le Labyrinthe', where the following arpeggiando passages occur:

This savours strongly of charlatanism, and it is astonishing to find a direct pupil of Corelli one of the first to introduce such senseless feats of execution into the art of violin playing. Wsielewski not unjustly speaks of him as the great-grandfather of our modern "finger heroes" (Fingerhelden).

Locatelli published ten different works:

Op.

- 12 'Concerti grossi' (Amsterdam, 1721).
- Sonatas for flute (Amsterdam, 1732).
- 'L' arte del violino', containing 12 concerti grossi and 24 caprices (1733).
- 6 'Introduzioni teatrali' and 6 concertos (1735).
- 6 'Sonates en trio' (1737).
- 6 Sonatas for solo violin (1737).
- 6 'Concerti a quattro' (1741).
- Trios for 2 vns. & bass (1741).
- 'L' arte di nuova modulazione: caprices énigmatiques.'
- 'Contrasto armonico: concerti a quattro.'

Modern editions of some of his sonatas and caprices were issued by Witting, Alard, David and others.

LOCKE (Lock), Matthew (b. Exeter, c. 1630; d. London, Aug. 1677).

English composer. He was a chorister at Exeter Cathedral under Edward Gibbons in 1638-41, and afterwards, it has been supposed, he studied under William Wake.¹ In 1648 he visited the Low Countries, where he copied some motets by minor Italian composers of the day; and this visit undoubtedly had a substantial influence on his later style. At Wake's request, as he tells us, he composed in 1651² for that master's scholars the 'Little Consort of Three Parts' for viols or violins, but did not publish it until 1656. It was followed in 1652 by the ingenious and resourceful 'Duos for Two Bass Viols'.

Locke and Christopher Gibbons composed the music for Shirley's masque 'Cupid and Death', "represented at the Military Ground in Leicester Fields" before the Portuguese Ambassador on 26 Mar. 1653. Locke also wrote part of the music for Davenant's 'The Siege of Rhodes' in 1656, and sang in it himself; also probably for the same author's 'The History of St Francis Drake', "represented daily at the Cockpit in Drury-Lane at three in the afternoon punctually" (in the winter of 1658-59).

The next work we hear of is the music, composed "for y^e king's sagbutts and cornets", performed during the progress of Charles II from the Tower of London through the city to Whitehall on 22 Apr. 1661, the day before his coronation. This is thought to stand alone in English music of that period as far as this particular technique of writing for a team of brass instruments is concerned, and it gives a hint that the technique of Giovanni Gabrieli had penetrated as far as England. The Fitzwilliam Museum Library at Cambridge possesses five volumes of manuscripts of 'Five Partt tthings ffor the Cornetts', and this includes seven pieces by Locke (see Catalogue below). This may have some connection with the occasional music for the "King's Progress" through London, in recognition of which, it is said, he received the appointment of Composer in Ordinary to the King.

The register of St. Mary Woolchurch contains the following entry:

Marr^d Mch. 21. 1663-4.
Mr. Matthew Locke of Westminster gent.
& M^{rs}. Alice Smith of Annables, co.
Herford Spinster.

This had better be repeated here as a familiar fact stated in previous editions of this Dictionary and in many other places, but it can now be definitely stated that this was not the composer: there was another Matthew Locke, and in Aubrey's 'Lives' (II, 254) it is stated that one or the other of them married "Mr. Garnon's daughter, of Herefordshire". The man who married Alice Smith did not die until 1705, according to the Parish Register of Harpenden, Herts.

Locke wrote several anthems for the Chapel Royal, and on 1 Apr. 1666 he produced there a Kyrie and Credo, in which he departed from the ordinary usage by composing different music to each response. This occasioned some opposition on the part of the choir, in consequence of which he published his composition, with an angry preface, on a folio sheet, under the title of Modern Church Music; Pre-Accused, Censur'd, and Obstructed in its Performance before His Majesty, April 1, 1666, Vindicated by the Author, Matt. Lock, Composer in Ordinary to His Majesty.³

To this period may probably be assigned the production of 13 anthems for three and four voices, all contained in the same autograph manuscript, which Roger North describes as "Psalmes to musick in parts for the use of some vertuous ladies in the city". Soon afterwards, having, according to A. Wood's manuscript notes (Bodl. Lib.), become a convert to Rome, Locke was appointed organist to the queen.

He had in 1663 composed "the instrumental and vocal recitative music" for Sir Robert Stapylton's tragi-comedy 'The Step-Mother'. In 1674 Davenant's alteration of Shakespeare's 'Macbeth', with the songs and choruses from Middleton's 'The Witch' introduced, was produced at the theatre in Dorset Gardens; and Downes, the prompter, in his 'Roscius Anglicanus' (1708) expressly states that the vocal music was composed by Locke. The music then performed remained unpublished until about the middle of the 18th century, when it appeared under the editorial care of Boyce, with Locke's name as the composer, and as his it was long undisputedly accepted. But the music, as published by Boyce, contains little that seems to have anything in common with Locke's characteristic idiom. Downes's proved inaccuracy in some other things occasioned doubts of the correctness of his statement as to the authorship of the 'Macbeth' music, and eventually Locke's right to it was denied and its composition claimed by some for Purcell, but by others for Eccles and by others again for Leveridge. No positive proof, however, has been adduced in support of any one of these claims. There is a manuscript copy of this music in the Boston Public Library, U.S.A.

On 27 Feb. 1673 Shadwell's 'Psyche' was produced at Dorset Gardens with music by Locke (with the exception of the act tunes, which were by Draghi), which he published in the same year under the title of 'The English Opera', together with his instrumental music for Shadwell's version of Shakespeare's 'The Tempest', produced by the same theatre on 30 Apr. 1674. The latter work is prefaced by some observations written with his usual asperity but valuable as an exposition of his views of the proper form for opera. The varied songs and dances of 'Psyche' show Locke combining the lessons learnt from the example of the French stage with the traditions of the English masque as he had helped to develop it in 'Cupid and Death'. Locke's personal enterprise is nowhere more strongly shown than in a "Curtain tune" of 'The Tempest', which in its directly descriptive features may be regarded as one of the earliest of the many storm fantasies of programme music.

In 1672 an extraordinary controversy was begun between Locke and Thomas Salmon, who had published 'An Essay to the Advancement of Musick by casting away the Perplexity of different Cliffs and writing all sorts of musick in one universal character'. Locke attacked this work in 'Observations upon a late book entitled An Essay . . .', written in a most acrimonious and abusive tone, to which Salmon replied in 'A Vindication' of his essay, and Locke in 1673 retorted in 'The Present Practice of Music vindicated. . . . To which is added Duellum Musicum, by John Phillips [Milton's nephew]. Together with a Letter from Mr. John Playford to Mr. T. Salmon in confutation of his Essay', which closed the dispute.²

Locke furnished the music for Elkanah Settle's tragedy 'The Empress of Morocco', first produced at Dorset Gardens in 1671. This consisted largely of a masque in Act IV which deals with the story of Orpheus in Hades.³ In 1673 he published a small treatise entitled Melothesia, or Certain General Rules for playing upon a Continued Bass, with a Choice Collection of Lessons for the Harpsichord or Organ of all sorts.

This was said to have been the first of the kind published in England.⁴

Locke is said to have been buried in the Savoy, but the fact cannot be verified, the existing registers extending no farther back than 1680. Purcell composed an elegy on his death, printed in 'Choice Ayres . . .', Book II, 1689. A portrait of him is in the Music School at Oxford.

Locke's compositions were numerous and various. He is important in musical history as the most eminent of the predecessors of Purcell in the composition of English stage music.⁵ His work is uneven in quality, yet often achieves a remarkable intensity of expression. Its permanent value was affected by the transitional nature of the age in which he lived, but his courage and skill in facing the problems of his time made him one of the strongest influences on English music of the Restoration period.

The R.C.M. possesses the autograph manuscript of a 'Consort of ffoure Parts' for viols, containing six suites, each consisting of a fantasy, courante, ayre and saraband, which Roger North (1728) tells us was "the last of the kind that hath been made". Autographs are in the library of King's College, Cambridge, the R.C.M. and the B.M. (Add. MSS 17,799, 17,801, 31,437). Locke's chamber music was an important part of his output. It may be mentioned for the sake of completeness that it was thought to include a 3-part 'Flatt Consort (for my cousin Kemble)' and a 'Broken Consort', but these have not been traced. In common with other composers of his time who enjoyed royal patronage, he composed a certain amount of music for state occasions — odes, welcome-songs, etc.

A complete thematic catalogue with historical accounts of, and some musical comments on, Locke's work, by Dr. Rosamond Harding of Cambridge, is awaiting publication (1954), and until the results of her research are known the catalogue appended to this article is necessarily incomplete. It is also for this reason that the doubtful dates given above for the production of 'Macbeth' have been allowed to stand. Edward J. Dent (cf. 'The Foundations of English Opera', p. 121) gives the date of the original production as 1663 and mentions a parody of 'Psyche' at the Dorset Gardens Theatre in 1674. Also, Locke's connection with the production of 'The Stepmother' has been repeated here for want of definite contradiction, but the details given above, both in respect of this and other productions, are open to speculation until Dr. Harding's work becomes available.

The Burnett-Morris Index (a card-index housed in the Exeter City Library) contains 108 references to Locke; titles of works, bibliography, details of correspondence in 'Notes & Queries', local journals, &c.

¹ Locke's authorship disputed; see article above, also E. J. Dent, 'Foundations of English Opera'. Pepys, who between 5 Nov. 1664 and 21 Dec. 1668 saw 'Macbeth' performed seven times, mentions (19 Apr. 1667) the "variety of dancing and musick" in it. This music has frequently been arranged for various combinations, e.g. as a "duet for harp and pianoforte (!) with accompaniment for the flute and violoncello [sic]" (by Burrows—London 1825), and also 'The Macbeth Quadrilles', including the favourite Isobel Waltz [sic] arr. for juvenile performers' (London; Mayhew & Co.).

LOCKENBURG, Johann von (b. ?; d. ?, c. 1591).

German composer. He was chamber-valet to the Duke of Bavaria about 1568 and organist at the Bavarian court at Munich from about 1558 to 1591. In 1574 he was mentioned as a member of the ducal chapel. He composed masses, madrigals and sacred songs.

LOCKEY, Charles (b. Thatcham nr. Newbury, 23 Mar. 1820; d. Hastings, 3 Dec. 1901).

English tenor singer. A son of Angel Lockey of Oxford, he was admitted a chorister of Magdalen College on 1 Apr. 1828, remaining so until 1836, when he went to Bath to study under Edward Harris. In 1842 he became a pupil of Sir George Smart and lay-clerk of St. George's Chapel, Windsor. In 1843 he was appointed vicar-choral of St. Paul's Cathedral in London. In 1846 he was engaged (as the youngest of four tenors) for the Birmingham Festival and allotted the air "Then shall the righteous" in the first performance of 'Elijah'. On hearing him rehearse the song Mendelssohn immediately requested him also to sing "If with all your hearts", which had before been assigned to another singer. "A young English tenor", says the composer¹, "sang the last air so very beautifully that I was obliged to collect myself to prevent my being overcome, and to enable me to beat time steadily." In Apr. 1848 Lockey was appointed a Gentleman of the Chapel Royal. He married on 24 May 1853 Miss Martha Williams, contralto singer, who died at Hastings on 28 Aug. 1897. In 1859 an affection of the throat deprived him of voice and compelled his retirement.

Lockman, John. See Bach (J. C., 38, Ode). Boyce ('David's Lamentation', orat.).

LOCKSPEISER, Edward (b. London, 21 May 1905).

English writer on music and composer. He studied in Paris under Alexandre Tansman in 1922-25 and Nadia Boulanger in 1926. In 1929-30 he attended the R.C.M. in London as a pupil of C. H. Kitson and Malcolm Sargent. In 1934 he founded the Toynbee Hall Orchestra, which he conducted for the next two years, and in 1936-38 he was London music critic to 'The Yorkshire Post'. From the latter year he has been London music correspondent of 'Musical America'. In 1942 he became Overseas Information and Research Assistant in the Music Department of the B.B.C., a post he retained until 1951. He was made an Officier d'Académie in 1948 for his services to French music, done in particular by his literary works, especially his book on Debussy ('Master Musicians' series, 1936, revised 1951) and his translation of 'A New History of Music' by Henry Prunières (1943), which in fact amounts to a special edition. He also contributed pamphlets on Berlioz (1940) and Bizet (1947) to Novello's 'Biographies of Great Musicians'. Other publications are contributions: 'Tchaikovsky the Man' to the Tchaikovsky volume in 'Music of the Masters' (1945) and 'Mixed Gallery' to 'British Music in Our Time' (1946).

Lockspeiser's compositions are all early and have remained few, and only one work has been published so far: 'Deux Mélodies' (poems by Comtesse de Noailles) (Paris, 1926). The manuscripts include a Concerto for pianoforte and wind instruments (1926), the overture 'Pescallo' (1927) and a string Quartet (1928).

LODER. English family of musicians.

(1) John David Loder (b. Bath, 1788²; d. London, 13 Feb. 1846), violinist and music publisher. He was a skilled player, and his 'General and Comprehensive Instruction-Book for the Violin' (1814), 'The Modern Art of Bowing' (1842) and 'Violin School' had a considerable reputation. He was a music publisher at 46 Milsom Street, Bath, and about 1820 issued an edition of songs by Handel, as well as many other more or less important publications. From 1826 to 1845 he was orchestral leader at the Three Choirs Festivals. In 1840 he became a professor at the R.A.M. in London and in 1845 he succeeded Cramer as leader of the Ancient Concerts.

(2) A. Loder (b. ? Bath, ?; d. Bath, ?), music seller, ? brother of the preceding. He was established at about the same period at 4 Orange Grove, Bath.

F. K.

(3) John Fawcett Loder (b. Bath, 1812; d. London, 16 Apr. 1853), violinist, ? nephew of the preceding, son of (1). He was an excellent player and able orchestral leader. He lived at Bath for many years and managed the concerts there. When Bath ceased to be a place of fashionable resort he removed to London and on the death of his father in 1846 succeeded him as leader at most of the best concerts and festivals.

(4) Edward Loder (b. Bath, 1813; d. London, 5 Apr. 1865), composer, brother of the preceding. In 1826 he was sent to Frankfurt o/M. to study music under Ferdinand Ries. He returned to England in 1828, but went back to Germany with the intention of qualifying for the medical profession. He soon changed his mind, however, and again placed himself under Ries. When he finally returned home he was commissioned by Samuel James Arnold to compose the music for 'Nourjahad', an old drama of his to which he had added songs, etc., to convert it into an opera for the opening of the new English Opera House (Lyceum Theatre). The work was produced there on 21 July 1834, but, notwithstanding general admiration for the music, proved unattractive owing to the poverty of the libretto. In 1835 Loder set Oxenford's 'Dice of Death'.

He next entered into an engagement with Dalmaine & Co., the music publishers, to furnish them with a new composition each week, in part performance of which he produced his 'Twelve Sacred Songs', dedicated to Sterndale Bennett. As it became necessary that some of the pieces produced under this arrangement should be heard in public, an opera entitled 'Francis I' was written to incorporate them and produced at Drury Lane Theatre in 1838. As might have been expected, so heterogeneous a compound met with little success, although one song, 'The old house at home', obtained a widespread popularity. 'The Foresters, or Twenty-Five Years Since' and 'The Deerstalkers' were brought out in 1845, and 'The Night Dancers', his finest work, to a libretto by George Soane, was produced at the Princess's Theatre on 28 Oct. 1846. It was revived there in 1850 and at Covent Garden Theatre in 1860, having in the meantime travelled as far afield as New York and Sydney (1847). 'Robin Goodfellow', a ballad opera, as well as additions to 'The Sultan' and 'The Young Guard' followed at the Princess's in 1848, and another opera, 'King Charles II' in 1849. His cantata 'The Island of Calypso' was written for the National Concerts at Her Majesty's Theatre in 1850, but, owing to their cessation, remained unperformed until given at the New Philharmonic Concerts in 1852. 'Raymond and Agnes', an opera, was produced at Manchester on 14 Aug. 1855.

Besides these works Loder wrote some string quartets and numerous songs, of which 'The Diver', 'The Brave Old Oak' and 'Invocation to the Deep' were well known. After his retirement a set of twelve songs, six sacred and six secular, was brought out by subscription. Among these, together with several remarkably fine lyrics, there is a setting of an English version of Wilhelm Müller's 'Wohin?' (immortalized by Schubert), called 'The Brooklet', which is among the most beautiful and effective songs in existence, quite worthy to stand beside Schubert's setting of the original words. His compositions are distinguished by the melodiousness of the parts and their skilful instrumentation.

Loder was for several years conductor at the Princess's Theatre, and afterwards at Manchester, but although musically well qualified for the office his want of regular, business-like habits militated greatly against his success. About 1856 he was attacked by cerebral disease, which long afflicted him and prevented his resuming his old avocations. Albums of collected songs were issued by Novello and Joseph Williams many years after his death.

(5) Kate (Fanny) Loder (b. Bath, 21 Aug. 1825; d. Headley, Surrey, 30 Aug. 1904), pianist and composer, cousin of the preceding. She was the daughter of George Loder, a brother of (1). Educated at the R.A.M. in London, where she gained a King's scholarship (1839), she became a distinguished pianist. She left the R.A.M. in 1844, in which year she played the adagio and rondo from Mendelssohn's G minor Concerto in the presence and to the satisfaction of the composer at Mrs. Anderson's concert at Her Majesty's Theatre. She was then appointed professor of harmony at the R.A.M. She first appeared for the Philharmonic Society on 15 Mar. 1847, when she played Weber's Concerto in E♭ major, and in 1848 (29 May) her performance there of Mendelssohn's G minor Concerto received the unprecedented distinction of an encore. In 1851 she was married to Mr. (afterwards Sir) Henry Thompson, the eminent surgeon. On 6 Mar. 1854, at the Philharmonic concert, she made her last public appearance. Among her compositions was an opera, 'L' elisir d'amore'.

About 1871 Kate Loder (then Lady Thompson) gradually became paralysed, but up to the end of her life she was a good friend to young artists of all kinds and a powerful influence on the art of her time, even after she had ceased to play. It was at her house, on 7 July 1871, that Brahms's Requiem was first performed in England, three years after it was written; she and Cipriani Potter played the accompaniments as a pianoforte duet.

LODIZHENSKY, Nikolay Nikolayevich (b. St. Petersburg, 1 Jan. 1843; d. Petrograd, 15 Feb. 1916).

Russian composer. Nothing is known of his student years. In 1866 or so he joined the Balakirev circle, and he practised composition for ten years or so, without giving up his diplomatic career in order to become a professional composer. He turned out songs, portions of an opera, 'Dimitri the Usurper', and of a cantata, 'The Russalka', and outlined several symphonies. Then he was sent to the Balkans, and afterwards to New York, where he was many years consul-general for Russia, and from that time on he composed no more.

Returning to Russia in 1907, Lodizhensky was engaged until his death in various official duties and took on a good deal of voluntary work. He was the founder of the Society for the Unification of the Orthodox and the Anglican Churches. Only one set of six songs of his was published (1873). These are not in the national Russian character, but testify to a great capacity for melodic and harmonic invention, and far-reaching poetic feeling. Another set of four, preserved in manuscript, is said to be equally beautiful.

Lodzihensky was for a time regarded as one of the most promising Russian composers of his generation. His early works won great praise from Rimsky-Korsakov and Stassov, but in other quarters were so severely criticized as to contribute to his discouragement.

LOEFFEL, Felix (b. Oberwangen, Canton Berne, 25 July 1892).

Swiss bass singer. He was originally a schoolmaster, but since 1921 he has been known as a concert and operatic singer. He studied at Berne, Prague, Munich and Milan, and ranks among the foremost living vocalists. In 1944 he was appointed professor of singing at the Conservatory of Berne.

Loeffel is uncommonly versatile, both on the concert platform and on the stage, and his deep bass is tuneful and seductive. Above all, however, it is the strength and range of his voice which fascinates his audiences, both in Switzerland and wherever the German tongue is spoken. He fulfils a special mission as exponent of the songs and song cycles by Othmar Schoeck ('Elegie', 'Lebendig begraben', 'Notturmo', 'Unter Sternen', etc.) and as a spokesman on behalf of present-day Swiss music (e.g. Willy Burkhard's 'Das Gesicht Jesaja', 'Das Jahr'). H. E., adds.

LOEFFLER, Charles Martin (Tornow) (b. Mulhouse, 30 Jan. 1861; d. Medfield, Mass., 19 May 1935).

American violinist and composer of Alsatian birth. He was the son of a specialist in agriculture and chemistry, Karl Loeffler (1821-84), who published some of his books under the name of Tornow. As a boy Loeffler was taken to Smela near Kiev, and later to Debreczin in Hungary, the former sojourn in particular exercising an important influence on the formation of his musical tastes and tendencies. In 1875, after two years spent in Switzerland, Loeffler set out to become a professional violinist, studying with Rappoldi and Joachim in Berlin and with Massart in Paris, while his teachers in harmony and composition were Kiel and Bargiel in the former and Guiraud in the latter city. After a season under Padeloup in Paris, two years in the private orchestra of Baron Paul von Derwies (originally van der Wies) at Nice and Lugano, and a second season with Padeloup, Loeffler went, in 1881, to New York. There he played under Leopold Damrosch and Theodore Thomas. A year later he became a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and from 1885 to 1903 shared the first violin desk with Franz Kneisel. In this latter year he resigned, simultaneously with Kneisel, that he might devote himself more completely to composition, his orchestral and chamber pieces having already won him conspicuous recognition, and subsequently he appeared as violinist only semi-publicly. In May 1887 Loeffler became an American citizen, and after 1910 he made his permanent residence at Medfield, Mass., on his marriage to Elise Burnett Fay, who had managed his affairs ever since 1882.

As composer Loeffler defies precise classification. The strong feeling for line as well as for colour in his music renders somewhat inaccurate the grouping of him with the French impressionists. A bold and individual harmonist, he treated dissonances as the outcome of a free polyphony rather than arbitrarily as discord for its own sake. Loeffler cultivated the macabre, the mystical and the idyllic. Modal influences derived both from the music of the Russian liturgy and from plainsong play an important part in his style. While his music was never influenced by the country of his adoption, it variously reflects the idioms of Russia, Ireland and Spain. In an era of virtuoso orchestration his instrumentation commanded especial admiration. A fastidious workman and much given to self-criticism, Loeffler subjected many of his compositions to repeated and often sweeping revision. Of his orchestral pieces those most widely known are 'La Mort de Tintagiles', after Maeterlinck, and 'A Pagan Poem', after Virgil. His Russian-inspired 'Memories of my Childhood', awarded the prize of $1000 offered in connection with the 1923 Chicago North Shore Festival, came quickly into favour, but he never courted popularity or followed any fashion.

Loeffler was made an Officer of the French Académie in 1906 and a Chevalier of the Legion of Honour in 1919; in 1926 Yale University conferred the degree of Doctor of Music on him. w. s. s., add.

LOEILLET. Flemish family of musicians.

The biographies of its members have in some instances been confused. The confusion seems to have been initiated by Hawkins, who failed to recognize that "John Loeillet of London", whose activities he described at some length, was not a relation of "John Baptist Loeillet of Ghent", but the same person. Hawkins's error has been repeated in many works of reference. The career and works of Jacques Loeillet, again, have often been confused with those of Jean Baptiste. It was left to the late Dr. Paul Bergmans, antiquary and musicologist of Ghent, to throw light on the prevailing darkness and to show clearly that we are concerned not with three persons nor with one, but with two brothers, sons of Jean François Loeillet, maître chirurgien of Ghent, by a second marriage. These are the only two important members of the family, both composers, harpsichordists and skilled on more than one wind instrument; but two others may be mentioned as musicians.²

(1) Pierre Emmanuel Loeillet (b. ?; d. ?), uncle of (3) and (4). He was for more than thirty years directeur de concerts at Bordeaux.

(2) Pierre Loeillet (b. Ghent, ?; d. Ghent, ?), nephew of the preceding, elder half-brother of (3) and (4). He was a Schalmeyer and maître de danse in his native city.

(3) Jean Baptiste Loeillet (b. Ghent, 18 Nov. 1680; d. London, 19 July 1730), half-brother of the preceding. He attained great proficiency on the harpsichord, flute and oboe at an early age. Before going to London he is stated by Fétis to have spent some years in France. The evidence for this assertion is apparently found in the publication of some of his works by Roger of Amsterdam and in their dedication to important French patrons.³

² To the confusion above described variations in the spelling of the name have made their own contribution. L'Éillet, Lully, Lulli, Lullie and Lully are only some of them. The last-named variation, it need hardly be said, has led to not infrequent confusion with the more famous French master. The incorrect attribution of J. B. Loeillet's minuet in A to Lully was pointed out by Hawkins and more recently by L. de La Laurencie.

³ Only the first of the five works by Loeillet published by Roger can be dated as early as 1705.

By 1705 he was a member of the orchestra at the Queen's Theatre in the Haymarket (the first operatic orchestra in London) under the direction of William Corbett, where he was engaged as first oboe with La Tour as his partner. No flutes are shown in Heidegger's list of personnel, but no doubt the oboes would take the flute when required. Hawkins names Loeillet among the "masters of the harpsichord" with Pepusch and Dieupart. The latter were paid thirty shillings per night, at least double the wage of the other instrumentalists.

On the reconstitution of the orchestra in 1710 Loeillet retired and found more lucrative employment as a fashionable music teacher. His weekly concerts given at his house in Hart Street were in the words of Hawkins "chiefly frequented by gentlemen performers who gratified him very handsomely for his assistance in conducting them". There, according to the same authority, the concertos of Corelli were performed for the first time in England. Henry Needler, a well-known amateur, was the soloist.

Loeillet appears to have held aloof from the main currents of musical life. That the profits from his teaching and concerts were considerable — Hawkins assessed them at £16,000 — is shown by the handsome legacies not only of money but of plate and musical instruments (harpsichords, violins, "fflutes of all kinds and bass violins") he bequeathed to his numerous relatives. He died apparently unmarried at his house in East Street near Red Lion Square, "an excellent master of musick, much regretted by all that were acquainted with him".

It has been stated that Loeillet introduced the German or transverse flute to England. The accuracy of this statement may be questioned, but no doubt his accomplished playing did much to popularize it and to weaken the hold of the recorder or common flute on the affections of the public. For more than a century after his death the transverse flute was the favourite instrument of musical dilettanti. He was a prolific composer for the flute and like Handel wrote for both varieties. A list of his more important works is given below.¹

Loeillet was not a genius. He had, however, talent of a high order, with a noticeable gift for melody. His writing for harpsichord shows distinct traces of Italian influence and his not infrequent use of ornamentation points to a knowledge of the French school. His slow movements in particular have much charm and grace. His flute and oboe music is well adapted to its purpose and well deserving of the revival it is now enjoying after two centuries of neglect. Generally speaking the recorder music is more difficult technically than that for the transverse flute.

(4) Jacques Loeillet (b. Ghent, 7 July 1685; d. Versailles, 28 Nov. 1746), brother of the preceding. He entered the service of the Elector Max Emanuel of Bavaria as an oboist, playing in the court orchestra first in Brussels, subsequently at Munich. In Aug. 1727 he gave a remarkable concert at Versailles², where his virtuosity on flute, recorder, oboe, bassoon and violin, and in particular his powers of musical mimicry, so diverted the queen that he was induced to enter the service of Louis XV with a brevet "de hautbois de la chambre du Roi et écurie de Sa Majesté".

² Details of the concert are given in the 'Mercure de France', Aug. 1727, quoted by M. Brenet in 'Les Concerts sous l'ancien régime', pp. 171-73.

At first he may have divided his time between Munich and Versailles, since the will of Jean Baptiste Loeillet (3), dated 1 May 1729, refers to "my brother Jaco at Munick in Bavaria".

Of his compositions 'Twelve Sonatas, six for two flutes, six for solo flute and figured bass' were published by Boivin of Paris in 1728.

LOESCHHORN, Albert (b. Berlin, 27 June 1819; d. Berlin, 4 June 1905).

German pianist and composer. He was a pupil of Ludwig Berger. He studied subsequently at the Royal Institute for Church Music in Berlin, where from 1851 he was teacher of the pianoforte. The title of Royal Professor was conferred upon him in 1858. For many years he carried on concerts of chamber music in Berlin with eminent success. He served the advancement of classical music by his conscientious and thorough discipline as a teacher; many of his pupils distinguished themselves.

Loeschhorn became most widely known through his numerous studies for the pianoforte, although he published a long list of other worthy compositions, such as quartets and sonatas.

C. E.

LOEVENSOHN, Marix (b. Courtrai, 31 Mar. 1880; d. Montauban, France, 24 Apr. 1943).

Belgian violoncellist. He studied at the Royal Conservatoire at Brussels, where in 1894 he won the first prize for cello playing with the highest distinction. He made his first appearance as a soloist in public at a Nikisch concert in London at Queen's Hall in July 1894, after which he went on tour with Paderewski, Leschetizky, Adelina Patti and other famous artists. Afterwards he was cellist in quartets led by César Thomson, Wilhelmj and Ysaÿe. In 1907 he settled in Berlin as teacher at the Stern and Klindworth-Scharwenka conservatories, and in 1910 organized a series of "Loevensohn Concerts" at which modern chamber music was the chief ingredient of the programmes. In 1912 he was attached to the Hochschule für Musik. On the outbreak of war in 1914 he joined the Belgian army, but a year later accepted the position of cello soloist with the Concertgebouw Orchestra at Amsterdam. Here again he indulged his passion for chamber music, joining the Concertgebouw String Quartet and in 1919 forming, with Louis Zimmerman and Jaap Spaanderman, the Concertgebouw Piano Trio. Appointments in 1920 as professor at the Brussels Conservatory and in 1927 at the Rotterdam Music School did not prevent his continuing these activities, but shortly afterwards his health gave way and he retired.

LOEWE. See also LÖWE.

LOEWE, (Johann) Carl (Gottfried) (b. Loebejuen nr. Halle, 30 Nov. 1796; d. Kiel, 20 Apr. 1869).

German composer, organist and conductor. He was the twelfth and youngest child of a cantor and schoolmaster. Near his home were collieries employing 300 miners, and this underground world, so near in his boyish fancy to the world of gnomes and sprites, took powerful hold on his imagination, to reappear later when he was composing 'Der Bergmann' ('The Miner'). His father taught him music early, and, his singing having attracted attention, he was offered in 1807 a place in the court chapel choir of Cöthen. There he remained two years and went thence to the Gymnasium of the Franke Institution of Halle. Türk, the head of this, was conductor of the town choral society, and at the twelve annual concerts produced much good music, although he had some curious notions.¹ Niemeyer, chancellor of the Gymnasium, was proud of the choristers and made them sing to distinguished visitors, among others to Mme de Staël, who made Loewe a present, and to King Jérôme, who at Türk's instigation gave him an annuity of 300 thaler.

This enabled him to devote himself entirely to music. He had already become a pianist by studying Bach's 'Well-tempered Clavier', and he now took daily lessons from Türk, and worked hard at the treatises of Kirnberger, Marpurg and Forkel. He also learned French and Italian. Two of his songs of this date were 'Klothar' (Op. 1) and 'Das Gebet des Herrn und die Einsetzungsworte des Abendmahls' (Op. 2).² Meantime the war of 1812-13 broke out, and Loewe left a graphic account of its horrors in his autobiography. Türk died in 1813, and the flight of King Jérôme (26 Oct. 1813) deprived Loewe of his income, but by the aid of Niemeyer he entered the University of Halle as a theological student under Michaelis. Naue, Türk's successor, founded a Singakademie like that of Zelter in Berlin. Loewe joined this and thus became acquainted with his future wife, Julie von Jacob, a very gifted person, whom he married on 7 Sept. 1821.

In 1818 he had composed his first ballads, 'Edward' (in the translation from Herder's 'Stimmen der Völker') and 'Erlkönig' (Goethe's poem which Schubert had set only 3 years earlier and did not publish until 3 years later). These were followed in 1824 (after his wife's death) by 'Der Wirtin Töchterlein', which, with Marx's help, were printed. In 1819 and 1820 he paid visits to

² He afterwards printed three ballads by Herder and Goethe as Op. 1.

Dresden, Weimar and Jena, making the acquaintance of Weber, Goethe and Hummel. In 1820 he was invited to Stettin, and having passed with credit through various tests, such as a musical exercise submitted to Zelter, and a trial sermon, was duly installed professor at the Gymnasium and Seminary, and cantor. In 1821 he became musical director to the municipality and organist of St. Jacobus. He made a considerable mark both as a conductor and professor¹ at Stettin and throughout Pomerania. In 1837 he was elected member of the Academy of Berlin. He was a favourite with both Frederick William III and IV, the latter being especially fond of his ballads. He travelled much and was present at the musical festivals of Düsseldorf (1837) and Mainz (the Gutenberg Commemoration), visiting Hamburg, Lübeck and Bremen on the way. In 1844 he went to Vienna and in 1847 to London. The Duchess of Coburg had specially recommended him to the prince consort and Queen Adelaide; he sang and played at court, the prince turning over his music. There he heard Jenny Lind for the first time. He left not the least trace of his presence behind him. In 1851 he went to Sweden and Norway, and in 1857 to France. In 1864 he had a singular illness — a trance of six weeks' duration, and in 1866 the authorities of Stettin asked him to resign. After this mortification — somewhat atoned for by the king's bestowal of a higher grade of the Order of the Red Eagle than he had held before — he left Stettin for Kiel, where he quietly expired after another trance. His heart was buried near his organ in St. Jacobus church at Stettin.

Loewe was an industrious composer. He wrote five operas, of which one only was performed — 'Die drei Wünsche' (Berlin, Court Theatre, 1834). Mantius was the tenor; Spontini took unusual pains; the opera was a great success, and the crown prince presented the composer with a gold medal. The list of his oratorios includes:

'Die Festzeiten'; 'Die Zerstörung Jerusalems' (1829); 'Die sieben Schläfer' (1833); 'Die eiserne Schlange' (1834); 'Die Apostel von Philippi' (1835, for voices only); 'Gutenberg' (1836); 'Palestrina' (1841); 'Huss' (1842); 'Hiob'; 'Der Meister von Avis'; 'Das Sühnopfer des neuen Bundes'; 'Das hohe Lied Salomonis' and 'Polus Atella' (all between 1848 and 1860); 'Die Heilung des Blindgeborenen' (1861); 'Johannes der Täufer' (1862); 'Die Auferweckung des Lazarus' (1863).

The last has an organ accompaniment, but the two that precede it, like 'Die Apostel von Philippi', were for voices only, without accompaniment, a type of composition of which he was especially fond. His second wife and pupil, Auguste Lange of Königsberg, sang in his oratorios with himself.

He published 145 works with opus numbers, symphonies, concertos, duets and other pieces for pianoforte, but above all ballads, in which he specially excelled, and in which he may be considered as the successor of Zumsteeg. His complete songs were ultimately published in a series of 17 volumes. They continue to be sung in Germany, though in unsophisticated family circles rather than in public. Their melodic simplicity and squareness are akin to the artless tunes by minor composers which are misguidedly regarded as folksongs in German-speaking countries, and their naïve but apt and effective descriptiveness passes for a certain dramatic power. But they are greatly superior to what used to be known as "ballads" in England, and quite different from these: truly narrative songs of a kind Loewe may be said to represent most consistently though not with the greatest power of inspiration, in German music. Loewe was the author of a 'Gesanglehre' (Stettin, 1826; 3rd ed. 1834), and of 'Musikalischer Gottesdienst, Anweisung zum Kirchengesang und Orgelspiel' (1851, four editions). The University of Greifswald conferred a doctor's degree on him.

Loewe's songs in the collected edition number 368, and they include settings of words by the following poets: Alexis (6), Anacreon (3), Arndt (1), Burns (1), Byron (24), Chamisso (1), Chénizy (2), Claudius (2), Fontane (2), Freiligrath (9), Gellert (1), Goethe (32 misc. poems: 5 from 'Faust', 1 from 'Wilhelm Meister', 1 from 'Erste Walpurgisnacht'), Gruppe (2), Heine (2), Herder (7), Hoffmann von Fallersleben (1), Hus (1), Jacopone da Todi (2), Kind (1), Klopstock (1), Kopisch (3), Körner (2), Mary, Queen of Scots (1), Percy (1), Platen (1), Raupach (4), Reinick (1), Reissig (1), Rückert (11), Schiller (2), Schreiber (2), Seidl (1), Shakespeare (1 from 'Hamlet', 1 from 'Othello', 1 from 'Twelfth Night'), Tegnér (1), Uhland (15), Voss (1).

LOEWE, (Johanna) Sophie (b. Oldenburg, 24 Mar. 1816; d. Pest, 28 Nov. 1866).

German soprano singer. She was the granddaughter of Friedrich August Leopold Loewe (who died in 1816 as director of the Lübeck theatre) and daughter of Ferdinand Loewe, an actor. She accompanied her father to Mannheim, Frankfurt o/M. and Vienna, where he was engaged at the Burg Theatre, through the influence of his sister, Julie Loewe, a celebrated actress. There Sophie studied singing under Ciccimara and other good masters. Her début as a concert singer was so successful that she was at once engaged for the Court Opera and first appeared on the stage in 1832 in a German version of Donizetti's 'Otto mesi in due ore'.

Towards the close of 1836 Sophie Loewe went to Berlin, where she created a furore as Isabella in Meyerbeer's 'Robert le Diable' and was at once engaged at a high salary, appearing as Amina in Bellini's 'Sonnambula' on 28 Apr. 1837. In 1838 she was appointed chamber singer to the king, but she soon resigned and travelled to London, Paris and Italy. In London she appeared at Covent Garden on 13 May 1841 in Bellini's 'Straniera', but her success was only temporary.¹ She never returned to England. She failed to obtain an engagement in Paris, and in 1845 sang again in Berlin, but, coming just after Jenny Lind, was only moderately received. In 1848 she married Prince Lichtenstein and retired.

Her niece and namesake, Sophie Loewe (b. 1848; d. 1926), a soprano, daughter of the producer at the Stuttgart Court Theatre and pupil of Stockhausen, made her first appearance in London in 1871 and sang at the concerts for several seasons with success, till her marriage with W. von Glehn in 1877.

LOEWENBERG, Alfred (b. Berlin, 14 May 1902; d. London, 29 Dec. 1949).

British musical bibliographer, lexicographer and historian of German birth. He studied at the Universities of Berlin and Jena, taking a Ph.D. degree at the latter in 1925. He at first intended to make his career as lecturer in philosophy, but took a lively interest in the cultivation of opera, then at its height in Berlin and, while attending every operatic performance to which he could gain access, began to accumulate notes of a vast array of data of operatic history, patiently assembling details of titles, composers, librettists, places and dates of production, and of subsequent performances all over the world, of every opera ever written about which he was able to obtain information.

Loewenberg had not completed his compilation, much less been able to make any of it accessible to the German public in print, when the Nazi rule drove him into exile in 1935. He settled in London, where new sources were opened to him at the British Museum, which he visited daily for a number of years until he had gathered as much material as he could lay hands on, and this formed the basis of an invaluable publication which appeared at Cambridge in 1943 under the title of 'Annals of Opera: 1597-1940' and contains, in chronological order, full details of something between 3000 and 4000 operas selected from his much more copious manuscript lists, in such a way that no work of any importance or interest was omitted. 'Annals of Opera' is a monument of painstaking research, convenient arrangement and editorial skill, intended to appear in a second edition, corrected and brought up to date — a plan apparently frustrated by his premature death, but later realized under the editorship of Frank Walker.

Loewenberg became a naturalized British subject in 1947.

As an assiduous contributor to various musical and other periodicals he did further valuable research work, mainly connected with opera and often bringing to light new information on particular works. He wrote a number of new articles for this Dictionary and furnished endless corrections and additional information as well as most of the new tabulated catalogues of operas by composers of various periods and countries. He was also keenly interested in and knowledgeable on the history of the English theatre and compiled a 'Bibliography of British Provincial Theatres' which had not been completed at the time of his death. He further worked, at an office placed at his disposal by the British Museum, as editor of the 'British Union Catalogue of Periodicals'.

LOEWENSTERN, Matthaeus (Apelles) (b. Neustadt, Upper Silesia, 20 Apr. 1594; d. Bernstadt, 16 Apr. 1648).

German poet and composer. He was the son of a saddler of the name of Loewe and is said to have studied at the University of Frankfurt o/O., but devoted himself chiefly to music. He was for a while schoolmaster and cantor at Neustadt and Leobschütz. The troubles of the Thirty Years' War obliged him to seek a home elsewhere.

He settled at Bernstadt near Breslau, where he was appointed Secretary and Privy Councillor to the Duke of Oels-Bernstadt and was also director of the church music. About the same time he was raised to noble rank by the Emperor Ferdinand II and took the name of Loewenstern. His chief published work is a book of thirty geistliche Lieder, for 2-4 voices, entitled 'Frühlings-Mayen' (the words also by him). The first dated edition is 1644. Some of these hymns and tunes were received into the various Choralbücher up to modern times, of which the best-known are 'Christe du Beistand deiner Kreuzgemeinde' and 'Mein Augen schliess ich jetzt'. Loewenstern also composed the choruses for Andreas Tscherning's enlarged version of Martin Opitz's tragedy 'Judith', for three voices with continuo, which were published at Rostock in 1646. There remain in manuscript a number of Latin and German motets for 4-8 voices and sacred concertos in the style of Viadana with instrumental accompaniment.

LOFTHOUSE, Charles Thornton (b. York, 12 Oct. 1895).

English musical educationist, conductor and harpsichordist. He was a chorister of St. Paul's Cathedral in London (1904-10) and then studied music at the Royal (Manchester) College of Music, where he took his Associate diploma in pianoforte playing. His career was interrupted by the war of 1914-18, during which he served in France as an officer of the Manchester Regiment and was twice wounded. After the war he entered the R.C.M. in London in order to study the organ under Sir Walter Parratt and conducting under (Sir) Adrian Boult. Subsequently he went to Paris for a pianoforte course with Alfred Cortot at the École Normale de Musique. He took his degrees of Bachelor (1930) and Doctor of Music (1935) at Trinity College, Dublin.

Lofthouse's teaching-career began at the R.C.M. in 1922 and he gained the appointment of Director of Music at Westminster School in 1924. To these he has added several posts in connection with the University of London, including that of conductor to the University Musical Society (1934) which he created. In these capacities he has stimulated the musical activities of schoolboys and undergraduates, encouraging them to give aspiring performances of the classics, especially Bach, and of the English choral composers, notably Vaughan Williams. As accompanist to the Bach Choir since 1921 Lofthouse has developed the art of realizing the thorough-bass on pianoforte or harpsichord in a manner distinctively his own, yet in keeping with the best traditions of the style.

LOGIER, Johann Bernhard (b. Cassel, 9 Feb. 1777; d. Dublin, 27 July 1846).

German pianist, pianoforte teacher and composer. His father and grandfather, descendants of a French refugee family, were organists at Kaiserlautern. He received his early musical education from his father. After the death of his parents, and when about ten years old, he went to England and studied the flute and pianoforte. He then joined the band of a regiment commanded by the Marquis of Abercorn, of which Willman, father of the celebrated clarinet player, was master, and with which he went to Ireland. In 1796 he married Willman's daughter and engaged in composing for and instructing military bands and teaching the pianoforte. At the close of the war, his regiment being disbanded, he became organist at Westport, Ireland, holding the post till 1807, when he was appointed bandmaster of the Kilkenny Militia. He settled in Dublin in 1809 and opened a music shop at 27 Lower Sackville Street, in July 1811, where he continued in business until 1817.

Logier invented the "Chiroplast"¹, the merits of which were widely debated. It was a mechanism for training the hands for pianoforte playing. A system of pianoforte teaching based on its use included the plan of making several pupils, to the number of twelve or more, play at the same time on as many pianofortes. To this end he wrote a number of studies which were published in his 'First Companion to the Royal Chiroplast', and other works in which several studies of varying degrees of difficulty were capable of being played simultaneously. He gave his first musical lecture on 23 Nov. 1814.

In 1821 the Prussian government inquired into the merits of the system, and the result was that Logier was invited to Berlin to superintend the promulgation of it in Prussia. He remained there three years, being allowed an annual vacation of three months to visit England. In 1826, having acquired a competency by the sale of his Chiroplast and elementary works, his very numerous classes, and the fees received for permission given to others to use his invention and teach on his system, he retired and settled in Dublin. He reopened a music shop at 46 Upper Sackville Street about 1829, where he continued until 1841. In 1842-44 we find him at 28 Westmorland Street as a professor of music, and in 1845-46 at 45 St. Stephen's Green. His 'Thorough-Bass' was the first musical textbook used by Wagner in 1828.

Logier composed some sonatas and other pieces, besides making numerous arrangements for the pianoforte. He also composed an Ode on the beginning of the fiftieth year of the reign of George III, 25 Oct. 1809, performed in Dublin. Besides the publications connected with his Chiroplast, he was the author of 'A Complete Introduction to the Keyed Bugle'. W. H. H., rev. W. C. S.

LOGROSCINO (Lo Groscino), (Bonifacio) Nicola (b. Bitonto, [bapt. 22] Oct. 1698; d. prob. Palermo, ?).

Italian composer. He went to Naples, together with a younger brother, in June 1714 and entered the Conservatorio di Santa Maria di Loreto. The first and second masters there at that time were Gaetano Veneziano and Giuliano Perugino; after the former's death in July 1716 the latter became first master, his own place being taken by Giovanni Veneziano, son of Gaetano. In 1720 Perugino was succeeded by Francesco Mancini. These men were Logroscino's teachers, and not Durante, as was held for so long. The Logroscino brothers remained in the Conservatory until 1727, when they were both expelled "per alcune loro male qualità". The fact that Nicola stayed there until he was nearly twenty-nine years of age suggests that he was employed as maestrino, to assist in teaching the younger pupils. The precise nature of the vices for which he was expelled is not known, but that he was regarded as a thoroughly undesirable character is clear, for his brother Pietro was readmitted after a few months on the express condition that he had in future nothing whatever to do with Nicola.

From May 1728 until June 1731 Logroscino was organist to the Archbishop of Conza (Avellino). In Nov. 1731 he married a Neapolitan girl, and it is probable that the beginning of his career as composer of Neapolitan comic operas dates from about this time. No librettos or scores of his earlier operas have been preserved. The first of his works for which a date can be given is 'Quinto Fabio', an opera seria, produced in Rome at the Teatro delle Dame during the Carnival season of 1738. Later in the same year he contributed a single aria to 'Demetrio', by Leo and others, produced at the Teatro San Carlo, Naples, and in the autumn his own comic opera 'Inganno per inganno' was well received at the Teatro dei Fiorentini. A suggestion that he should be commissioned to write for the San Carlo theatre came to nothing, but the documents relative to this tell us that besides 'Inganno per inganno' he had already achieved a number of successes with comic operas for the smaller theatres of the city. They perhaps included 'La fante furba', 'Tanto bene che male' and 'Il vecchio marito', for which no dates of performances can be given. After 1738 there are abundant records of a long series of mostly comic operas given at the Neapolitan Teatro dei Fiorentini, Teatro Nuovo and Teatro della Pace, which were so successful that Logroscino was called "il dio dell' opera buffa". In 1743 an oratorio, 'La spedizione di Giosuè contro gli Amalachiti', was performed at Palermo; the libretto shows that Logroscino was at that time maestro di cappella at the Conservatorio dei Figliuoli Dispersi. He seems to have spent the rest of his life at Palermo, although his comic operas continued to be produced regularly at Naples. Many of his later works were written in collaboration with other composers. The last recorded opera by Logroscino is 'La gelosia', produced, exceptionally, far from the scenes of his earlier triumphs, at the Teatro San Samuele, Venice, in the autumn of 1765. F. W. (ii).

It has been stated that Logroscino would never compose except for words in Neapolitan dialect, and that he was the inventor of the concerted finale in several movements. Both statements are untrue, so far as can be gathered from his few remaining works. He wrote a certain amount of quite uninteresting church music and several serious operas, including 'Giunio Bruto' (score at Münster). His finales show no structural advance on those of Leo, but are distinctly superior to them in humorous treatment of voices and instruments. For genuine comic feeling Logroscino stands in the front rank of operatic composers.

LOHELIUS, Johannes (real name Franz Oehlschlägel) (b. Lahošt nr. Duchcov, Bohemia, 31 Dec. 1724; d. Prague, 22 Feb. 1788).

Bohemian composer. After studying philosophy and holding various posts as an organist in Prague, he became a friar of the Premonstratensian Abbey at Strahov (Prague) in 1747, where he was appointed choirmaster in 1756. He was an important Bohemian exponent of the early classicism in music, being a pupil of Habermann and Sehling. His compositions, altogether over 120, include chiefly masses, oratorios, cantatas, monastic operettas, etc. He was also an excellent organ builder. From 1765 to 1780 he worked on the reconstruction of the organ in the parochial church of Strahov, and this instrument became the best and the most beautiful of all the Prague organs for a long time. It had 3 manuals and a pedal, 50 stops, 3177 speaking and 48 decorative pipes. He gave a minute description of his work in 'Beschreibung der in der Pfarrkirche des Stifts Strahof befindlichen grossen Orgel . . .' (Prague, 1786).

LOHET, Simon (b. ?; d. ? Stuttgart, July 1611).

German organist and composer. He was appointed organist to the court of Württemberg at Stuttgart in 1571, and his name is mentioned up to 1611. Woltz in his Organ 'Tabulatur-Buch' of 1617 inserts twenty-four pieces by Lohet, with some commendatory words in memoriam.¹ Twenty of these pieces are called fugues, though they are not developed fugues in the modern sense, the subjects being very short and the answer coming in before the subject itself is completed. These "fugues" are followed by a canzona and two Choral-Bearbeitungen, one on the plainsong melody of the 'Media vita in morte sumus', with the melody in the bass throughout.

Ritter has high words of praise for Lohet's pieces and gives four specimens (Nos. 68-71 in his book), two "fugues", the canzona and the 'Media vita' piece. The first of these "fugues" has the familiar theme of the E major Fugue in the second part of Bach's 'Well-tempered Clavier'. Of the 'Media vita' piece Ritter says it alone would suffice to justify for Lohet a high place among the best masters of organ music. "In feeling so deep, in expression true and touching, it is a perfect piece from the old time, and therefore for all times." ¹

LÖHLEIN, Georg Simon (b. Neustadt o/Heide, Coburg, 1727; d. Danzig, 17 Dec. 1781).

German instrumentalist, teacher and composer. Caught on a journey to Copenhagen, in 1743, by a Prussian pressgang, he was, on account of his tall stature, placed in the famous Potsdam Guards. After being wounded at the battle of Collin he went to Jena in 1760, studied music and became Musikdirektor. In 1763 he went to Leipzig as violinist and pianoforte soloist in the concert orchestra and instituted a kind of conservatory. In 1779 he accepted an appointment as Konzertmeister at Danzig.

Löhlein's importance lay in his exceptional gifts as music teacher. His pianoforte Tutor (Part I, 1765, Part II, 1788) appeared in many editions, the latest revised and edited by Reichard (1797), A. E. Müller (1804) and Czerny (18—?); his violin Tutor (1774) appeared in at least seven editions, the later ones revised and edited by Reichard and A. E. Müller. His compositions, concertos, quartets, trios, duets, sonatas, etc., are of less importance.

LÖHNER, Johann (b. Nuremberg, 21 Dec. 1645; d. Nuremberg, 2 Apr. 1705).

German organist and composer. He was a pupil of Georg Kaspar Wecker at Nuremberg, and after some years' travelling he settled in his native town about 1670 as organist to various churches. He published several collections of sacred songs, such as 'Geistliche Sing-Stunde' (1670), 'Poetischer Andacht-Klang' (1673), 'Auserlesene Kirch- und Tafel-Music' (1682) and 'Suavissimae canonum musicalium delitiae' (1700). Löhner was the first representative of German opera at Nuremberg. His first dramatic work, 'Die triumphierende Treue', was produced at Ansbach in 1679; fragments of the music, under the title of 'Lisylla', are preserved there, while 12 airs, as 'Keusche Liebs- und Tugend Gedanken', were published at Nuremberg in 1680.

'Abraham' (1682), 'Der gerechte Zaleucus' (1687), 'Theseus' (1688), 'Die Eroberung Jericho' (1696) and finally 'Arminius' (1697) were all heard at Nuremberg (the last two being probably, but not certainly, works of his). 44 airs from 'Theseus' were published in 1688, the first instance of printed opera airs in southern Germany.

LOLLI, Antonio (b. Bergamo, c. 1730; d. Palermo, 10 Aug. 1802).

Italian violinist and composer. It is generally assumed that he was almost entirely self-taught. We know for certain that he was at Stuttgart in 1762 with Nardini. There he was attached to the court of the Duke of Württemberg till 1773, when he went to St. Petersburg, where he is said to have enjoyed the special favour of the Empress Catherine II. He remained in her service till 1778. In 1779 he went to Paris and played with great success at the Concert Spirituel. After this he went to Spain, and in 1785 we find him in London, where, however, according to Burney, he appeared but seldom in public. He continued to travel, and we read of his appearance now at Palermo, now in Copenhagen; then again in Paris, Vienna or Naples.

According to all contemporaneous testimony Lolli was an extraordinary performer, but an indifferent musician. Schubart, who had many opportunities of hearing both him and Nardini, speaks with unmeasured praise of Lolli's feats of execution, the wonderful ease and absolute certainty with which he played the most difficult double stops, octaves, tenths, double-shakes in thirds and sixths, harmonics, etc. As to his having been a bad musician, or rather no musician at all, the testimonies are equally unanimous. The Abbé Bertini plainly states that Lolli could not keep time, could not read even easy music and was unable to play an adagio properly. On one occasion, when asked to play an adagio, he said: "I am a native of Bergamo; we are all born fools at Bergamo—how should I play a serious piece?" When in England he almost broke down in a quartet by Haydn in which the Prince of Wales had asked him to play. If, with all these drawbacks as a musician, he nevertheless created an immense sensation wherever he played, we are all the more compelled to believe that his powers of execution were of the most exceptional kind.

Lolli is described as a handsome man, but a great dandy and charlatan, very extravagant, and a gambler. The Emperor Joseph II, himself a very fair musician, habitually called him "muddle-headed" (der Faselhans). Burney writes that:

owing to the eccentricity of his style of composition and execution, he was regarded as a madman by most of the audience. In his freaks nothing can be imagined so wild, difficult, grotesque and even ridiculous as his compositions and performance.¹

True, Burney adds:

I am convinced that in his lucid intervals he was in a serious style a very great, expressive and admirable performer, but it appears doubtful whether Burney ever heard him in a "lucid interval".

His compositions (concertos and sonatas for the violin), poor and insipid as they are, yet are said to have been his own productions in a limited sense only. We are assured that he wrote a violin part only, and that this was corrected, furnished with accompaniments and brought into shape by another hand.

LOMAKIN, Gabriel Joachimovich (b. ? 6 Apr. 1812; d. Gachina, 21 May 1885).

Russian singer. As a boy he sang in the celebrated choir of Count Sheremetev, of which he became choirmaster in 1830. He also taught singing in the court chapel (1848-1859) and the Theatrical School in St. Petersburg. His services were greatly in demand, and he held singing-classes in the most important educational establishments in St. Petersburg. In 1862 he joined Balakirev in founding the Free School of Music, in which he directed the choral classes until 1870. In 1874 he was compelled, on account of failing health, to retire from active life.

Lomakin arranged a great number of the old church tunes, national airs, etc. He exercised a considerable influence upon the musical life of his day.

LONATI, Carlo Ambrogio (b. Milan, c. 1655; d. ?).

Italian composer. His original name seems to have been Leinati.² His first known work is the opera 'Amor per destino' which was performed at Genoa, and this was followed by 'Ariberto e Flavio, regi de' Longobardi' (Venice, 1685)³ and by some other operas written for Genoa and Milan, in collaboration with other composers. The score of an oratorio, 'L'innocenza di Davide' (1686), is in the Biblioteca Estense, Modena, which also preserves cantatas, arias, a violin sonata, etc. Other works of Lonati's are extant in Rome, Naples, Dresden (12 violin sonatas, dated 1701) and London (a duet and a cantata in B.M.). Lonati was also an esteemed violinist and the first teacher of Francesco Geminiani.

LONDON.⁴ The history of London as a musical centre comprises a record of nearly every type of musical activity characteristic of English musical life as a whole. London is the home of a few ancient musical foundations, including an 11th-century choral grammar school (at St. Paul's Cathedral), and of the country's principal educational institutions, almost all of which date from modern times. It is the headquarters of opera and ballet companies, of several permanent orchestras and choirs, and of a large number of other musical organizations and societies whose ramifications spread throughout the kingdom. As the capital city, London has for centuries been the scene of ceremonial music-making, royal and civic, based on old traditions. Its cathedrals and other important churches maintain choirs that sing the ecclesiastical music of all styles and periods. The Chair of Music at the University of London was not founded until 1902, but the City of London has boasted a professorship in music since the year 1596, and the first recorded granting of a musical doctorate in London (Lambeth) was in 1677 to John Blow. Until recently London lacked any state-subsidized musical institutions such as operas or concert societies, but it possesses an almost continuous history of operatic and concert-giving ventures undertaken by private individuals or societies, sometimes under royal patronage, from early times until the present day. This history is marked by alternating periods of domination by foreign musicians and of determined exertions on behalf of native music, between which a fairly even balance has now been struck. Seasons of opera and ballet per-

² A score at Modena entitled 'I due germani rivali' is probably identical with this.

³ This article summarizes the musical history and the multifarious musical activities of London for the convenience of continuous reading. Further details will be found under a great number of headings throughout this Dictionary. To give cross references to them all would be distracting to the eye, and it is in any case superfluous, since articles on any subject of some musical importance will be expected in a work of reference such as this.

⁴ 'History', IV, 680; modern ed., II, 1020.

formed by native artists are securely established, regular series of concerts are given by native orchestral, choral and chamber-music organizations. Performances by visiting opera and ballet companies, orchestras, choirs, singers and instrumentalists from all over the world take place in London every year. Since 1899 there have been annual London Festivals of Music, except between 1906 and 1911 and during the war years of 1914-18 and 1939-45. The music performed on these occasions is mainly orchestral and choral, and is sometimes limited to the works of one composer. The distinctive type of choir festival peculiar to the provincial cathedral cities is substituted in London by performances of large-scale choral works by societies or special choirs, either in the cathedral churches or the larger concert-halls. During the Festival of Britain in 1951 musical performances of every conceivable kind took place daily for weeks on end.

The musical life of the capital has been greatly widened in scope during the last decade or so. The far keener interest in music shown by the general public, and the steps taken by civic and other authorities to meet the demand for increased facilities for hearing it have led to the launching of many new and far-reaching schemes in concert-giving of all kinds. The closing or destruction by bombing of some of the concert-halls during the second world war has necessitated the use, for large-scale musical events, of buildings such as theatres and stadia not originally designed for these purposes. Small-scale musical performances have overflowed into museums, art-galleries, City Companies' halls, public libraries, cinemas, churches, institutes and private houses all over London. Londoners can now hear some kind of organized music-making several times a day on every day of the week including Sundays throughout the greater part of the year. In addition to the types of performance already mentioned, there are sung services daily in the cathedral churches; midday and early evening organ recitals, lunch-hour concerts, band performances in the parks several times a week during the warm months; serenade concerts at historic buildings during the summer; promenade concerts in winter and especially in late summer, carol services and carol concerts during the Christmas season. Public interest in native folk music is stimulated by annual festivals in which representative teams of performers from foreign countries also take part. Members of the public are admitted without payment to some of the concerts and operatic performances given by the students of the principal music schools, and they can sometimes obtain permission to attend the rehearsals of orchestral and choral societies. Societies for the performance of music by amateurs have flourished intermittently since the 17th century, and many are now active in various parts of the capital. Musical amenities include music libraries, general and special, collections of musical instruments and free lectures on musical subjects given under the auspices of the University and other educational authorities. Sporadic music typical of London may be heard at any time of the day or night in the ringing of such peals of bells as remain after the destruction by bombing of many historic churches, in the band music of regiments marching through the streets and in the sounds of the nearly extinct street organ and of the few remaining "cries of London" which date from the 14th century.

The history of the Chapel Royal forms an integral part of the history of music in London. Its function is now limited to providing music for the services held at the Chapel Royal, St. James's Palace, and to singing with other choirs on special festive occasions at Westminster Abbey, St. Paul's Cathedral, etc. The choir school has been discontinued, but the children still wear the distinctive uniform which dates from the Tudor period. The former title of Master has been changed to that of Organist, Choirmaster and Composer.

Other long-established royal chapels in London, to the services of which the public is admitted, include the Royal Naval Chapel at Greenwich Hospital, the Royal Hospital, Chelsea, the Military Chapel at Chelsea Barracks and the Guards' Chapel at Wellington Barracks.

Owing to the large number of places of worship, the church music that can be heard in London is exceptionally varied in type and style. Moreover, some of the most accomplished of the church choirs give performances of sacred music apart from the regular services. For instance: at Southwark Cathedral, a series of Saturday afternoon performances of oratorio with choir and orchestra has been given for several years; at St. Michael's, Cornhill, a long succession of choral festivals by the St. Michael's Singers has included many works by Bach and by modern English composers; at the Temple Church (closed owing to bomb damage) a cantata was sung monthly at the Sunday afternoon service and the performance of large-scale works such as Bach's 'Christmas Oratorio', the Passions and the church cantatas took place regularly year by year. At St. Anne's, Soho (destroyed by bombing), Bach's Passion music was performed annually. New musical traditions are now being established at other churches: the Priory Church of St. Bartholomew the Great, Smithfield, All Souls', Langham Place, St. Thomas, Regent Street, St. Pancras Old Church, the Parish Church of St. Marylebone, etc.

The festival service of the Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy has been held annually at St. Paul's Cathedral since 1697, and another annual festival service, instituted in 1704 for the charity children of the London schools, also took place there from 1801 until 1897. The choir of Westminster Abbey carries out traditional duties in singing the music of the coronation service and of other royal celebrations; that of St. Paul's Cathedral, the music for services commemorating events of national importance. The choir of Westminster Cathedral, which specializes in unaccompanied singing, has a large repertory of the polyphonic music of the Roman liturgy.

HISTORY.—Among the earliest music-making in London of which any record still exists was that of the Chapel Royal, the religious establishment of the sovereign, comprising "Children" and "Gentlemen". Mention is made of this establishment as early as 1135, but no list of its members is preserved earlier than one dating from the reign of Henry V (1415–22), and the first Master of the Children whose appointment is recorded was John Plummer in 1444. Of the several buildings in London in which the choristers have sung religious services only the Chapel Royal at St. James's Palace, built in the reign of Henry VIII (1509–47), is still used by them. Three others, however, retain their distinctive appellation: the Queen's Chapel of the Savoy, the Chapel Royal at Hampton Court Palace and the Chapel Royal at H.M. Tower of London. In former times members of the Chapel Royal included many distinguished English composers. In addition to their ecclesiastical duties the members used to be actively associated with secular musical undertakings such as the composition and performance of odes on royal birthdays and New Year's Day, welcome-songs and music for the court masques and music-dramas during the Stuart and Restoration periods.

Organized bands of musicians in London dating from early times were the waits, who in the 13th century were watchmen appointed to guard the gates of the City. They were provided with reed instruments for signalling purposes. During the 15th and 16th centuries they were formed into bands of paid musicians and called upon to provide music for civic functions, an office they continued to hold until the 18th century. Among the traditional music they performed some is preserved in 17th- and 18th-century country dance books. One such tune is entitled 'London Waits'.

The King's Band of Music, which in the reign of Edward IV (1461–83) consisted of thirteen minstrels playing wind instruments, varied in numbers, and in the relative proportions of wind and string instruments, from its foundation until the 19th century, by which time it had reverted to being a wind band. During the reign of Queen Victoria it was reconstituted by the Prince Consort on the lines of a modern orchestra and was employed for state concerts until its discontinuance by Edward VII. Fanfares sounded by the state trumpeters are heard in London on all royal occasions such as proclamations and coronations. An early record of this custom is furnished by Archbishop Cranmer's account of the coronation of Edward VI in 1548, during which "my Lord Protector Duke of Somerset held the Crown in his hand a certain space and immediately after begun Te Deum with the Organs going and Quire singing and the Trumpets playing in the battlements of the Church . . .". In the 'London Gazette' of 1697 it is reported that "six city trumpet on horseback" accompanied William III on his public entry into London after the Peace of Ryswick.

London musicians early formed professional associations, the earliest known being a small guild of minstrels in the City, c. 1350. This was a forerunner of the Musicians' Company (now the Worshipful Company of Musicians), which is one of the City of London Guilds. It was first incorporated by an Act of Common Council in 1500, when it included the "King's Musicians" as well as the "City Minstrels". Up to this time control had been in the hands of the King's Musicians, but the Act of 1500, which differentiated between the two groups and excluded the King's Musicians from exercising jurisdiction in the City, was a cause of rivalry between the two bodies. The granting of a charter to the City Minstrels by James I in 1604 led to further strife. During the following reign, the King's Musicians, who had originally received a charter from Edward IV in 1469, protested against the charter of 1604, and having won their case, formed a new, separate corporation in Westminster with powers over musicians throughout almost the whole of England. It remained in being only until 1679, whereas the City company, whose position was secured by an Act of Common Council in 1700, has survived intact until the present day. It no longer exercises jurisdiction over musicians as in former times, but concentrates its activities upon the furthering of musical education, particularly by providing scholarships and prizes at the royal schools of music in London and elsewhere. Another musical institution which was established in London before modern times and which is still in existence is the Royal Society of Musicians, founded as a benevolent society in 1738.

Performances of opera in London, which began towards the end of the 17th century, had been preceded, first by music-making in the form of incidental music to the revels and plays of the Elizabethan age and then by performances of court masques, which generally took place in connection with royal festivities during the Stuart period and later, and were largely amateur entertainments. One of the earliest recorded performances of a masque is that of Ben Jonson's 'Masque of Blackness' at Whitehall in 1605, in which the consort of James I danced. The members of the four Inns of Court in London, who from the 14th century onwards had held revels in which singing and dancing were included, took an active part in the production of masques, upon which they spent large sums of money. In 1612 the Middle Temple and Lincoln's Inn gave a masque by Chapman at Whitehall, on which occasion John Dowland and his son Robert took part as musicians, and in 1613 the 'Maske of Flowers' was presented by the Gentlemen of Gray's Inn at the Banqueting Hall, Whitehall, when some of the music for the dancing was sung by boys' voices instead of being played on instruments. In 1633 the 'Masque of the Four Inns of Court', the 'Triumph of Peace' by James Shirley with music by Simon Ives and William Lawes, involving a large number of instruments, was given before the king and queen. Shirley's masque 'Cupid and Death' with music by Matthew Locke and Christopher Gibbons was "represented at the Military Ground in Leicester Fields" (Soho) before the Portuguese ambassador in 1653, three years before the first recorded semi-public operatic production in 1656 of Sir William Davenant's 'The First Day's Entertainment at Rutland House [Charterhouse Yard] by Declamation and Musick', with music by C. Coleman, H. Cooke, H. Lawes and G. Hudson. Even after performances of opera had been inaugurated in 1657 with 'The Siege of Rhodes', masques were still occasionally given at London theatres; for instance Blow's 'Venus and Adonis' during the 1680s, Arne's 'Dido and Aeneas' in 1733 at the Haymarket Theatre and his 'Comus' (1738) and 'Judgment of Paris' (1740), both at Drury Lane Theatre. The performances of Davenant's operas 'The Siege of Rhodes' (1657) and 'The Cruelty of the Spaniards in Peru' (1658) were followed by the production in 1667 of an adaptation of Shakespeare's 'Tempest' with vocal music by Pelham Humphrey and John Banister, and instrumental music by Matthew Locke. In 1673 Shadwell's 'Psyche', with vocal music by Locke and instrumental music by G. B. Draghi, was given at the Dorset Garden Theatre; in 1679 Charles Davenant's 'Circe' with music by J. Banister was performed at the Duke of York's Theatre, and about 1688 Purcell's 'Dido and Aeneas' was produced at a boarding-school for girls in Chelsea. The same composer's 'Fairy Queen', which was not strictly speaking an opera, but an adaptation of Shakespeare's 'Midsummer Night's Dream' to which Purcell wrote incidental music, was performed at the Dorset Garden Theatre in 1692. After Purcell's death in 1695

the history of opera in London for the next hundred years or so is largely concerned with performances of Italian operas, or of operas of any nationality sung in Italian.

In 1705 Jakob Greber's 'Gli amori d' Ergasto' was produced at Vanbrugh's new Queen's Theatre in the Haymarket, and in 1706 Thomas Clayton's 'Arsinoe', a pasticcio with an Italian libretto, was given in English at Drury Lane. Clayton's attempt in 1707 to produce a native opera using Addison's 'Rosamond' was a failure. Bononcini's 'Camilla' (1706) was the first complete Italian opera to be sung in London in English and 'Almahide' (poet and composer unknown) the first opera in London to be sung entirely in Italian. This was in 1710, in which year Handel arrived in London. The first of his operas to be performed there was 'Rinaldo' in 1711, whereafter he composed and produced a long series of operas, ending in 1741 with 'Deidamia'. Under the auspices of the "Royal Academy of Music", founded in 1719 by noble amateurs with the support of the king (George I), Italian opera, mostly by Handel and Bononcini, was given every year at the King's Theatre (Haymarket) until 1728, when the venture collapsed with a heavy deficit. Handel, however, continued to produce operas at the King's Theatre. In 1733 a rival "Opera of the Nobility" under the direction of Porpora was established at the Lincoln's Inn Fields Theatre, whither Handel later transferred his own operas when he was obliged to leave the King's Theatre in 1734. This theatre passed into the hands of the "Opera of the Nobility", and Handel pursued his operatic fortunes from 1734 to 1737 at the newly built Covent Garden Theatre (1732), which then became the scene of the performances of his oratorios. The first London performance of 'Messiah' took place there on 23 Mar. 1743, and the last that he conducted himself on 6 Apr. 1759, a few days before his death.

Serious Italian opera continued to flourish in London after Handel had turned from it in 1741 to the writing of oratorios. Operas by Gluck, Galuppi and Lampugnani were produced by their respective composers at the Haymarket Theatre during the 1760s, but from 1728, when 'The Beggar's Opera' by Gay, with popular songs arranged by Pepusch, was produced at the Lincoln's Inn Theatre, ballad opera formed a rival attraction for many years. Its popularity began to wane in the 1760s. In 1748 an Italian opera company had been brought to London, and after 1760 seasons of both comic and serious opera ran side by side. It was at about this time that the operatic ballets began to claim greater attention than the singing. Opera seria was declining, the castrato singer was being displaced and comic opera gaining ground. The King's Theatre was destroyed by fire in 1789. The Pantheon, which had been erected in Oxford Street in 1770-71 and was subsequently fitted up as a theatre and opened for performances of Italian opera in 1791, was burnt down in 1792, and Covent Garden in 1808.

The first performances in London of Mozart's operas began at the Haymarket with 'La clemenza di Tito' in 1806. 'Così fan tutte' and 'Die Zauberflöte' (in Italian) followed in 1811, 'Le nozze di Figaro' in 1812 and 'Don Giovanni' in 1817. 'Figaro' was also given in an English travesty by Bishop at the recently rebuilt Covent Garden Theatre in 1812. These performances were succeeded by the first productions of operas by Rossini which, with Mozart's operas, dominated the London operatic repertory during the 1820s. In the first decade of the 19th century, music for long ballets independent of operas was composed by Bishop, Steibelt, Woelfl and others, and performed in London. Seasons of German opera were given. Weber's 'Der Freischütz' was performed in three or four London theatres concurrently in 1824, and in 1826 he was invited to produce his 'Oberon' at Covent Garden, for which it was specially commissioned. In 1847 Covent Garden was reconstructed and opened as the "Royal Italian Opera", and it was run for some years in rivalry with Her Majesty's Theatre at the Haymarket. This was a period of famous singers and of many changes in the management of the opera-houses.

Native English opera, which had languished since Arne produced his setting of a translation of Metastasio's 'Artaserse' in 1762, began to show signs of fresh life from the 1830s onwards. Among the many operas then composed and performed in London only a few have survived: Balfe's 'Bohemian Girl' (1843), Wallace's 'Maritana' (1845) and Benedict's 'Lily of Killarney' (1862). In 1856 a "Royal English Opera" was formed by the partnership of two singers, Louisa Pyne and William Harrison, who gave performances of English operas, first at the English Opera House (Lyceum) and later at Drury Lane and Covent Garden until 1864. The oldest surviving operatic organization in Britain, the Carl Rosa Opera Company, which had been founded in 1869 for the production of opera in English, opened its first London season at the Princess's Theatre in 1875 with 'Figaro', and before the end of the century it had given performances of many important operas including 'The Flying Dutchman' in 1876, 'Rienzi' and 'Carmen' in 1879, 'Lohengrin' and 'Aida' in 1880, 'Otello' in 1895 and 'The Mastersingers' in 1896. In 1891 the title of the "Royal Italian Opera", which had been under the management of Augustus Harris from 1887, was changed to "Royal Opera", and performances were no longer given exclusively in Italian. German and French operas enjoyed the same status as Italian. Wagner's 'Ring' was first given as a whole in June 1892.

Two series of operatic enterprises of a popular type which date from the late 19th century and were carried over into the 20th were the "Savoy operas" by Gilbert and Sullivan produced at the Savoy Theatre from the 1880s, and opera in English at the "Old Vic." under the management successively of Emma Cons and Lilian Baylis. The first opera produced there was Balfe's 'Bohemian Girl' in 1900, and thenceforward the repertory was steadily built up to include operas by Mozart and Wagner. After Sadler's Wells Theatre was opened in 1931 to run on the same lines as the "Old Vic.", the opera company was transferred there and the "Old Vic." restricted its activities to the performance of dramatic works while Sadler's Wells became the permanent London home of both opera and ballet.

After the turn of the century London was the scene of many operatic undertakings which were carried on at several theatres as well as at Covent Garden: Drury Lane, the Shaftesbury, Aldwych, Lyceum, His Majesty's, and at the London Opera House (Kingsway) built by Oscar Hammerstein in 1911 but abandoned after one unsuccessful season and now a cinema. Among the opera companies that took part in these ventures are the Moody-Manners Opera Company (London seasons in 1902 and 1903) and the British National Opera Company (1922), both of which carried on their main work in the provinces. The Beecham Opera Company, whose first performance in London took place in 1909, absorbed the personnel of the Denhof Opera Company, originally founded in Edinburgh. At Covent Garden the Grand Opera Syndicate had been the lessees of the opera-house since Harris's death in 1896, and seasons of international or English opera were given almost every year except during the two wars. From 1944 to 1949 Covent Garden was under the control of Messrs. Boosey & Hawkes (music publishers), with the Covent Garden Opera Trust as tenants. In 1950 it passed into the control of the State, and productions were thenceforward regularly subsidized by grants from the Arts Council of Great Britain.

In addition to forming his own opera company, to inaugurating the Imperial League of Opera (1927) and to being associated with other London operatic ventures as impresario, artistic director and conductor, Sir Thomas Beecham was also instrumental in introducing London to the Russian Ballet in 1911 and in thereby reawakening interest in ballet, which had long been dormant in Great Britain. The artistic stimulus created by several London seasons of Diaghilev's Russian Ballet between 1911 and 1929 was responsible for the foundation of the Camargo Society (1930), the Vic.-Wells Ballet, the Ballet Rambert, the International Ballet and other companies formed later by English members of the Russian Ballet, the joint activities of which have culminated in a genuinely English ballet, in which an element of national style has been fostered by the English Folk Dance and Song Society active in London.

The singing of unaccompanied choral music was cultivated in London from the 16th century and earlier by groups of amateurs and professionals who met to sing together in private houses, coffee-rooms or taverns. One of the earliest records of organized secular choral singing refers to meetings held by "a great number of Gentlemen and Merchants" at the house of Nicholas Yonge in the parish of St. Michael's, Cornhill, to sing madrigals from the collection 'Musica transalpina' which Yonge compiled and published in 1588 and 1597. The Academy of Vocal Music, which was established in 1726 and met at the Crown and Anchor Tavern in the Strand, confined its interest to the singing of works composed not later than the end of the 16th century. The Madrigal Society, founded in 1741 by John Immyns, is one of the oldest existing vocal associations in London. It held its meetings at various taverns until 1919, when it met at Carpenters' Hall (London Wall). After the second world war the Tallow Chandler's Hall became its meeting-place. Later madrigal societies of varying sizes include the Magpie Minstrels, a small choir formed in 1885 and 1886 to sing choruses and glees at concerts given for charitable purposes, and subsequently enlarged to about two hundred singers and known as the Magpie Madrigal Society from 1896 until its dissolution in 1911; the Oriana Madrigal Society of about sixty voices founded by Charles Kennedy Scott in 1904; the English Singers, a group of six, whose first London concert took place in 1920; the A Cappella Singers, a group of fourteen formed in 1922 to sing madrigals and partsongs under chamber-music conditions; the Tudor Singers, a small choir founded by Cuthbert Bates in 1923; the Fleet Street Choir (1929) and the London Madrigal Group (1930), both founded by T. B. Lawrence; the Dorian Singers; and the Renaissance Singers, founded by Michael Howard in 1944 for the cultivation of music suitable for performance in church.

Clubs for the singing of catches and glees sprang up in 18th-century London, and glee-singing still exists as a specialized form of music-making. The Noblemen and Gentlemen's Catch Club (known familiarly as the Catch Club) was founded by members of the aristocracy in 1716 for the "encouragement of the composition and performance of canons, catches and glees", and met to sing at the Thatched House Tavern, St. James's Street. Throughout its history it has numbered among its professional members many distinguished musicians and by means of its prize competitions has stimulated the composition of an extensive literature of the type of music it exists to encourage. The Anacreontic Society, also of aristocratic foundation, was formed in 1766 and gave concerts at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, Strand, in which leading professional musicians took part as honorary members. The concerts, at one of which Haydn was present, were followed by a supper and by a programme of songs, catches and glees performed by eminent singers. This society was disbanded in 1794. The Glee Club, which began in 1783 with meetings at the house of Robert Smith in St. Paul's Churchyard, was formally established in 1787 and held meetings at taverns in the City until 1857. Another club of the same name, founded in 1793, met at the Garrick's Head Coffee House, Bow Street, Covent Garden. The Conceniores Sodales, most of whose members were composers of choral music, was founded in 1798 at the suggestion of William Horsley. It was in a sense a revival of an earlier association entitled the Society of Musical Graduates, which had been founded in 1790. The new club met for the first time at the Buffalo Tavern, Bloomsbury, and continued its meetings until 1812, when it was dissolved. On its re-establishment in 1817 membership was limited entirely to practising composers whose works formed the nucleus of the programmes. This society expired in 1824. The Melodists' Club (1825-56), established "for the promotion of ballad composition and melody", formed a library, offered prizes for songs, enrolled distinguished professional musicians among its members and gave concerts in which well-known performers took part. The City Glee Club, founded in 1853, which possesses a valuable library of music, held its meetings in an hotel in Mark Lane until 1878, when it moved to the London Tavern, Fenchurch Street. Other 19th-century foundations of the same type include the Round and Catch Club (1843-1911), which was formed for the purpose of singing new compositions by its professional members. After having originally met at taverns, it migrated to the St. James's Hall, Piccadilly (built in 1858), until the demolition of that building in 1905, and subsequently met at the Criterion Restaurant, Piccadilly. The Abbey Glee Club was founded in 1841 by a few ex-choristers of Westminster Abbey for the purpose of singing glees. In 1845 it absorbed the Adelphi Glee Club, which had been started in 1832. Since 1885 the meetings have been held at Caxton Hall, Westminster.

During the 18th century societies for the performance of choral music with instrumental accompaniment began to flourish. The Academy of Ancient Music for the study and practice of vocal and instrumental music was established at the Crown and Anchor Tavern by a number of distinguished instrumentalists under the direction of Pepusch. The choristers of St. Paul's Cathedral and the Chapel Royal were engaged to sing at the public concerts, and the Academy prospered until the secessions of the two choirs respectively in 1728 and 1734 hampered its activities. It had to appeal to the public for funds, and Handel and Geminiani were among its financial supporters. Samuel Arnold was the conductor of the Academy during the three years before it came to an end in 1792. The Caccilian Society, which had been instituted by a small number of singers in 1785 for the practice of hymns and anthems, later extended its scope by enrolling instrumentalists and by performing sacred music of larger proportions, especially Handel's oratorios. The society pursued its activities mainly in the City, but also gave performances of oratorios by Handel and Haydn at Covent Garden and Drury Lane Theatres. It came to an end in 1861. Activities of a similar kind had been inaugurated by the Choral Harmonists' Society, which held its meetings in the City from 1833 to 1851, and by the Sacred Harmonic Society, founded in 1833, which met in buildings in several parts of London until its dissolution in 1882. The Purcell Club (1835-1863) was formed for the purpose of singing Purcell's works. The members took part in singing his sacred works in Westminster Abbey twice a year in conjunction with the choir, and they sang his secular music, with the choir-boys of the Abbey, St. Paul's Cathedral and the Chapel Royal taking the soprano parts. Other choral societies which were founded in the 19th century and have continued in existence until the present day are the Royal Choral Society (1871), which incorporated Barnby's choir that had given oratorio concerts from 1869 to 1872; the Alexandra Palace Choral and Orchestral Society (1873); the Bach Choir (1875) founded by Arthur Duke Coleridge and Otto Goldschmidt; the Handel Society founded in 1882 on the initiative of A. J. (later Lord) Balfour; the Stock Exchange Male Voice Choir (1886) and the Oxford House Choral Society, which was formed in 1898 to give East Londoners opportunities of performing good choral music. Choral societies inaugurated since the beginning of the present century include the London Choral Society founded by Arthur Fagge in 1903; the Philharmonic Choir (1919) founded by C. Kennedy Scott; Morley College Choir, established by Gustav Holst in 1907; Lloyd's Choir founded in 1922; the City of London Choral Union founded by Harold Darke in 1925; the Bach Cantata Club (1926) founded by Hubert Foss; the B.B.C. Choral Society (1928); the Goldsmiths' Choral Union founded by Arthur Haggis in 1932, and the South London Bach Choir, founded by Paul Steinitz in 1946 and from 1952 known as the London Bach Society.

The music-making at the London pleasure gardens from the late 17th to the early 19th century may be considered an offshoot of the operatic performances and concerts which were taking place in the capital during this time, inasmuch as it employed the services of vocalists and instrumentalists who were performing in London from Oct. to May each year and afforded them a means of livelihood during the summer months. Although the dividing-line between serious and light music was not so clearly marked at that period as it is at the present day, the necessity of providing a special kind of music at the gardens for the entertainment of the crowds of visitors who were not primarily music-lovers led to the composition of an enormous number of songs which subsequently acquired a "period" charm. But music of more lasting value was also performed, and most of the notable English and foreign composers then resident in or visiting London were represented in the programmes given at the three principal gardens: Marylebone, which was open from 1659 to 1776, Vauxhall (known as Spring Garden until 1786) from 1660 to 1835 and Ranelagh from 1742 to 1805. Among the composers whose works were performed at one or other of these gardens were Handel, Mozart, J. C. Bach, John Stanley, Charles Avison, W. Boyce, F. Giardini, Charles Burney, T. A. Arne, Michael Arne, F. H. Barthélemon, C. Dibdin, J. Parry, T. Linley (the elder), James Hook, J. L. Dussek and Henry Bishop, some of whom played their own compositions. (The eight-year-old Mozart played at Ranelagh in 1764.) Instrumentalists and vocalists included members of the Arne, Ashley and Young families, the two brothers Parke, John Addison and his wife, John Beard, Anne Catley, Charles Incledon, Charlotte Brent, Giulia Frasi, Mara, Tenducci, Michael Kelly, Charles Dignum, Michael Festing, Franz Clement, John Parry (the blind Welsh harper), Valentine Snow (sergeant-trumpeter) and W. de Fesch. The music composed for special events in London was occasionally rehearsed in public in one of the gardens. For example, in 1749, a rehearsal of Handel's 'Firework Music' was given at Ranelagh before the intended performance in Green Park that year.

At Marylebone, Vauxhall and Ranelagh pipe organs were installed, and each of these gardens commanded an orchestra of about forty players. The musical performances presented there consequently attained a far higher standard than did those at any of the smaller gardens and spas in and around the capital, whose musical activities are nevertheless not altogether without interest. At Cuper's Gardens (on the site of the Waterloo Road) the firework music from Handel's 'Atalanta' was performed with an accompaniment of fireworks in 1741. At a "grand benefit night" at Finch's Grotto Gardens (South-west) in 1771 William Bates's 'The Gamester' was given, "in which a little boy played a Trumpet Concerto". At Sadler's Wells a programme dated 24 Feb. 1779 included works by T. A. Arne and his son Michael. In 1780 Jonas Blewitt was appointed organist and composer to Bermondsey Spa (south London); and at White Conduit House (near Islington) a programme of 9 Feb. 1836 records a "Grand Entertainment" at which Bishop's overture to 'Guy Mannering' was played and songs by Bishop, Spofforth and Barnett were sung.

The new pleasure gardens laid out in Battersea Park in connection with the Festival of Britain in 1951 formed an ideal background for another kind of musical entertainment with a strong popular appeal: open-air performances of a fantastic ballet — 'Orlando's Silver Wedding', based on the children's book of that name by Kathleen Hale, with music by Arthur Benjamin and choreography by Andrée Howard.

The history of public concert-giving in London as distinct from the semi-private performances by music clubs and societies may be said to begin in 1672, when John Banister, at one time a violinist in the king's band, started to give afternoon concerts of vocal and instrumental "musick performed by excellent masters" in the City. The first took place at his house in White Friars in Dec. 1672, and the series was continued until about 1678. In that year a new series of weekly concerts, which was to run for thirty-six years, was inaugurated by Thomas Britton, a vendor of small-coal, at his warehouse in Jerusalem Passage, Clerkenwell. This small concert-room, a converted loft, became the rendezvous of distinguished musicians and cultured amateurs including members of the nobility. Handel and Pepusch were among the performers at the keyboard, and Matthew Dubourg, the violinist, played there as a boy prodigy. At the beginning of the series there was no charge for admission, but later a subscription of ten shillings a year was made. A "Concert of Music" was established in 1699 by Henry Playford, music publisher at Middle Temple Gate, and was held thrice weekly at a coffee-room. Between 1683 and 1703 an evening concert in celebration of St. Cecilia's Day (22 Nov.) was given annually with few exceptions, first at a room in Villiers Street which had been used for music-making since 1680 and later at Stationers' Hall. Records exist of concerts being given periodically by Italian singers in various London buildings: for instance, in 1692 at York Buildings (Adelphi) and at Freeman's Yard, Cornhill, and in 1693 in Charles Street, Covent Garden. In 1710 John Locillet, a Belgian musician resident in Hart Street, Covent Garden, started to give weekly concerts at which some of Corelli's works were performed. A "Philharmonic Society" founded in 1728 by Maurice Greene held concerts in the Apollo Room at the Devil's Tavern near Temple Bar. The "Castle Concerts" (1724), founded by Greene and Talbot Young, son of the music publisher John Young, were held at the house of the last named in St. Paul's Churchyard, and later at the Queen's Head and the Castle taverns, both in Paternoster Row. In 1737 concerts by another "Philharmonic Society", led by Michael Festing, took place at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, Strand, and in 1749 a series of "New Concerts", at which Burney was the harpsichordist, were given at the King's Arms, Cornhill.

In 1714 a large concert-room became available for public performances of music. It was known as Hickford's Room, a name connected with two buildings: the first in James Street, Haymarket, and the second in Brewer Street, Golden Square, whither Hickford removed in 1739 and maintained the room until 1779. The concerts held in these buildings were given by most of the distinguished performers who visited England, and by many musicians resident in London who held their annual benefits there. The type of entertainment varied between "Vocal and Instrumental musick by the best Masters of the Opera", compositions solely by the performer giving the concert and first performances of new works of sundry kinds including cantatas, music-dramas and oratorios. From 1729 series of weekly subscription concerts were occasionally given. In 1731 Geminiani announced twenty such concerts, a project also carried on during the succeeding years. Among the historically most interesting events at Hickford's Rooms were a concert in 1719 for "the Benefit of Signor Francisco Scarlatti. The greatest part of his own composition, being brother to the famous Alessandro Scarlatti"; the first performance of two new anthems by Handel during Holy Week of 1740, in which Mrs. Arne and John Beard were among the singers; and a concert given on 13 May 1765 "for the benefit of Miss Mozart of thirteen and Master Mozart of eight years of age: Prodiges of Nature . . ." — their last public concert before leaving England. Some of the subscription concerts founded in 1764 by J. C. Bach and C. F. Abel and first given at Spring Garden (Vauxhall) and at Carlisle House, Soho Square, were transferred in 1775 to the newly erected Hanover Square Rooms, where they were held until their discontinuance in 1782.

At the Hanover Square Rooms, opened in 1775 and no longer used after 1874, many important orchestral concerts took place and most of the leading performers of the period appeared. The Professional Concerts, which were established by a group of professional men including Muzio Clementi and the violinists William Cramer and J. P. Salomon, were held between 1783 and 1793. The first of the subscription concerts organized in rivalry by Salomon, who had quarrelled with the Professionals, took place in 1786. Salomon was instrumental in persuading Haydn to visit London and to compose twelve symphonies specially for performance there in 1791-92 and 1794-95 under his own direction. The annual performances of Handel's 'Messiah' for the benefit of the Royal Society of Musicians took place in the Hanover Square Rooms from 1785 to 1848. The "Concert of Ancient Music", which had been founded in 1776, had organized the Handel Commemoration in Westminster Abbey in 1784 and had been known after 1785 as the "King's Concerts", used the building from 1804 until 1848; the Philharmonic (later the Royal Philharmonic) Society's concerts were given there from 1833 to 1869; those of the Society of British Musicians (1834-65) from 1834 to 1839 and those of the fifth and sixth seasons of the New Philharmonic Society (1852-70) from 1856 to 1867. In 1854 the Bach Society (1849-70) gave the first performance in England of Bach's St. Matthew Passion with Sterndale Bennett conducting. Other concerts held in the Rooms from 1862 onwards include those given by Henry Leslie's Choir and by the Royal Academy of Music. The London Wagner Society's concerts conducted by Edward Dannreuther took place there in 1873 and 1874. Dannreuther gave concerts of chamber music at his own house in Orme Square, Bayswater, between 1874 and 1893. Chamber music, especially that by Beethoven, had also been cultivated earlier by the Queen Square Select Society instituted by Thomas Alsager, a native of Cheshire, at whose house in Queen Square, Bloomsbury, during the 1830s and 1840s, private concerts were given which were the means of introducing little-known works and foreign musicians to a select circle of music-lovers. An outcome of these meetings was the foundation of the Beethoven Quartet Society (with Sivori as leader of the quartet), and the giving of a series of public concerts of chamber music in Harley Street in 1845. The analytical notes for the programmes of these concerts were written by Henry Hill, viola player. The Select Society was also responsible for the first performance in England of Beethoven's Mass in D in 1832 and of Cherubini's Requiem in 1834.

The Argyll Rooms (Argyll Street, Oxford Circus), at which entertainments of various kinds had been held in the early 1800s, first acquired importance in the musical world when the newly formed Philharmonic Society began to give its concerts there in 1813. In 1818 the rooms were transferred to a new building erected on behalf of the Royal Harmonic Institution on a site between Regent Street and Little Argyll Street (No. 246 Regent Street), and there the concerts of the Philharmonic Society took place until the rooms were burnt down in 1830. During these seasons many notable musical events occurred: the performance of new works by Cherubini under the composer's supervision in 1815; the first performance in England of Beethoven's 'Fidelio' overture and seventh Symphony in 1805, and of the choral Symphony in 1824; the début in London of Moscheles in 1821 and of Liszt in 1827, and the conducting of concerts by Weber in 1826 and by Mendelssohn in 1829. The British Concerts, designed to take the place of the Vocal Concerts, which had run from 1792 to 1822, were held at the Argyll Rooms during their one and only season of three concerts in 1823.

Before the closing of the Hanover Square Rooms in 1874 other buildings had come into use for concert-giving. Theatres were also still used for musical performances, and the number and types of concerts increased and multiplied. Exeter Hall (Strand) was opened in 1831 and became a centre for performances of oratorios as well as of orchestral music. The Sacred Harmonic Society (1832-82) held its concerts there from 1834 to 1880; the London Sacred Harmonic Society from 1848 to 1856; the Harmonic Union from 1852 to 1854; the New Philharmonic Society in 1852, 1853 and 1855. Wornum's Music Hall, Store Street, was chosen by the Melophonic Society for one season of choral music in 1837. Crosby Hall, a 15th-century mansion in the City, was in use as a concert-room from 1842. Willis's Rooms (formerly Almack's Rooms, St. James's) were used by the Quartet Association for their concerts of chamber music from 1852 to 1855. The Crystal Palace (destroyed by fire in 1936) was the home of orchestral music from 1855 to 1901, Saturday afternoon concerts being given under Sir August Manns's conductorship throughout every winter season. The Handel Festival was held there from 1857 onwards, and the Vocal Association gave its first series of concerts there in 1857 and subsequent concerts at St. James's Hall.

The St. James's Hall was built in 1858 by Chappell & Beale on the site of the present Piccadilly Hotel and was demolished in 1905. It is now best remembered as the scene of long and important series of concerts of chamber music: the Monday Popular Concerts which ran from 1859 to 1898 and the Saturday Popular Concerts which began tentatively in 1865 and from 1876 alternated every week with the Monday concerts. These concerts, which were known familiarly as the "Pops" and drew large audiences, were remarkable for fine performances of chamber music by the greatest artists of the period. The first concert of the London Musical Society (1878-87) took place at this hall in 1879; Hans Richter gave his "Orchestral Festival Concerts" there in 1879, 1880 and 1881, and thereafter the "Richter Concerts" regularly until 1897. The first ballad concerts initiated by Messrs. Boosey in the 1860s took place in the St. James's Hall until 1894, when they were transferred to the new Queen's Hall.

In 1871 the Royal Albert Hall was opened. It straightway became the scene of large-scale choral and orchestral concerts, and later of "farewell" concerts given by internationally famous soloists. The choir that sang in this hall under Gounod's conductorship at the inaugural concert of the International Exhibition held in 1871 formed the nucleus of the Royal Choral Society, which gave its first concert in the Royal Albert Hall in 1873 and has held its concerts there ever since, except when the hall was under repair. Among the concerts given at the Royal Albert Hall to which special historic interest attaches is the series of eight "Wagner Festival Concerts" in May 1877, conducted by Wagner himself.

The People's Concert Society was founded in 1878 to make good music available in the poorer parts of London and to give concerts in various centres. The activities of one of its branches (Finsbury) have subsequently acquired recognition as an integral feature of London musical life: the South Place Sunday Popular Concerts of chamber music. These concerts, given every Sunday evening with hardly a break from 1887 to the present day, were held at the South Place Chapel (near Finsbury Pavement) until the 1920s and, after its demolition, at the Conway Hall, Red Lion Square, now their permanent home. Similar Sunday evening concerts have been held at the Working Men's College, Crowndale Road, Camden Town. Other series of concerts initiated in the 19th century include two which were founded and directed by John Ella: the morning concerts of instrumental and chamber music, given by the Musical Union from 1845 to 1880, and the Musical Winter Evenings, from 1850 to 1859. In addition there were the subscription concerts of the Società Armonica conducted by Henry Forbes from 1827 to 1850; the concerts of the Amateur Musical Society (Henry Leslie) from 1847 to 1861; those of the Musical Society of London conducted by Alfred Mellon from 1858 to 1867; those of the British Orchestral Society conducted by George Mount from 1872 to 1875; of the Musical Artists' Society, from 1873 to 1898; and of the London Musical Society directed by Joseph Barnby from 1879 to 1887.

In 1838 the first of a new series of concerts, which was destined to become one of the most distinctive annual musical events of present-day London, took place at the English Opera House (Lyceum). This first season of "Promenade Concerts à la Musard" owed its origin to concerts of the same kind then being given in Paris by the French violinist and conductor Philippe Musard. Musard himself went to London to conduct the promenade concerts given at Drury Lane in 1840, though not before his rival, Henri Valentino, had been there to conduct concerts of the same type at the Crown and Anchor Tavern in 1839. Another Frenchman, Louis Jullien, who had assisted at the "Concerts d'Été" at Drury Lane in 1840 and had assumed command of the "Concerts d'Hiver" in 1841, gave an annual series of promenade concerts at either the Lyceum, Drury Lane or the Surrey Gardens theatres from 1842 to 1859. One season of promenade concerts, entitled "National Concerts" and conducted by Balfe, had meanwhile taken place at Her Majesty's Theatre in 1850, and after Jullien's retirement in 1859 further series were given from 1860 onwards at Covent Garden, at first in the Floral Hall and then in the opera house itself, at irregular intervals until the 1890s under a succession of conductors including Alfred Mellon, Arthur Sullivan and Frederic Cowen. It was not until 1895 that the Promenade Concerts as they are known to-day found their permanent home in the new Queen's Hall, Langham Place, and their presiding genius in Henry J. Wood.

The Queen's Hall, including a large and a small hall, was built in 1893. Concerts took place there in the autumn of that year, the first "unofficial" concert being given by the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society (founded 1872) with the Duke of Edinburgh as leader. In 1894 Sunday afternoon concerts were inaugurated, and concerts were also given by the Philharmonic Society and the Bach Choir. Henschel gave his "London Symphony Concerts" and the new Queen's Hall Choral Society performed Gounod's 'Redemption'. The small hall was presently the scene of Arnold Dolmetsch's Concerts of Ancient Music and of the British Chamber Music Concerts from 1894 to 1899. In 1895, in addition to the "Robert Newman Promenade Concerts" with Henry J. Wood conducting the New Queen's Hall Orchestra (1895), the first Sunday evening concerts were held, and concerts were given by the Stock Exchange Orchestral Society (founded 1893), the Royal Artillery Band (formed in 1762 and the oldest surviving permanent musical organization in Britain), the Strolling Players' Amateur Orchestral Society (founded 1882) and the Westminster Choral Society (founded in 1885). In 1896 the first Richter Concert to be given in the Queen's Hall took place in Oct. In 1897 the Saturday afternoon Symphony Concerts were instituted, and the same year saw the foundation of the Sunday afternoon Orchestral Concerts, which were given under the auspices first of the Sunday Concert Society and, from 1918 onwards, of the Sunday Musical Union. After the demolition of the St. James's Hall in 1905, Queen's Hall became the principal centre of London's concert-giving activities, and so it remained until its destruction by bombing on the night of 10 May 1941.

The first fifty years of the 20th century have seen a vast expansion of music-making in London, which even two world wars have had no power to arrest. (a) New musical societies have come into being; (b) new choirs and orchestras, professional and amateur, have been formed; (c) new types of concert inaugurated; (d) new concert-halls built and old buildings pressed into the service of music-making. Only the principal of these activities can be tabulated here in their respective categories as a basis for further reference.

(a) The King Cole Club (1900-25), founded by Jan Mulder for the performance of chamber music under less formal conditions than in a concert-hall; the Classical Concert Society (1908-22), instituted to carry on the series of chamber-music concerts which had been organized between 1900 and 1907 by the London Committee of the Joachim Quartet; the British Music Society (1918-33), established to further the interests of British music and music in Britain, and though not primarily a concert-giving organization, the parent of the London Contemporary Music Centre inaugurated in 1920 and since 1922 the British Centre of the International Society of Contemporary Music; the Music Society (1919-35), instituted by André Mangeot, founder of the International String Quartet, to give programmes of chamber music by English and foreign artists and composers at concerts which were held at the St. John's Institute, Westminster, and the "Monday Pops", also instituted by Mangeot, a series of monthly smoking-concerts given at the Wigmore Hall in 1937; the Guild of Singers and Players, formed in 1921 by professional performers with a view to minimizing the risks of financial loss in connection with the giving of individual recitals; the British Broadcasting Corporation (1922), which from 1924 onwards has given an increasingly large number of public concerts of many types in different buildings all over London; the Organ Music Society, founded in 1931 for the purpose of promoting organ recitals of the finest kind; the Courtauld-Sargent Concerts (1929-39); the Workers' Music Association, formed in 1936 "to encourage the composition, performance and appreciation of music by and for the working classes". Societies of more recent foundation include the City Music Society (1943); the Committee for the Promotion of New Music (1943); the Exploratory Concert Society founded by Robert Simpson; the Philharmonia Concert Society (the Mysore Concerts); the Morley College Concert Society, which has given large-scale choral-orchestral programmes since 1947; the New Era Concert Society (1947); the Viola da Gamba Society (1948); the R.B.A. Concert Society (so named from the concerts being held in the Gallery of the Royal British Artists' Society); the Liszt Society (1950), which arranges periodic performances of little-known works by Liszt; and the Apollo Concerts Society.

(b) New choirs formed since the beginning of the present century were mentioned earlier in the section on choral music. New professional orchestras founded since 1900 include the London Symphony Orchestra (1904), the Royal Albert Hall Orchestra (1921), the British Women's Symphony Orchestra (1924), the B.B.C. Orchestra (1930), the Kalmar Orchestra (1931), the London Philharmonic Orchestra (1932), the Boyd Neel Orchestra (1933), the Jacques String Orchestra, the Riddick Orchestra (1938), the New London Orchestra (1940), the Philharmonia Orchestra (1945), the Capriol Orchestra, the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra (1946), the B.B.C. Opera Orchestra (1946) and the London Mozart Players (1949).

Smaller professional chamber-music ensembles formed during the same period include the Virtuoso String Quartet, the London Trio (1901), the London String Quartet (1908), the English String Quartet (1909), the Spencer Dyke Quartet (1920), the London Chamber Orchestra (1921), the British String Quartet (1923), the Kutcher String Quartet and the Griller String Quartet in 1928, the Hirsch String Quartet and the Stratton String Quartet in 1925, the English Ensemble (Kathleen Long), the Macnaghten String Quartet (1932), the Blech String Quartet (1934), the Carter String Trio (1940), the London Wind Players and the Zorian String Quartet in 1942, the London Baroque Ensemble (Karl Haas) in 1943, the Hurwitz String Quartet (1946) and the Amadeus String Quartet (1947).

New amateur orchestras include the South Place Orchestra (founded by Richard Walthew), the Civil Service Orchestra (1911), the orchestras formed by the staffs of the large banking-houses in London: Barclays (1905), London and South Western (1919), National Provincial (1921) and Midland (1928), the Amateur Orchestra of London (1922), Lloyd's Orchestra, founded as a full symphony orchestra in 1924, the Insurance Orchestral Society of London (1925) and the South London Orchestra (1932).

(c) New types of concert include: (1) Those especially devised for educational purposes: the Robert Mayer Concerts for Children inaugurated in 1923 and held at Central Hall, Westminster; and concerts subsequently given by the Ernest Read Symphony Orchestra (formerly the Junior Philharmonic Orchestra), the London Senior and Junior Orchestras formed by Ernest Read in 1926, and by the National Youth Orchestra of Great Britain (1947). (2) Lunch-time concerts: the National Gallery Concerts of chamber music inaugurated by Dame Myra Hess on 10 Oct. 1939 and given five times a week until 1946; the Royal Exchange Concerts held from 1942 to 1944; the Bishopsgate Institute Lunch-time Concerts from 1947 onwards; the Fleur de Lis Concerts (1947) daily at the Fleur de Lis Hall, Fetter Lane (these last three series designed particularly for workers in the City); the Wigmore Hall Lunch-hour Concerts from 1947, and the Lunch-time Concerts at Queen Mary Hall, Bloomsbury, organized by the Holborn Borough Council in 1948. (3) Serenade Concerts: a series held on Sunday evenings during the summer season in the Orangery, Hampton Court Palace. (4) Concerts of recorded music, sponsored by gramophone societies, of which one of the most important is the "Henry Wood Proms Circle" (1944), founded as the "Proms Circle" in 1933.

(d) Of the concert-halls that were still in use in the early part of the present century, the Steinway Hall (known after 1925 as the Grottrian Hall) and the Aeolian Hall were converted to other purposes, as was also the Court House, Marylebone; and the Mortimer Hall was destroyed by bombing. In addition to those already mentioned in this article the following buildings are now used for concerts: the Cowdray Hall (Royal College of Nursing), the Polytechnic Hall (Regent Street), the Rudolf Steiner Hall (Clarence Gate), Kingsway Hall, and picture galleries such as the R.B.A. (Suffolk Street) and the Irving Gallery (Leicester Square). Among museums which have extended hospitality to concert-givers are the London Museum (Lancaster House), the Victoria and Albert Museum, and Kenwood House (Hampstead). The serious gap that existed in London's concert-hall amenities after the total destruction of the Queen's Hall by bombing in 1941 was filled in 1951 by the building of the Royal Festival Hall on the south bank of the Thames near Waterloo Station. In the meantime, large-scale orchestral concerts in the London area had been finding temporary refuge at the Earl's Court Exhibition Hall, the Harringay Arena and at theatres: the Cambridge, the Adelphi and others.

EDUCATION.—Musical education in London

up to the 19th century was not carried on in institutions designed especially for the purpose. It formed part of the regular curriculum in old-established schools such as Westminster (1339), Christ's Hospital (1552), Merchant Taylors' (1561) and Dulwich College (1619), but it was cultivated in the choir-schools of the cathedral churches, and most particularly in that of the Chapel Royal. These schools were the training-ground of most of the English composers and performers resident in London. The secular musical activities in connection with the court offered practical experience to young musicians, and the periodic musical entertainments given by members of the Inns of Court took the place of those now usually associated with a university musical society. The Gresham Musical Professorship founded in 1596, with John Bull as the first professor, did not subsequently make a notable contribution to musical education until later times, for the professors in the earlier days were seldom qualified musicians.

Private tuition was given by English and foreign musicians. The court often favoured foreigners: Handel taught the children of George II and J. C. Bach was appointed music-master to Queen Caroline. Society followed the royal lead, and a tradition that foreign music teachers were superior to English was gradually established and long remained unchallenged. Even when the first important English music school was founded in London at the beginning of the 19th century, the teaching-staff included a large proportion of foreigners, even though they were Londoners by residence.

The Royal Academy of Music, founded in 1822 and the senior institution of musical education in the country, was for many years the only one of its kind in London, but in the later years of the century it was joined by others. The Royal College of Music, which originated as the National Training-College for Music in 1873, was established in 1883 on lines similar to the Royal Academy, and these two institutions, while remaining completely independent of one another, have been closely related from 1889 onwards through the medium of the Associated Board of the Royal Schools of Music, by means of which the two schools, as well as the Royal Manchester College of Music and the Royal Scottish Academy, carry out a joint policy with regard to some of their external examinations. Trinity College of Music, which was established in 1872 for the study of church music, had by 1876 extended its curriculum to embrace many branches of musical education and now possesses a separate department for the study of 16th- and 17th-century music. The Royal Academy, the Royal College and Trinity College, together with the music departments of the Battersea Polytechnic and the Goldsmiths' College (New Cross) are recognized teaching-schools of the University of London, the Faculty of Music at which was established in 1900 with Trinity College as the moving spirit. Degrees in music had been instituted in 1877, when the University was only an examining body as far as music was concerned. The King Edward VII Professorship in Music was founded in 1902. The University Musical Society, founded in 1905 and re-created in 1934, comprises a choir drawn from the colleges, schools and institutions of the University and conducted since 1934 by C. Thornton Lofthouse. It gives an annual summer concert at the Central Hall, Westminster, and in recent years has performed large-scale works with professional orchestral accompaniment. At the Christmas concerts it has given first performances in London of works by Kodály and Britten, and of music specially composed for the society.

The other London music schools which provide courses in all musical subjects are the Guildhall School of Music and Drama founded in 1880 by the Corporation of the City of London; the London College of Music, founded in 1887, and Morley College, which was founded in 1889 as an evening college associated with the "Old Vic.", and which has an active music department where tuition is given in many branches of the art. Since 1907 the department has been under the direction successively of Gustav Holst, Arnold Goldsbrough, Arnold Foster and Michael Tippett. The London Academy of Music, which was instituted in 1861, and in 1904 became amalgamated with other small music schools in and around London, no longer exists.

Education in specialized branches of music is carried on at the Royal Military School of Music, Kneller Hall (Twickenham), founded in 1857; the Tonic Sol-fa College (Curwen Memorial College) founded in 1863 by John Curwen; the Tobias Matthay Pianoforte School, established in London in 1905, but since the death of the founder in 1945 carried on in London only as a branch of larger centres elsewhere; the London School of Dalcroze Eurhythmics, founded in 1913 under the direction of Percy Ingham, and the London School of Violoncello founded in 1919 by Herbert Walenn. Many London teachers carry on small private music schools for tuition in one subject. A 19th-century precursor of this type of private institution was the Academy for the Higher Development of Pianoforte Playing, initiated in 1873 by Oscar Beringer and directed by him until it was closed in 1897. The Music Trades' School, founded in 1915 by Ernest White as a branch of the Northern Polytechnic (Holloway), and now known as the Department of Musical Instrument and Radio Technology, gives preliminary training to technicians before they enter the manufacturing trades and also provides musical education for suitable candidates among the pupils.

INSTITUTIONS.—Institutions and organizations in London that are associated with the education, professional, social or benevolent activities of musicians in the capital and far beyond include: the Incorporated Society of Musicians, founded in 1882, which represents the musical profession throughout Great Britain; the Patron's Fund of the Royal College of Music, established in 1903 "for the encouragement of young British musicians" by assisting them with rehearsals and performances of their compositions, and in other ways; the Church Music Society (1906), instituted to give help in the selection and performance of music suitable for divine worship, and later the parent-body of the English School of Church Music (now the Royal School of Church Music at Croydon); the Music Teachers' Association, founded in 1908 by Stewart Macpherson to be the rallying-ground of the teaching profession; the Society of Women Musicians, founded in 1911 "to act as a representative body where the interests of women in music are concerned"; the London Society of Organists, founded in 1913 as the South London Society of Organists; the Performing Right Society (1914); the music committee of the Carnegie United Kingdom Trust, which administers funds for the benefit of deserving musical entertainments of all kinds; the British Federation of Music Festivals, incorporated in 1921, the central organization of the Competition Festivals held all over Britain; the London Schools' Music Association, formed in 1927 "to stimulate the study of music in London schools"; the music committee of the British Council, which since 1935 has sponsored concert tours in foreign countries by British musicians and return visits by foreign musicians; and the National Federation of Music Societies, formed in 1935 "to promote the art, practice and performance of music throughout the United Kingdom and any other countries", especially among amateur musicians. The Arts Council of Great Britain, known as the Council for the Encouragement of Music and the Arts from 1940 and incorporated under Royal Charter in 1946, includes a panel of experts who advise on music and allocates grants to operatic and concert-giving organizations. The Musicians' Benevolent Fund, founded in 1921, in addition to carrying out its beneficent activities, is associated with practical music-making in London, especially in connection with the organizing of St. Cecilia's Festival. The holding of an annual musical celebration in honour of St. Cecilia's Day, a custom which had long been in abeyance, was revived in 1945, since which year the festivals have comprised a morning service with special music at the Church of St. Sepulchre, Holborn, a luncheon in aid of the Musicians' Benevolent Fund, and a large-scale choral-orchestral concert in the evening.

LEARNED SOCIETIES.—Societies formed to promote the publication of music of earlier periods have been, and still are, a feature of London's musical life. The Handel Society brought out between 1843 and 1848 a "superior and standard edition of the works of Handel" which was completed under different auspices in 1855. The Musical Antiquarian Society, founded in 1840 for the publication of "scarce and valuable works by early English composers", issued nineteen volumes during the seven years of its existence, and the Motet Society (1841) printed three volumes of ancient church music. The type of activity pursued by the two societies last named has since been superseded by the publication of more scientific collections. The 'Old English Edition', twenty-five volumes of musical reprints edited by G. E. P. Arkwright, was brought out between 1889 and 1902. The series of volumes, twenty-six in number, issued since 1876 by the Purcell Society is not yet complete. The collections of the 'English Madrigal School', the 'English School of Lutenist Song Writers' and the complete compositions of William Byrd have been published during the present century on the initiative of E. H. Fellowes, who was also the principal editor of the collection of 'Tudor Church Music'. These last-named editions are descendants of much earlier enterprises, such as 'Musica transalpina', a collection of madrigals, principally by Italian composers, compiled by Nicholas Yonge in 1588 and 1597 and printed in London by Thomas East at Paule's Wharf; 'Parthenia', the first music for virginals printed from engraved plates in England (1611), and a companion volume, 'Parthenia inviolata' (c. 1614), the former engraved by William Hole and the latter by Robert Hole; and 'Orpheus Britannicus', the first attempt at a collected edition of Purcell's vocal music, issued by Henry Playford in 1698 and 1702. Among the most important recent editions of this kind is 'Musica Britannica', a national collection of music under the general editorship of Anthony Lewis, inaugurated in 1949 by the Royal Musical Association, a successor to the Musical Society of London (1858-67) and now the principal learned musical society in the capital. It was founded in 1874 "for the investigation and discussion of subjects connected with the science and art of music" and has published a volume of proceedings annually since its inception. Other musical institutions in London that issue annual journals include the English Folk Dance and Song Society, founded in 1898 as the Folk Song Society and since 1932 united with the English Folk Dance Society founded by Cecil Sharp in 1911; and the International Folk Music Council (1947). The Liszt Society, instituted in London in 1950, annually publishes a volume of works by this composer which are either little known or have been long out of print.

PUBLISHING.—London has been the headquarters of English music publishing since the 16th century, at which time William Seres printed 'Certayne Psalmes with notes to every Psalme in iiij parts to Syngge' at the "Signe of the Hedge Hogg" in 1553; Richard Grafton printed some of the first books of English church services including Cranmer's Litany (1544) and John Marbeck's 'Booke of Common praier noted' (1550); John Day printed 'Certaine notes set forth in foure and three parts to be sung at the morning, Communion and evening praier', and a succession of psalters between 1560 and 1579; and Thomas Vautrollier printed Tallis and Byrd's 'Cantiones sacrae' in 1575. Many collections of madrigals, canzonets, songs, ayres and psalms were published by Peter Short between c. 1584 and 1608, by Thomas East between 1588 and 1607, and by the latter's son-in-law Thomas Snodham, who succeeded to his business in 1609. William Hole, the first engraver of music in England, already mentioned earlier here in connection with 'Parthenia', brought out the 'Prime musiche nuove' by Angelo Notari in 1613. William Barley, who worked in the City as printer and bookseller from c. 1592 to 1614, printed books of madrigals, the 'Patheway to Musicke' (1596), and Thomas Robinson's 'New Citharen Lessons' in 1609. John Windet printed several editions of Sternhold's Psalms and many musical works, including books of songs, ayres, madrigals and 'An Houres Recreation in Musicke apt for Instruments and Voyces' by Richard Alison (1606).

Music publishing during the latter part of the 17th century, when it was centred in the City between St. Paul's Churchyard and Temple Bar, was dominated by the Playford family, who carried on their business near the Temple and employed Thomas Harper as the printer of some of their publications. John Playford the elder, the founder of the firm, brought out a long series of important treatises on the theory of music, books of instruction on playing instruments and collections of songs. He was also the author of 'The English Dancing Master', which he published in 1651, and of the 'Introduction to the Skill of Musick', the first edition of which was published in 1654 and the last in 1730, long after his death. His nephew John Playford and his son Henry Playford continued the business. The former published some of Purcell's works, including his 'Ten Sonatas' and 'Te Deum and Jubilate for St. Cecilia's Day' (1697), and Blow's 'Ode on the Death of Purcell' (1696) and 'Amphion Anglicus', a collection of songs (1700). John Young, who was both a music publisher and a seller of musical instruments in St. Paul's Churchyard, published 'The Compleat Tutor to the Violin . . .' by J. Banister (1698) and 'The Flute Master Compleat . . .' (1706), and was later in partnership with John and Joseph Hare and John Walsh. John Carr and his son Richard, although not actually in partnership with the Playfords, published some works in conjunction with them down to 1683.

At this period, from about 1683 to 1732, music engraving was very largely in the hands of Thomas Cross, who worked for composers as well as for publishers, and who was practically the inventor of sheet music. Among Playford's successors were John Heptinstall, active between 1690 and 1713, and the first printer in England to join the stems of quavers and semi-quavers into groups; William Pearson, who worked from 1699 to 1736 and improved Heptinstall's new methods of typography, and John Cullen, at work c. 1705 to 1710.

John Walsh was the most important music publisher during the first half of the 18th century. He and his son John successively held the appointment of "Musical instrument-maker and music-seller to the King" (William III) until the early years of the reign of George III. The Walsh's are now best remembered as Handel's publishers. They printed the first of his operas to be performed in England, 'Rinaldo', in 1711. P. Randall, who had his own publishing firm in 1707, became a partner of the elder Walsh before 1710, and his son William Randall succeeded to the Walsh business after the death of the younger Walsh in 1766. W. Randall, who with one Abell issued a large folio edition of 'Messiah' in 1768, died in 1780, and his business was taken over c. 1783 by Wright & Co., who reissued Handel's works from the Walsh plates. When this business was wound up, Preston (established in 1774) bought the Handel plates, which in due course (c. 1850) came into the possession of Novello & Co.

Other London music publishers in the earlier half of the 18th century were Daniel Wright, father and son, in business between 1709 and 1740; Richard Meares, who published Mattheson's 'Pièces de clavecin' in 1714; Thomas Wright (1730-35); John Johnson (1740-72), who reissued some of Daniel Wright's publications; John Cluer, who issued Handel's 'Suites de pièces' in 1720 and subsequently at least seven of his operas; John Simpson (1734-47), the publisher of sheet-songs and of music which is now of antiquarian interest (Carey's 'Musical Century' in 1740 and 'Callopie' in 1746), and his successor James Oswald (d. 1769), who continued the publication of Scots tunes, 'The Caledonian Pocket Companion', begun by Simpson.

The firm of Thompson, which was founded in 1751 by Peter Thompson, and was carried on by various members of the family until 1804, was the most important business during the second half of the century. The Thompsons combined the making of musical instruments with their publishing activities, as did the firms of Cahusac (1755-c. 1816), Longman & Broderip (1767), John Preston in 1774, William Forster, a violin maker in the 1760s who, between 1781 and 1787 was the English publisher of a large number of Haydn's symphonies, quartets, etc., and Astor & Co., who started business as flute makers about 1778 and were publishing sheet music before 1800. Next in chronological order among the 18th-century publishers are the following: Robert Bremner, who moved from Edinburgh to London in 1726 and published many kinds of the best music of the period as well as republishing his Scots collections, and whose business was bought after his death by John Preston, originally a musical-instrument maker; John Johnston, in business from 1768 until about 1776, the publisher of early works by Charles Dibdin and of T. A. Arne's adaptation of 'King Arthur' in 1773; John and Gerard Vogler, established c. 1770 and succeeded c. 1775 by Robert Wornum (the elder), who published many small books of dances and airs and who was also a maker of stringed instruments; John Preston & Son, who in 1820 purchased the stock-in-trade of Straight & Skillern (established in 1768), whose own publications dating from 1776 included a series of country dances from 1786 until the 1820s, popular operas of the day and W. Linley's 'Shakespeare's Dramatic Songs'; the Dale family, who started business in 1778 at a private house in Chancery Lane, acquired premises in Oxford Street and New Bond Street in 1803 as well as retaining branches in the City, and continued to publish on a large scale until nearly the middle of the 19th century; John Bland, who between 1779 and 1794 published collections of catches and glees, operas and sheet music, and republished most of Handel's compositions, and one of whose chief claims to remembrance is his connection with Haydn, first in Vienna in 1787 and then in London in 1791; Goulding & Co. (later D'Almaine & Co.), a firm founded in 1764 in James Street, Covent Garden, and after many changes of address established in Soho Square in 1820, whence it published the bulk of Henry Bishop's music and collections of national airs; Robert Birchall, Walsh's successor, who inaugurated a musical circulating library in 1784 and became the publisher of the original English editions of several of Beethoven's works including the "Battle" Symphony, G major violin Sonata, Op. 96, and the "Archduke"

Trio; T. G. Williamson, a composer, and publisher c. 1790; Corri & Co., founded by Domenico Corri, who started business in Edinburgh, moved to London in 1790 and went into partnership with his son-in-law J. L. Dussek, whose compositions he published as well as some by Haydn; Lewis Lavenu, who with other members of his family published vocal and instrumental sheet music from 1796 to about 1846; George Walker & Son, founded towards the end of the century by George Walker, who is thought to have originated the practice of marking sheet music at double its actual selling-price; Charles Wheatstone, established c. 1790, the publisher of collections of glees, among which was 'The Harmonist' in nine volumes, and Muzio Clementi, who in partnership, first with John Longman in 1798 and then with other publishers including the Collards, issued several important works by Beethoven and many of his own compositions and text-books.

Two of the late 18th-century firms were kept alive in the 19th century under other names: Thompson's business was purchased in 1805 by Purday & Button, who became Button & Whittaker in 1808 and eventually ceased business in about 1830 as Whittaker & Co.; John Bland's business passed to Francis Linley in 1796, thence to William Hodsoll in about 1800 and lastly to Z. Y. Purday, who carried it on until 1855-60.

A music-publishing venture dating from the early years of the 19th century was the Royal Harmonic Institution created in 1818 by the principal professors of music in London, who formed an association for the purpose of printing the best music in the best manner and selling it at a moderate price. The enterprise, which was established at the (New) Argyll Rooms, soon proved financially unsuccessful, but was carried on by William Hawes (1785-1846), who had been foremost in promoting it, in conjunction with Thomas Welsh (1780-1848) until 1830, when the whole of the music plates belonging to the association were bought by Cramer & Co.

With the exception of James Peck, a publisher of sacred music from about 1802 to 1850, and of G. H. Davidson, between 1847 and 1859 one of the pioneers of cheap music publishing and a collector of Charles Dibdin's songs, the music-publishing firms founded in the 19th century have either remained in business under their own names until the present day or have become merged into other firms still extant; for instance Wessel & Stodart (1825), who as Wessel & Stapleton (1838) entered into a contract with Chopin as his sole English publishers and who were ultimately absorbed by Ashdown & Parry in 1860; Robert Cocks & Co. (1832), who published many musical classics and important treatises on music, and sold their business in 1898 to Augener Ltd.; John Ewer & Co., who were originally "importers of foreign music" (c. 1824), who held some of Mendelssohn's copyrights and who were incorporated in 1867 into the house of Novello & Co.; and Hawkes & Son, a firm founded in 1865 with a view to developing the publication of music for brass and military bands, and amalgamated in 1930 with Boosey & Co. as Boosey & Hawkes.

Earliest in date of the 19th-century music publishers who are now still in existence in London was Joseph Williams Ltd., founded in 1808, who issued the 'Old English Edition' of musical reprints edited by G. E. P. Arkwright from 1889 to 1902. Next in chronological order came Novello & Co. in 1811. The founder, Vincent Novello, himself an editor and arranger, particularly of choral music, published collections of sacred music including 'The Fitzwilliam Music' in 1825 and Purcell's 'Sacred Music' in 1828-32. His son J. Alfred Novello, who made printed choral music easily and cheaply available, was largely responsible for the widespread increase in choral singing in Great Britain from about 1830 onwards. The firm of Chappell & Co., inaugurated in 1812 by Samuel Chappell, has since been carried on by members of the same family. Changes in partnership from time to time have led to inter-connections with the firms of Boosey & Co. (founded in 1816), Cramer & Co. (founded in 1824 by J. B. Cramer, the pianist) and Metzler & Co., publishers since 1816 and sellers of musical instruments from about 1790. Augener Ltd. was founded in 1853, and from 1878 the firm has printed its own publications. Edwin Ashdown Ltd. (1860), the successors first of Wessel and then of Ashdown & Parry, now incorporate Enoch & Sons (founded in 1869) and J. H. Larway, both of whose catalogues they publish jointly with their own. John Curwen & Sons, founded in 1863 by John Curwen of tonic sol-fa fame, began by issuing music for singing-classes and schools. After the inauguration of the competition festival movement in 1882 by Curwen's son, John Spencer Curwen, the firm published works to meet the demand for better choral music; in 1917 it started to publish solo songs by contemporary British composers and in 1923 became amalgamated with F. B. Goodwin. Next in chronological order after Curwens came Weekes & Co. (1869); Forsyth Bros., who moved to London in 1873 from Manchester, where they had begun to engrave music in 1872; Bosworth & Co. (1889) and Cary & Co. (1897), publishers of Catholic church music and at one time of the Avison Edition of music issued under the auspices of the Society of British Composers. After the turn of the century: Elkin & Co. (1903); Ascherberg, Hopwood & Crewe (1906); Stainer & Bell (1907), publishers of works by British composers in connection with Carnegie United Kingdom Trust; J. & W. Chester, who opened a business in London in 1915 after having been established at Brighton since 1860; the Anglo-French Music Co., formed in 1916 to issue replacements of German publications then unobtainable owing to war conditions, and amalgamated in 1925 with the Oxford University Press, which had begun to publish music in London in 1923 and has since built up a large catalogue of collected editions and works by English composers past and present.

Among the foreign music-publishing firms that have branches or agencies in London and also publish music there in English editions of their own are Schott & Co. (1858), a branch of B. Schott & Sohne, Mainz (1773); F. Ricordi & Co. (1874) (Milan, 1808); the British & Continental Music Agencies, Ltd., representatives of Breitkopf & Härtel, Leipzig (1719), who had their own London branch before the first world war; Alfred Lengnick (1893), representing Simrock of Bonn (1790), publishers of works by Brahms and Dvořák; Alfred A. Kalmus (1936), agent for the Universal Edition of Vienna (1901), and Hinrichsen Edition Ltd. (1938), the representative of C. F. Peters (Leipzig, 1814) in succession to Augeners and Novellos.

INSTRUMENT MAKING.—The history of musical-instrument making in London is older than that of music publishing, but although the art of organ building was known in England from the 8th century, the earliest reference to the organ of a London church is one relating to a "pair of organs" for the Church of St. Mary at Hill (Billingsgate) in 1521, and the earliest known specification of any English organ is that of a "payer of organs" made by Antony Duddington for All Hallows, Barking, next the Tower of London, in 1519.

The first important London organ builders were the Dallam family, who went to London from Dallam in Lancashire in the early 17th century. Robert Dallam (1602–65) built organs for St. Paul's Cathedral and the Church of St. Mary Woolnoth (Lombard Street), and Ralph Dallam was building one for Greenwich Church when he died in 1673. "Father" Smith (Bernhard Schmidt), who had come from Germany in 1660, built his first organ in England at the royal chapel, Whitehall, and another in 1669 for the Banqueting Hall. Among the many organs he built for London churches were those of St. Margaret's, Westminster, in 1675, the Temple in 1684 and St. Paul's Cathedral in 1697. He was appointed court organ builder to Queen Anne.

Of the family of Harris, who flourished in the 17th century, only members of the younger generation built organs for London, but the organ built by the founder of the family in 1673 for Magdalen College, Oxford, eventually came to London, for it was re-erected by Cromwell at Hampton Court Palace. Renatus Harris, grandson of the founder and the most celebrated member of the family, was a rival of Father Smith, and when the two men entered into competition in the building of an organ for the Temple Church in 1784, there was so little to choose between their instruments that the ultimate decision of the benchers in favour of Smith's was delayed for nearly a year, during which time a heated "battle of organs" was in progress. Renatus Harris the younger built the organ of St. Dionis Backchurch (Lime Street) in 1724; his brother John went into partnership with his own son-in-law John Byfield, with whom he carried on business as Harris & Byfield in Red Lion Street, Holborn. Associated with this firm were Richard Bridge (or Bridges), who was trained by the younger Harris and built organs for the Priory of St. Bartholomew the Great, Smithfield, in 1729 and for Christ Church, Spitalfields, in 1730; Samuel Green (1740–96), who was in partnership with the younger Byfield and built organs for several City churches and halls; and the Jordans, father and son, inventors of the swell, which was first applied to the organ they built for the Church of St. Magnus, London Bridge, in 1712. In 1700 the elder Jordan had built the organ of St. Saviour's, Southwark, now Southwark Cathedral. Other organ builders at this time include Thomas Griffin (d. 1771), who built the organ of the Church of St. Helen's, Bishopsgate, in 1741, and organs for other City churches down to 1762; George England, who flourished between 1740 and 1788, and his son George Pike England, who built the first organ known for certain to have had pedals, at St. James's, Clerkenwell, in 1790; Gray & Davison, whose factory in London was established in 1774 by Robert Gray and is still in existence; Crang & Hancock, of whom the former altered old echoes into swells (at St. Paul's Cathedral, St. Peter's, Cornhill, etc.), and the latter added new reeds to Father Smith's organs; Bishop & Son, established about the end of the century by James C. Bishop and later the inventors of composition pedals, and John Snetzler, a German who settled in London in 1740 and from whom the firm of Bevington & Sons (1794) was descended by way of Snetzler's successors, Ohrmann and Nutt.

One of the earliest organ builders of the 19th century was Benjamin Flight (the younger), who set up in partnership with Joseph Robson in Leicester Square about 1800. On moving to St. Martin's Lane, Flight & Robson constructed a large chamber organ comprising both keyboards and barrels which they named the Apollonicon and exhibited at their premises from 1817 for nearly a quarter of a century. Thomas Adams (1785-1858), an organist, superintended the evening performances for many years. Robson's share in the partnership passed to Gray & Davison in 1832, and Flight carried on business with his son. The firm of William Hill & Son, which was originally founded by John Snetzler in 1755 and after several changes in partnership was established under its present name by William Hill in 1838, carried out some of its work in collaboration with Henry John Gauntlett, a practical organist, lawyer and scholar, who advocated reforms in organ building: the adoption of the CC compass and of the C organ in place of the old F and G instruments.

Other firms of London organ builders established during the 19th century or earlier, and still in existence, include those of Joseph W. Walker & Sons (1828) and Henry Willis & Sons (1845). The former firm was originally established in 1740 by George England, to whose son-in-law, H. Nicholls, Joseph Walker had been apprenticed. Among the Walker organs in London are those of the Royal College of Music, the Brompton Oratory and the Ninth and Eleventh Churches of Christ Scientist. Willis & Sons was founded by Henry Willis (1821-1901), who had been articled in 1835 to John Gray (of Gray & Davison), and who first won fame in London with the large organ he showed at the Great Exhibition of 1851. In the Exhibition of 1862 he showed another organ which became the nucleus of the organ at the Alexandra Palace and was destroyed by fire in 1873. He built organs for the Royal Albert Hall in 1871, St. Paul's Cathedral in 1872 and for the restored Alexandra Palace in 1875. His descendants have built organs for many London churches down to the present day.

The making of stringed keyboard instruments flourished in London from the 17th century, when spinets were being made by the Hitchcock and the Haward families, and by Stephen Keene between 1672 and 1716. Specimens of the work of all these makers exist in collections of musical instruments in London. An early maker of harpsichords was Joseph Mahoon, "harpsichord maker to the King" (George II) in 1759. The pianoforte found especial favour in London from the 1770s onwards, partly owing to the championship of John Christian Bach, who settled in London in 1759 and first played a solo on the pianoforte in public there in 1768; and more particularly of Muzio Clementi, who was taken to England as a boy of fourteen, composed the first music expressly intended for the pianoforte and published it in London in 1773.

The firm of John Broadwood & Sons, which was founded in London by the Swiss harpsichord maker Burkart Shudi (originally Burkhard Tschudi) in 1728, is the oldest firm of keyboard makers in existence. John Broadwood entered into partnership with Shudi in 1770 and after the latter's death in 1773 began to make square pianofortes of the type introduced into England by Johannes Zumpe, a German employed by Shudi. In 1781 John Broadwood made his first grand pianoforte. Shudi had been an apprentice of Herman Tabel, a Flemish harpsichord maker established in London. Another of his apprentices was Jakob Kirkman, who emigrated to England from Germany about 1739 and on Tabel's death that year took over his business. Kirkman and his nephew Abraham Kirkman also made pianofortes, and the firm was carried on by the latter's descendants until 1896, when it was amalgamated with that of the Collards. The firm of Stodart (1776-1861), pianoforte makers, was founded by Robert Stodart, a pupil of John Broadwood, who in 1775 had assisted Americus Backers, a Dutch pianoforte maker resident in London, with the invention of the new mechanism for the grand pianoforte which has since been known as the "English" action. After the death of Backers, Stodart made grand pianofortes of his own and also combined the principles of the harpsichord with those of the pianoforte, for which invention he took out a patent in 1777. Another member of the firm, William Stodart, took out a patent in 1795 for the horizontal grand pianoforte turned upright vertically. Sébastien Érard went to London in 1786 and established workshops there in connection with those of his firm in Paris, and in 1792 he took out a patent for improvements in pianofortes and harps. The London manufactory was maintained until 1890. Longman & Lukey (1771), an offshoot of the music-publishing firm of Longman & Broderip (1767), made numerous spinets, pianofortes and "portable clavecins", according to their catalogue of 1789. When Longman & Broderip went into bankruptcy in 1798, John Longman, the successor of the founder James Longman, became a partner of Muzio Clementi until 1802. Clementi then went into partnership with F. W. Collard in 1810 and remained in the firm until his death in 1832, since which date the firm has been known as Collard & Collard.

Other less important pianoforte makers established before the end of the 18th century were Joseph Merlin, who took out a patent for a combined harpsichord and pianoforte in 1774 and made his first grand pianoforte in 1782; Rolfe & Co., makers of pianofortes and other musical instruments, and publishers between 1796 and 1860; Astor & Co., founded by George Astor, who went to London c. 1778 from Waldorf (near Heidelberg) and began work as a flute maker, and who by 1880, in conjunction with his brothers, had built up a flourishing business, combining pianoforte making with music publishing, which merged about 1831 into the firm of Gerock & Wolf.

In the year 1800 John Isaac Hawkins of London patented an upright pianoforte from 3 to 4 ft. in height which was called the "Portable Grand Pianoforte". Robert Wornum (the younger) invented diagonally strung and vertically strung low upright pianofortes respectively in 1811 and 1813, and in 1827 brought out his "piccolo" pianoforte, 3 ft. 4 ins. in height, the new crank mechanism of which he patented in 1829. In establishing a concert-room at his pianoforte warehouse (in Store Street), where public concerts not connected with his business were given, he initiated a practice later followed by other pianoforte-manufacturing firms who had warehouses in London: Steinway & Sons in Lower Seymour Street in 1878, Bechstein in Wigmore Street in 1901 and the Aeolian Company in New Bond Street in 1903.

The principal firms of London pianoforte makers founded in the 19th century and still in existence are Chappell & Co. (1812) and Crummer & Co. (1824), both of whom were originally music publishers; Charles H. Challen & Son (1820), John Brinsmead & Sons (1836), George Rogers & Sons (1843) and John Spencer & Co. (1884).

Among makers of stringed and wind instruments in London are Richard Hunt, who made viols and lutes dated from the 1660s; Thomas Urquhart, whose violins bear dates between the 1670s and 1680s and who also made flutes; Barak Norman, a maker of viols and one of the first English makers of cellos, active between 1688 and 1746, and in partnership with Nathaniel Cross from 1715; Peter Wamsley, a violin maker from 1730 onwards, one of whose apprentices, Joseph Hill (1715-84) became the founder of the firm of W. E. Hill & Sons which is still carried on by his descendants; Richard Duke, who copied Stainer and Amati violins between c. 1750 and 1780; Thomas Cahusac, publisher, and maker of violins and flutes from 1755 to 1798; Robert Wornum (the elder), publisher, and maker of violins and cellos, and of the guitar-lyre between the 1770s and 1790s; Theobald Monzani, flute maker from 1790; George Astor, flute maker and publisher, who made the bass-horn (ophicleide) which had been invented by L. A. Frichot, a Frenchman settled in London about 1790; John Köhler, a bandmaster of German birth, who settled in London in 1780 and founded a firm for the making of brass instruments which was carried on by his descendants for nearly a hundred years; Edward Light, the inventor of the Apollo-lyre and the harp-lute (dital harp), c. 1794; John Parker, maker of wind instruments in Southwark in the 1790s; G. H. Rodenbostel, trumpet maker in Piccadilly from 1761 to 1789; John Betts and his nephew Edward Betts, violin makers at the turn of the century, and like the Dodd family of the same period, also makers of bows; Hart & Son, three generations of violin makers, the earliest of whom founded the firm in 1825; William Wheatstone, professor and manufacturer of the German flute in the 1820s; Sir Charles Wheatstone, the inventor of the concertina, for which his firm held the patent from 1829 for many years; Rudall, Carte & Co., makers of flutes from the early years of the 19th century; Georges Chanut (the younger), a violin maker who left Paris for London in 1851 and, after working there with Charles Maucotel, also a Frenchman, until 1858, established his own firm, which was subsequently carried on by his descendants; Boosey & Co., music publishers from 1816, and from the middle of the century also manufacturers of all types of band and orchestral instruments. Of the four principal English makers of modern clavichords and harpsichords two are in London: T. R. C. Goff and Hugh Gough.¹

EXHIBITIONS.—The exhibition in London of musical instruments for trade purposes is recorded from as early as 1771, when Americus Backers exhibited his "original Forte Piano" at the Thatched House (St. James's Street). In about 1791 Charles Clagget, an Irish violinist and instrument maker resident in London (Soho), publicly exhibited a collection of musical instruments of his own invention at the Hanover Square Rooms and also gave an "Attic Concert" at the King's Arms Tavern, Cornhill, in 1793 to display the musical qualities of his instruments. In the early years of the 19th century Angelo Benedetto Ventura, teacher of the guitar and harpsichord to Princess Charlotte of Wales, exhibited and played on his "Harp Ventura" at the National Repository, Royal Mews, Charing Cross. From 1817 onwards Flight & Robson displayed and demonstrated the Apollonicon at their rooms in St. Martin's Lane, and in 1851 Jonas Chickering of Boston, U.S.A., exhibited in London grand pianofortes with frames in one casing.

The first public loan collection of musical instruments belonging to private owners took place in London in 1872 with the Special Collection of Ancient Musical Instruments at South Kensington. Other musical exhibitions of the same kind since that date include the Loan Collection of Musical Instruments and Books held at the Royal Albert Hall in 1885 in connection with the Inventions Exhibition; the Military Exhibition at Chelsea in 1890; the Musical Art Exhibition at the Royal Aquarium in 1892; the Victorian Era Exhibition (especially musical literature) at Earl's

Court in 1897; the Musical Exhibition at the Crystal Palace in 1900, at which the collections of musical instruments were for the first time systematically arranged, and the Tercentenary Exhibition of the Musician's Company at Fishmongers' Hall in 1904.

COLLECTIONS OF INSTRUMENTS.—Musical instruments are preserved in London in museums open to the public; at educational institutions, where they are accessible on request; at the showrooms of firms of instrument makers; in private ownership.¹

LIBRARIES.—Music libraries in London are numerous and important. Full information will be found elsewhere.²

BELLS.—London was a city of bells from the 13th century, when the first recorded bell-foundries were started there, until the second world war, when many of its hundreds of peals were destroyed by enemy action. The art of change-ringing has flourished from time immemorial, but that of carillon playing has never become acclimatized. Two automatic carillons were installed in London in 1928: one at a shop in Old Bond Street and the other at a cinema at Marble Arch. The oldest existing association of bell-ringers in England is the Ancient Society of College Youths, formed in London in 1637 by a group of noblemen who held their practices at the Church of St. Martin, College Hill, Upper Thames Street, until it was burnt down during the Great Fire of London in 1666. LONDON ACADEMY OF MUSIC. Dr. Henry Wylde started a music school in London under this name in 1861, and in 1867 St. George's Hall, Langham Place, was opened to accommodate it. At his death in 1890 the school passed into the hands of Pollitzer, Raimo and Denza, and in 1904 it was amalgamated with three other teaching institutions: The London Music School (formerly called the London Organ School), founded in 1865 by the Rev. Scotson Clark, and after his death directed by Dr. T. H. Yorke Trotter; the Forest Gate College of Music, founded in 1885 by W. Harding Bonner (who became Chairman of the Board of Directors); and the Metropolitan College of Music, founded in 1889 by the Finsbury Choral Association at Finsbury Park, with C. J. Dale at its head. In 1905 the Hampstead Conservatory, founded in 1885 by G. F. Geaussen and subsequently directed by Cecil Sharp, was added to the number of amalgamated schools. The combined institutions finally came under the direction and style of The United Music Schools, Limited. J. A. F.-M.

LONDON CHORAL SOCIETY. This society, which gave its first concert in Oct. 1903 at the Queen's Hall, was founded and for many years conducted by Arthur Fagge, who died in 1943. Since its first season, when Elgar's 'Dream of Gerontius' was performed for the first time in a London concert-hall, the society's policy of performing the new and unfamiliar rather than relying on the usual repertory did much towards maintaining interest in choral singing in central London. Among works given which were new to London mention may be made of 'Omar Khayyám' (Bantock), 'Everyman' (Walford Davies) and 'Pied Piper' (Parry).

The President of the London Choral Society is now (1954) Sir Ronald Storrs, K.C.M.G., LL.D., the Chairman R. S. Elkin and the conductor John Tobin, under whom a memorable performance of Handel's 'Messiah', in its entirety and as far as possible in its original form, was given in St. Paul's Cathedral on 18 Mar. 1950. H. C. C., adds.

LONDON CONSORT OF VIOLS. An instrumental team formed in 1948 under the leadership of Harry Danks, in response to a suggestion made by John Low and Basil Lam, and sponsored by Sir Stuart Wilson, that the B.B.C. ought to have at its disposal a regularly available consort of viols. After a few lessons in basic technique from Betty Goble, the consort, of which Stanley Wooton, Jacqueline Townshend and Henry Revell were the other original members, trained itself to the point of giving some trial broadcasts. In 1949 Sylvia Putterill was brought in. All these five artists were members and Harry Danks principal viola of the B.B.C. Symphony Orchestra, studying the viol in their limited spare time. Early in 1950 the wish was felt for the co-operation of a musician with a specialized training in the interpretation of old music, and Robert Donington, a pupil of Arnold Dolmetsch, late Leverhulme Research Fellow into Stuart viol music and treble viol in the English Consort of Viols, was invited to join as musical editor and second bass. In 1951 Sylvia Putterill retired and Desmond Dupré took her place. The London Consort thus became a complete six-part consort or "chest" of viols, the members being Harry Danks (leader), treble; Stanley Wooton, treble; Jacqueline Townshend, tenor; Desmond Dupré, tenor; Henry Revell, bass; Robert Donington, bass.

The consort has specialized in the English chamber music for viols, especially its golden period under the early Stuarts and the Commonwealth and early Restoration (i.e. Gibbons to Purcell); but its repertory ranges from secular works by Josquin des Prés to 'The Art of Fugue' and 'The Musical Offering' by J. S. Bach. It also makes a practice of accompanying verse anthems, secular songs and other vocal works with parts for viols.

LONDON MOZART PLAYERS. The first appearance of the London Mozart Players was on 11 Feb. 1949 at the Wigmore Hall. The orchestra, which numbers some 25 to 30 players, according to the works performed, is led by Max Salpeter, and includes Dennis Brain, Gareth Morris, Sidney Sutcliffe and Cecil James, together with other soloists and chamber-music players. It was formed and is conducted by Harry Blech who, in the summer of 1950, dissolved the 17-year-old Blech String Quartet in order to fulfil increasingly numerous engagements with his orchestra.

Many works from the 17th to the 20th centuries have been performed, but a speciality has been made of music by Haydn and Mozart. During a series of broadcasts in the early weeks of 1951 Haydn's Symphonies Nos. 82 to 87 were played for the first time in England in the authentic edition published by the Haydn Society, and Haydn's horn Concerto in D major received its first known English performance in London, at Chelsea Town Hall, early in the same year.

The orchestra plays for the concerts of the Haydn-Mozart Society, whose aim is to present the less well-known works of these composers, and was engaged for a series of concerts at the Cambridge Festival in 1950 and in 1951 at Edinburgh. Such was the reputation won by conductor and orchestra that several months before the London Mozart Players' second birthday Harry Blech was invited to contribute one of the inaugural concerts at the Royal Festival Hall in London, on 9 May 1951. The following year, for the purpose of giving choral works on an appropriate scale, Blech formed the London Mozart Choir, a professional body of some forty voices.

LONDON MUSEUM CONCERTS. A series of concerts organized by Ernest Makower at the London Museum, at Lancaster House (formerly Stafford House), of which he was a trustee. Admission to the concerts was free on payment of the sixpence by which members of the public were admitted to the museum. The programmes of orchestral, choral and chamber music were of a high order and personally chosen by the concert-giver. Some forgotten works of the past were revived at these concerts. A series of pianoforte recitals by various leading pianists designed to illustrate the development of pianoforte music was an important feature. By such means care was taken that these programmes did not merely duplicate music constantly given elsewhere, while at the same time outstanding works by the great composers took their place in the scheme. Some first engagements of young artists of talent were made.

After the second world war Lancaster House came to be used for political conferences, and the admirable London Museum collection most unfortunately became inaccessible to the public there. The concerts too thus necessarily ceased.

LONDON MUSICAL SOCIETY. This society was formed in 1878 by Heathcote Long and other prominent London amateurs for "the practice and performance of the works of composers which are not generally known to the musical public" (Rule 2). Barnby was appointed musical director and Long and Alfred Littleton were honorary secretaries. An efficient choir was formed, and the first concert was given on 27 June 1879, in St. James's Hall, although, strictly speaking, the occasion was a private one. Goetz's Psalm CXXXVII was introduced to London at that concert, the solos being sung, as on many subsequent occasions, by competent amateurs.

From 1884 until the last season of the society's existence Heathcote Long was alone in the honorary secretaryship. After the season of 1886 Barnby was succeeded as conductor by Mackenzie, who conducted the final concert on 24 May 1887. In the course of that year the society was disbanded, and a sum of £100 was handed over from its funds to the R.C.M. During the nine years of its existence the institution performed some twenty choral and orchestral works for the first time in England, none very important, but all interesting either as novelties (Dvořák, Goetz, Gounod, Grieg, Rheinberger, etc.) or as minor and neglected works by great composers (Bach, Berthoven, Brahms, Schubert, Schumann).¹

LONDON PHILHARMONIC ORCHESTRA. This orchestra was formed by Sir Thomas Beecham in conjunction with several other musical interests, notably the Royal Philharmonic Society, the Robert Mayer Concerts for Children and the Courtauld-Sargent Concerts. It began its activities in the autumn of 1932, when it was engaged for the season of the Royal Philharmonic Society. It was thereafter employed by the organizations above mentioned, as well as for the Royal Opera summer season at Covent Garden and for the provincial Festivals at Leeds and Norwich, which Sir Thomas Beecham conducted, as well as for the Sheffield Festival of 1936, conducted by Sir Henry Wood. With this orchestra Beecham gave his several series of Sunday concerts in London before the second world war, and he took it on provincial tours and continental visits. Under his direction the London Philharmonic Orchestra gained a reputation in the first rank of European orchestras.

The war brought the association between conductor and orchestra to an end, and it was never renewed. The L.P.O. then became a self-governing organization engaging conductors of its own choice and, after a period of struggle caused mainly by war conditions, and a threat of deterioration due to casual conducting and lack of discipline, a new policy of engaging permanent conductors of eminence for no less than a whole season, did much to restore the orchestra to its original eminence. In 1949 a permanent conductor, Sir Adrian Boult, was again appointed.

LONDON SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY. An association formed on 6 Mar. 1848, after the dismissal of Surman from the post of conductor to the Sacred Harmonic Society. The Rev. George Roberts was president, Surman conductor, and the affairs of the society were managed by a committee. Six concerts were given in Exeter Hall during the year 1848, resulting in a loss of £394. The society lingered on for some years, and gave its last concert on 22 Dec. 1856 ('Messiah').

LONDON STRING QUARTET. Founded in 1908, this team stood for some twenty years in the forefront of quartet parties of British nationality. Its constitution varied from time to time, the original leader being Albert Sammons, who relinquished the post in favour of James Levey in July 1917. The original second violin was Thomas Petre, and he remained with the party except that during the 1914-18 war his post was taken successively by H. Wynn Reeves and Edwin Virgo. The viola, H. Waldo Warner, and the cellist, C. Warwick Evans, performed continuously from the beginning.

After two years of rehearsing a concert was given in London on 26 Jan. 1910, the first of a series with the dual object of reviving the glories of the old St. James's Hall popular concerts and of bringing modern and living composers' chamber music before the public. After 117 London concerts a three months' tour in the U.S.A. begun in Sept. 1920 received a welcome so unmistakably cordial that it was repeated in the years following, the tour in 1925 being the fifth. The quartet also visited many European countries.

LONDON SYMPHONIC PLAYERS. A training-orchestra for senior students established by Harry Blech in 1946 and serving as a bridge between the normal students' orchestras and the professional symphony orchestras. Though public concerts have been given, the orchestra does not concentrate on one programme for a long period in order to prepare for a public appearance, but different works, ranging from Bach to Bartók, are rehearsed each week. Not infrequently the students are joined informally by professional musicians who enjoy working with them or who wish to play an instrument or read a part different from their usual one.

Most of the work is done under the direction of Harry Blech, but from time to time other conductors are invited to take rehearsals. Ex-students who spent some time with the London Symphonic Players are to be found in every major orchestra in Britain, and several of these young players are already principals of their respective sections.

LONDON SYMPHONY. Two orchestral works are known under this name, though one only (2) was so entitled by the composer.

(1) Haydn's Symphony No. 104, in D minor and major, written in 1795. It is his last symphony and the twelfth of the dozen composed for Salomon in London. There is thus no good reason why it should have been singled out to bear the name of "London" Symphony.

(2) Vaughan Williams's second symphony, and his first purely orchestral one, No. 1 being the choral 'Sea Symphony'. The 'London Symphony' was composed in 1912 and first performed in London, at Queen's Hall, on 27 Mar. 1914. A revised version was first heard in the same hall on 4 May 1920.

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

This organization, which gave its first concert on 9 June 1904, was formed by a large number of players who had seceded from the Queen's Hall Orchestra. Their action was due principally to the vexed question as to the right to send deputies. As the Queen's Hall Orchestra was quickly re-formed, London and the musical public generally gained greatly by the establishment of two permanent orchestras of first-rate quality. The London Symphony Orchestra is run as a "commonwealth", the players sharing the risks and controlling the direction. It began operations with a series of symphony concerts conducted by Richter, and these were for many years continued regularly, although not necessarily under one conductor, the policy of the orchestra being to avail itself of any opportunity of engaging the best talent for the whole or part of the season.

The programmes maintained the usual orchestral repertory, while a number of new works by British and foreign composers found a place.

Richter was the principal conductor down to 1911, his last appearance being on 10 Apr. of that year. The list of conductors includes the names of Nikisch, Safonov, Arb s, Mlynarski, Kussevitsky, Elgar, Steinbach, Mengelberg, Beecham, Furtwangler, Sokolov, Goossens, Boult, Barbirolli, Busch, Malko, Weingartner, Kubelik, van Beinum and many others. In 1912 the orchestra toured America with Nikisch. It has been regularly engaged to take part in the Three Choirs Festival.

Towards the end of the 1920s the policy of self-government, which has its advantages, began to show corresponding drawbacks in a certain complacency leading to a temporary lowering of standards; but the competition of other London orchestras of first-rate qualities induced the L.S.O. to plan anew. W. H. Reed became chairman in 1935 when he gave up the leadership of the orchestra at its Queen's Hall concerts, and was succeeded in that position by George Stratton. At about that time some reorganization of the membership of the orchestra was effected, and it had the benefit of Sir Hamilton Harty's experience as a conductor.

In 1945 the orchestra reorganized itself as a "non-profit-distributing company" under the presidency of Sir William Walton and entered into association with the Arts Council. The policy of inviting a chief conductor led to the engagement of Eduard van Beinum for 1948-49 and of Josef Krips from Nov. 1950.

LONDON TRIO. A trio team formed in 1901 by the pianist Amina Goodwin, with Achille Simonetti as violinist and William Edward Whitehouse as violoncellist. In 1912 Louis P cskai took Simonetti's place, and he was temporarily replaced, while serving in the British Army, by Albert Sammons. In 1925 Whitehouse was succeeded by Lebell. Subscription concerts at which all the important pianoforte trios were performed, were initiated in 1905, and in twenty years they had reached over 100 programmes. The Trio also toured in France and Italy.

LONDON WIND PLAYERS. In 1942 Dame Myra Hess invited Harry Blech to conduct a programme of serenades for wind instruments at the National Gallery lunch-time concerts in London. Blech then formed the London Wind Players, recruited from the finest solo and orchestral instrumentalists, and conducted them in public for the first time at the National Gallery on 19 Aug. 1942.

During the second world war the team performed at the Churchill Club, and it has broadcast many times. In addition to the Mozart Serenades for eight and thirteen instruments, the specialized repertory includes music by J. C. Bach, Beethoven, Dvoř k and Richard Strauss. Gordon Jacob's Serenade for wind, written for the London Wind Players, received its first performance during the 1950 Cambridge Summer Festival at a serenade concert in the first court of Clare College. Richard Arnell has dedicated a work to the team, and a Serenade by Franz Reizenstein, written for the Cheltenham Festival, was played there in 1951. J. R.

LONG (Lat. longa, notula caudata). The note intermediate in value between the Large and the Breve in the early system of measured music:

(The black form is the earlier.) It could be triple or duple (i.e. equalling three or two breves), according to the mood. In early printed music the Long usually supplants the Large in its function of indicating an indefinite pause on the last note of a composition, i.e. used as a fermata, and both in printed music and manuscripts it was a conventional form for the last note of a section. Marbeck in his 'Booke of Common Praier Noted' (1550) uses it thus at the end of a verse and calls it a "close". The Duplex Longa of the Franconian Treatises is another name for the Large. It does not mean double long as opposed to triple long, but a long of double the usual length.

LONG, Kathleen (b. Brentford, Middlesex, 7 July 1896).

English pianist. She won an open scholarship in London, at the R.C.M., in 1910 and has been a member of the teaching-staff there since 1920. Her sensitive touch, combined with a strong musical intelligence, have earned her special acceptance as a player of Mozart, but she has avoided any narrow specializing and is a concert pianist, of whom there are all too few, who has steadily set herself to promote the understanding of modern compositions. She has given many first performances of works by Bloch, Holst, Frank Bridge and other younger composers. She excels as a chamber-music player and formed her own quartet of pianoforte and strings known as The English Ensemble. Kathleen Long, besides being well known in England, has played extensively in many countries on the continent of Europe and in the U.S.A. and Canada.

Although anxious not to turn herself into a specialist, Kathleen Long became well known during the 1940s as a particularly fine exponent of French music. Her interpretations of the pianoforte parts in d'Indy's 'Symphonie sur un chant montagnard', Fauré's 'Ballade', Ravel's G major Concerto, French chamber music of the late 19th and early 20th centuries, and her solo performances of Franck, Fauré, Debussy, Ravel and others, are exemplary and have earned her as great a reputation in France as in her own country.

H. C. C., adds.

LONG, Marguerite (Marie Charlotte) (b. Nîmes, 13 Nov. 1874).

French pianist. She first studied the pianoforte with her sister and then at the Nîmes Conservatory. She later entered the Paris Conservatoire and at the end of her first year obtained the first prize for pianoforte playing. While still studying under Antonin Marmontel she started on a career as virtuoso and teacher which proved brilliant. In 1906 she was put in charge of the preparatory pianoforte classes at the Conservatoire, and in 1920 she succeeded Louis Diémer as professor of the instrument. At the same time she started a private school, which soon proved a great success and numbers among its pupils such pianists as Jean Doyen and Jacques Février.

Apart from her brilliant interpretations of classical and romantic masters, Marguerite Long has devoted a great deal of time and energy to making known the music of her contemporaries. Works by Fauré, Debussy and Ravel, among many others, are dedicated to her and were first played in public by her. During her tours in Europe and South America she frequently played, sometimes under the direction of the composer, the G major Concerto by Ravel, which is dedicated to her. She has also lectured on modern French music in France and abroad.

Marguerite Long is the widow of Joseph de Marliave, killed in 1914, the author, among other books, of an outstanding work, 'Les Quatuors de Beethoven', published in 1925, with a preface by Gabriel Fauré. G. S.

LONG, Samuel (b. ?; d. ?).

English 18th-century organist and composer. He wrote glees and catches, including the 3-part prize glee 'Where'er you tread' (1764, for the Catch Club), psalms in Riley's collection, four lessons and two voluntaries for the harpsichord or organ (1770) and a song for the Mall (1761). W. H. H.

LONGAS, Federico (b. Barcelona, 18 Aug. 1895).

Spanish pianist and composer. He studied under Malats and Granados at Barcelona and toured widely both as soloist and as accompanist for his wife, the singer Margarita Salvi. He founded a pianoforte school, the Academia Longas, at Barcelona, but later on settled in Paris. His compositions are mainly pianoforte pieces, often in the Spanish manner, and songs, among which 'La guinda', 'Muñequita' and others became very popular.

LONGHURST, John Alexander (b. London, 1809; d. London, 1855).

English composer. He studied under John Watson, musical director at Covent Garden Theatre in London, and on 22 Apr. 1820 came out at Covent Garden as the Page in Bishop's 'Henri Quatre' and gained great popularity by his singing in the duet "My pretty page" with Miss Stephens. During that and the next four years Bishop composed original parts for him in 'Montrose', 'The Two Gentlemen of Verona', 'Maid Marian', 'Clari', 'The Beacon of Liberty' and 'As You Like It', besides giving him the boys' parts in 'The Miller and his Men', 'The Slave', etc., which he had formerly written for Gladstones and Barnett. Early in 1826 he was allotted the part of Puck in Weber's 'Oberon', then in preparation; but shortly afterwards, while in the middle of a popular ballad, 'The Robin's Petition', his voice suddenly broke, and he was compelled to relinquish singing. Weber mentions the event in a letter to his wife, 9 Mar. 1826: "The young fellow who was to have sung Puck has lost his voice, but I have a charming girl, who is very clever and sings capitally". After a short time Longhurst became known as a teacher of singing and the pianoforte, and an excellent accompanist.

LONGHURST, William Henry (b. London [Lambeth], 6 Oct. 1819; d. Canterbury, 17 June 1904).

English organist and composer, brother of the preceding. He was admitted a chorister of Canterbury Cathedral on 6 Jan. 1828, under Highmore Skeats, sen., having afterwards Stephen Elvey and Thomas Evance Jones as his masters. In 1836 he was appointed lay-clerk and assistant organist of the cathedral. In 1865 he was one of the earliest Fellows of the College of Organists. On 26 Jan. 1873 he was chosen to succeed Jones as organist and master of the choristers. He retired in 1898, after a period of seventy years' service in the cathedral. His doctor's degree was conferred on him by the Archbishop of Canterbury (Tait) on 6 Jan. 1875. His compositions consist of anthems, services, songs, etc., and a manuscript oratorio, 'David and Absalom'.

LONGMAN & BRODERIP. A well-known firm of London music publishers during the latter half of the 18th century. The business was founded in or before 1767, when James Longman with others, as J. Longman & Co., were established at the Harp & Crown, 26 Cheapside. The sign of the Harp & Crown was that also of another Cheapside music publisher, John Johnson, but Longman's was nearer St. Paul's and on the opposite side of the road, i.e. the south side, between Friday Street and Mitre Court.

In 1769 the house became known as Longman, Lukey & Co. (with a temporary address at 45 St. Paul's Church Yard in 1771), and this title remained until 1775, when, Francis Broderip entering, it was styled Longman, Lukey & Broderip. In 1776 Lukey's name is absent, and the firm remained as Longman & Broderip until 1798. In 1783 an additional address was at 13 Haymarket. In 1798 the firm became bankrupt, and John Longman, who had succeeded the original James, held a partnership with Muzio Clementi at the old address, 26 Cheapside, until 1801; while the other partner, Francis Broderip, entered into partnership with C. Wilkinson at 13 Haymarket.¹

John Longman had left Clementi in 1801 and set up for himself at 131 Cheapside, where he remained until 1816 and was succeeded by Longman & Herron, the partners being Giles Longman and James Herron, who continued in business until 1822.

The first James Longman and Longman & Lukey issued much music now of an interesting antiquarian character, while Longman & Broderip's publications embrace a wide range of musical productions. They were also makers, in great quantity, of spinets and harpsichords, pianofortes and the smaller class of musical instruments. Their catalogues chronicle an immense variety of these, and some curious items are mentioned, such as "Glove horns", "Sticcado pastorals", "pipes and tabors" (1781-82); also "up-right harpsichords with a curious new invented swell", "pianofortes in commodes, sideboards and dressing-tables for convenience of small rooms" (1786); and in the 1789 catalogue is "Portable Clavecins . . . agreeable for travelling with, as they may be conveyed and even performed on in a coach".

LONGO, Achille (b. Naples, 28 Mar. 1900).

Italian composer. He is the son of Alessandro Longo and studied at the Naples Conservatory, where he obtained diplomas in pianoforte and organ playing as well as composition. He also took a laureate in law. From 1926 to 1930 he taught harmony at the Naples Conservatory, and afterwards at that of Parma. In 1934 he returned to Naples as teacher of counterpoint at the Conservatory, where he has been teaching composition since 1940.

Grown up in a musical environment (his sister Myriam too was educated as a pianist), he early began to compose. For a long time his creative work too obviously showed his academic studies, but his more recent compositions reveal greater freedom of conception and idiom. Among them may be mentioned in particular a Requiem for solo voices, chorus and orchestra (1947), 'Notturmo' and 'Corteo' for orchestra (1942), a violin Concerto (1937), a Quintet for strings and pianoforte (1934), a Sonatina for oboe and pianoforte, and numerous pianoforte works and songs. His latest orchestral work, 'Serenata in do', obtained the second prize of Trieste in 1950. He has also written film music.

G. M. G.

LONGO, Alessandro (b. Amantea, 30 Dec. 1864; d. Naples, 3 Nov. 1945).

Italian pianist, composer and musical editor, father of the preceding. He was a pupil of Beniamino Cesi and P. Serrao; at an early age he was made professor for pianoforte at the Naples Conservatory. The founder of the Cercolo Scarlatti and the Società del Quartetto at Bologna, he also edited 'Arte pianistica', a monthly review on musical matters, though chiefly devoted to pianoforte music. His compositions are of classical tendencies, and many of them are excellent imitations of the style of old Italian masters with a certain influence of German classicism and romanticism clearly visible. They comprise many works for pianoforte, a Quintet and several suites. He edited and published the complete (or all but complete) works of Domenico Scarlatti for harpsichord (in 11 vols.) and many editions of old Italian keyboard music.

Dutch conductor. He was a student at the Basel Conservatory under Weingartner. In 1931 he founded the much-needed Dutch chamber orchestra at The Hague, by means of which he was able to introduce many important new works to Holland. Glastra van Loon also became conductor of several choral societies at Rotterdam, where he succeeded Evert Cornelis, and director of the music school at Dordrecht. H. E. E.

LOOSEMORE. English family of organ experts.

(1) Henry Loosemore (b. ?; d. Cambridge, 1670). He was a chorister in one of the Cambridge colleges, afterwards lay-clerk there and from 1627 to his death organist of King's College Chapel.¹ He graduated Mus.B. at Cambridge in 1640. There is a composition by Loosemore for "3 vials to the organs" (B.M., Add. MSS 34,800). His church music includes a Service in D minor for 4, 5 and 6 voices (B.M., Harl. MS 7337), two Latin litanies (D minor and G minor) printed in Jebb's 'Choral Responses and Litanies' (Peterhouse, Cambridge) and anthems at Durham, Peterhouse and B.M.

(2) John Loosemore (b. ?; d. ?, 1681), son or possibly brother of the preceding. He built the organ of Exeter Cathedral in 1665. Parts of his work still remain in that organ, and the case, which bears that date, is one of the finest in England.

(3) George Loosemore (b. Cambridge, ?; d. Cambridge, ? 1682), son of Henry (1). He was a chorister at King's College, Cambridge, under his father and in 1660 became organist of Trinity College, retaining the post until 1682. He took the Mus.B. degree at Cambridge in 1665. Anthems by him include 'Glory be to God on high' (B.M., Harl. MS 7339), described as "a hymn composed by Mr. George Loosemore, organist of Trinity College, Cambridge, at the Restauration [1660]", and others are in B.M., Add. MSS 34,203. W. H. H., adds. J. M. (ii).

LOOTS, Philip (b. Amsterdam, 22 Aug. 1865; d. Haarlem, 31 July 1916).

Dutch organist and composer. He studied at the Royal Conservatory at The Hague and already in 1882 had settled at Haarlem as an organist. Here he also became conductor of a Catholic choral society and music critic for a local newspaper. His church music is notable not only for its charm and purity of style, but also for the way in which he alternated unaccompanied passages with organ solos. His songs and children's songs have a high reputation in his own country. II. A.

LOPATNIKOV, Nikolay Lvovich (b. Reval [now Tallinn, Esthonia], 16 Mar. 1903).

Russian pianist and composer. He began his professional education at the St. Petersburg Conservatory, studying the pianoforte under B. Sakharov and theory under Zhitomirsky. The family left Russia for Finland after the 1917 Revolution, and in 1920 Lopatnikov settled in Germany, where he became a pupil of Willi Rehberg for the pianoforte and of Hermann Grabner and Ernest Toch for composition. Among his earliest works were a pianoforte Concerto (Op. 5), performed in Berlin with himself as soloist, and a string Quartet (Op. 4), performed at Karlsruhe. From 1929 to 1933 he lived in Berlin. He then left Germany for Finland, where he received advice from Sibelius. His second pianoforte Concerto (Op. 15) was performed at the I.S.C.M. Festival, Vienna, 1933, and his first Symphony (Op. 12) met with success in Germany and in the U.S.A. His output consists almost exclusively of instrumental music, but he composed one opera (unpublished), 'Danton', after the play by Romain Rolland.

It is difficult to imagine how he would have developed had he not left Russia at an early age. He told the American critic David Ewen that he considered himself influenced at first by Borodin's and Mussorgsky's music, and later by Stravinsky's and Hindemith's. It is mainly in later works, however, that signs of the earlier influences he mentions are discoverable. In all the rest affinities with Hindemith and the Central European atonalists are obvious, and his experiments in rhythmic effects and dissonant combinations recall Stravinsky's of the same period. In fact, he experimented on those lines to a greater extent than his musical nature seemed to warrant: consequently the works of his early and intermediate period, although betokening an alert mind and an inborn capacity for vigour of expression, contain much that is hard in colour and makes for stiffness. He has a genuine capacity for melodic invention, especially in meditative moods, which manifests itself freely in his latest compositions. Like many composers of to-day, he gradually simplified his style, and he is no longer an uncompromising atonalist.

Typical examples of his mature manner are the string Trio, Op. 23 (1935-36), containing many elements that are thoroughly Russian in character, although treated in a way showing the influence of western tradition rather than that of the 19th-century Russian nationalists; the sets of short pianoforte pieces 'Contrasts' (Op. 15) and 'Dialogues' (Op. 18), and the second Symphony (1937-38). His other principal works are: second string Quartet (Op. 6; awarded the Belayev prize); Introduction and Scherzo for orchestra (Op. 8); Sonata for violin and pianoforte, with side-drum ad libitum (Op. 9; performed in many countries); cello sonata (Op. 11); 3 pieces for violin and pianoforte (Op. 17); suite from the opera 'Danton' (Op. 20), 6 Variations for orchestra (Op. 22).

LOPES GRAÇA, Fernando (b. Tomar, 17 Dec. 1906).

Portuguese musical scholar and composer. He took his first pianoforte lessons in his home town, and in 1924 went to Lisbon where he attended the Conservatory with brilliant results, studying under Viana da Mota, Adriano Mereia, Tomás Borba and L. Freitas Branco. At the same time he went to the Lyceum and later followed the courses of the Faculty of Arts, first in Lisbon (1928) and then at Coimbra (1932), specializing in philosophy and history. In 1929 he made his début as composer at a concert devoted to works by students of the Conservatory, playing his own 'Variações sobre um tema popular português' and conducting his 'Poemeto' for string orchestra. He founded at Tomar the newspaper 'Acção' and in 1930 took part in launching in Lisbon the review 'De Musica', thus embarking on his intense activity as a journalist and author. At the same time he continued his work as a composer and for the first time in Portugal systematically applied atonal and polytonal principles.

In 1931, on finishing his musical studies, Lopes Graça competed for the pianoforte professorship at the Lisbon Conservatory, taking first place. He was not, however, appointed, owing to his opposition to the existing political régime. He was already under arrest by the political police on finishing his examination and was later exiled to the village of Alpiarça. But in 1932 he became professor of the Academia de Musica de Coimbra (now Instituto de Musica), where he remained until 1936. There he came under the influence of the aesthetic movement of the literary and artistic group of the review 'Presença', and set to music some of its most representative poetry, this period being mainly characterized by his writing of songs.

In 1934, in spite of having won a scholarship of the Junta de Educação Nacional, he was not allowed to leave for Paris, again owing to his political tendencies. In 1936 he was once more arrested, and he was tried and condemned in 1937. In the same year he went to Paris at his own expense, having been invited to take part in the Congress of the Society for Musical Education of Prague, which took place at the Exposition Internationale de Paris, where he lectured on the subject of music suited to childhood and youth. In Paris he attended the classes of musical history at the Sorbonne and worked with Charles Koechlin at orchestration and composition. At the request of the Maison de la Culture he wrote the music for the ballet 'La Fièvre du temps', and at the suggestion of Lucie Dewinsky, the singer, he harmonized Portuguese folksongs. These harmonizations mark a turning-point in the composer's style as regards imparting to Portuguese music a manner of its own.

In 1939 the second world war compelled Lopes Graça to return to Portugal, where he settled in Lisbon and developed a great activity as composer, dramatic and musical critic, pianist, organizer of popular choirs (for which he harmonized folksongs), conductor, publicist and translator. In 1942 he founded in Lisbon an organization called Sonata, for the diffusion of modern music, which became in 1947 the Portuguese section of the I.S.C.M. His activity as a teacher includes both private lessons and a professorship at the Academia de Amadores de Musica, where he is also choir-master, and as such, as well as conductor, took part in the bicentenary commemorations of the death of Bach (Lisbon, 1950).

Lopes Graça's compositions show three phases: the first, inclined to an aesthetic rooted in folksong, which is manifest in his first work, 'Variações sobre um tema popular português' (1929), but which he later abandoned for a cosmopolitan aesthetic revealing the influence of Schoenberg, Stravinsky and Hindemith; after 1937 he decided definitely, in the wake of Falla and Bartók, in favour of a strictly national music, making the most of native melodic, harmonic and rhythmic elements. However, his earlier experience gives to his music a universality which completely transcends mere folklore by the fusion of the elements referred to, in a language formed by the most important conquests of present-day music. Technically, this latest phase is based mainly on modal and polytonal tendencies. This musical evolution accompanies an ever closer attachment to the new currents of thought which in Portugal, as elsewhere, consider art and culture as socially interactive, a conception which is manifest in his activities and writings, and from which spring, in collaboration with the poets of these currents, his songs for popular choral groups. He three times won the prize for musical composition instituted by the concert society Círculo de Cultura Musical: 1940 (first pianoforte Concerto), 1942 ('Historia tragico-marítima'), 1944 (Symphony). The first performance of the Concerto took place in 1941, conducted by Pedro Freitas Branco, with the Spanish pianist Leopoldo Querol as soloist.

As critic and musicologist Lopes Graça has contributed much to the discussion of musical problems and the awakening of general interest in music, including its various modern tendencies. He has contributed essays and critical reviews to various periodicals, such as 'Seara Nova', 'Presença', 'Revista de Portugal', 'Diabo' and 'Vertice'. He is a member of the Société Française de Musicologie. In 1947 he received the title of Ami de la Ville de Paris, conferred by the Hôtel de Ville of that city. He took part in the Wroclaw Peace Congress in 1948. In 1950 he founded, jointly with the author of this article, the monthly periodical on musical subjects, 'Gazeta Musical', which has Luis de Freitas Branco as its director. His literary works include the following:

- 'Ensaio sobre a evolução das formas musicais' (1941).
- 'Reflexões sobre a música' (1941).

LÓPEZ BUCHARDO, Carlos (b. Buenos Aires, 12 Oct. 1881; d. Buenos Aires, 21 Apr. 1948).

Argentine composer. He studied at Buenos Aires and later in Paris with Roussel. His only stage work, 'Il sogno di alma', was produced at the Teatro Colón and his two musical comedies 'Madame Lynch' and 'La Perichona' were put on at other Buenos Aires theatres. Among his symphonic works the 'Escenas argentinas' are still played, and many of his songs and instrumental pieces are very popular in Argentina.

López BucharDO was at one time president of the Sociedad Nacional de Música and director of the Escuela Superior de Bellas Artes of the Universidad Nacional de La Plata. At the time of his death he was director of the Conservatorio Nacional de Música y Arte Escénico in Buenos Aires. He married Brígida Frías, a well-known soprano singer. N. F.

LÓPEZ DE VELASCO, Sebastián (b. Segovia, ?; d. ? Madrid, ?).

Spanish 16th-17th-century composer. In 1628 he was maestro de capilla to the Infanta Juana in the convent (Descalzas Reales) founded by her in Madrid, a post formerly (1586-1603) occupied by Victoria.

The printed works by López de Velasco are entitled 'Libro de Missas, Motetes, Salmos, Magníficas y otras cosas tocante al culto divino', 8 partbooks (Madrid, 1628). Copies are in the Bibl. Nac., Madrid, Bibl. de la Diputación, Barcelona and Bibl. Patriarcal, Valencia. J. B. T.

LOPUSKA-WYLEŻYŃSKA, Helena (b. Warsaw, 1877; d. Warsaw, 1920).

Polish pianist and composer. She published several songs, pianoforte pieces and some orchestral music. She also composed a cantata for chorus and orchestra, 'Smutno mi Boże' ('How sad I am, O Lord').

LOQUEVILLE, Richard (de) (b. ?; d. ? Cambrai, 1418).

Netherlands or French singer and composer. He was a singer at the court of Robert, Duc de Bar, about 1407-10 and taught the duke's son to play the harp. In 1412 he was choir-master at Cambrai Cathedral in succession to Nicolas Malin, and he remained there apparently until his death. He must have died before 25 June 1418, since a payment made by his widow for candles for his Requiem mass is mentioned as having been made on that day.

Compositions: 3 pieces of the ordinarium missae, 2 motets and 5 chansons, preserved at Oxford (Bodl. Can. misc. 213), Bologna (Liceo Musicale, 37), Trent, Vienna (codex 87) and Munich (Mus. 3232a). A piece of the ordinarium missae ('Et in terra pax') is reprinted by C. van den Borren (see Bibl.) and a chanson by E. Dannemann (see Bibl.). The chansons are interesting in that they tend to a concise pulsating rhythm, which came into being shortly after 1400, emerging from 14th-century rhythmic anarchy. E. D. (ii).

LORELEY, DIE. Unfinished opera by Mendelssohn, on the composition of which he was engaged at the time of his death. The libretto, by Emanuel von Geibel, was published in 'Dem Andenken Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdys' (Hanover, 1861). The completed and published portions are a finale to the first act (performed at Leipzig and at the Birmingham Festival, 8 Sept. 1852, in an English adaptation by Bartholomew), an 'Ave Maria' and a vintners' chorus.

The subject of this German legend has been treated by several other composers, including Ignaz Lachner (libretto by Molitor, Munich, 1846); Vincent Wallace, under the title of 'Lurline' (libretto by Edward Fitzball, London, 1860); Max Bruch (the original Geibel libretto, Mannheim, 1863); Catalani, under the title of 'Elda' (libretto by Carlo d'Ormeville and Angelo Zanardini, Turin, 1880); Adolph Mohr (1884); Johann Bartholdy (1887); Hans Sommer (libretto by Gustav Gurski) (Brunswick, 1891). LORENZ, Alfred (Ottokar) (b. Vienna, 11 July 1868; d. Munich, 20 Nov. 1939).

German conductor and musical historian. He started his career as a conductor. After working at Königsberg, Elberfeld and Munich, he went in 1898 to Coburg, where, six years later, he became principal conductor, and in 1917 Generalmusikdirektor. At the age of fifty-two Lorenz gave up conducting to devote himself to historical research. In 1922 he graduated Ph.D. at Frankfurt o/M., offering as a thesis 'Die musikalische Formgebung in Richard Wagner's Ring des Nibelungen'. In the following year he became a lecturer and three years later a professor at the Munich University.

Lorenz's main work is the valuable study, based on his thesis and entitled 'Das Geheimnis der Form bei Richard Wagner' (I. 'Ring des Nibelungen', 1924; II. 'Tristan und Isolde', 1926; III. 'Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg', 1930; IV. 'Parsifal', 1933). This is one of the most important studies of Wagner's technique in composition. In 1938 Lorenz edited 'Wagners ausgewählte Schriften'. The study of Wagner led him to investigate other operatic composers. He wrote 'Alessandro Scarlatti's Jugendopern' (1927) and edited Weber's early operas for the collected edition of that master (1926). He is also the author of studies with a philosophical tendency, such as 'Abendlandische Musikgeschichte im Rhythmus der Generationen' (1928). Lorenz composed an opera, several orchestral works, pianoforte music and songs.

K. G.

LORENZ, Franz (b. Stein, Lower Austria, 4 Apr. 1805; d. Wiener Neustadt, 8 Apr. 1883).

Austrian physician and writer on music. He took his doctor's degree in 1831. Like many other physicians he did much for music, and his publications are of special interest and value: 'In Sachen Mozarts' (Vienna, 1851), much praised by Köchel in his Mozart Catalogue (Preface, p. xvii); 'Haydn, Mozart und Beethovens Kirchenmusik. . .'; 'W. A. Mozart als Clavier-Componist' (Breslau, 1866); various accurate and interesting contributions on Mozart, Beethoven and Haydn, to the 'Deutsche Musik-Zeitung' ¹, 1861, 1862; the 'Wiener Zeitung' ², 3 Aug. 1850, 16 Aug. 1863.³ It is to Lorenz that we owe Krenn's important account of Beethoven's last autumn, and the other anecdotes.

C. F. P.

LORENZ, Max (b. Düsseldorf, 10 May 1902).

German tenor singer. He studied with F. Grenzebach in Berlin, as a young man won a prize offered by one of the Berlin daily papers and was engaged by Fritz Busch for the Dresden State Opera in 1928. His success as Menelaus in Strauss's 'Aegyptische Helena' induced that composer to recommend him for the same part to the Berlin State Opera, and he left Dresden for that theatre in 1933. In 1931 he visited New York for the first time, singing Lohengrin to the Elsa of Maria Jeritza at the Metropolitan Opera, and he early appeared as guest artist at the Vienna State Opera, also revisiting that of Dresden. From 1933 to 1943 he sang Tristan and Siegfried at the Bayreuth festival performances. His first success in Vienna was in Heger's 'Bettler Namenlos', and he became a permanent member of the Opera there in 1937. After the second world war he repeatedly visited the Metropolitan in New York, the Teatro Colón in Buenos Aires and Mexico City; also Milan and Rome, where he sang both Verdi and Wagner in Italian. He is especially famous for his interpretation of Wagner's heroic tenor parts, but does no less justice to those of Beethoven, Weber, Verdi and Strauss. His festival engagements have taken him to Florence, Amsterdam, Zoppot, Paris and Zürich. He holds the title of Austrian Chamber Singer.

LORENZANI, Paolo (b. Rome, 1640; d. Rome, 28 Oct. 1713).

Italian composer. He was a pupil of the maestro di cappella of the Vatican, Orazio Benevoli, and early showed himself in possession of original talent and a solid style. He began a career as maestro di cappella outside his native city (possibly at Turin), but, Benevoli having died in 1672, Lorenzani returned to Rome to scheme for his office. His fellow-pupil Bernabei was preferred to him, but he gained, at all events, the post of "maestro di cappella di Gesù e seminario romano". He held this important musical post at the Jesuit College for several years, until 1675 apparently, when he accepted from a Sicilian delegation who had come to Rome to engage a maestro the equally important post at the cathedral of Messina. It was just at the moment when the citizens of that town revolted against the Spaniards, a revolt which gave to Louis XIV, already engaged in wars against the whole of Europe, an opportunity of helping the despatch of an expeditionary force.

Marshal de Vivonne, who became viceroy of Sicily, appreciated Lorenzani, and when the time of evacuation came after the overtures of peace in 1678, he engaged him to go and seek his fortune in France. Lorenzani took passage on a vessel of the French fleet at the same time as those inhabitants of Messina who were prominently involved in the revolution and who dared not expose themselves to the vengeance of the returning Spaniards.

Thanks to the influence of Vivonne and of his sisters, Mmes de Montespan and de Thianges, Lorenzani succeeded at the court of Louis XIV. He arrived in Aug. 1678, was presented, had one of his motets performed with success, and ten months later (May 1679), thanks to the personal intervention of the king, he was able to buy from Jean-Baptiste Boësset one of the two posts of maître de musique to the queen. The following month he went on a mission to Italy, officially with the object of engaging five castrati for the music of the chapel, but also without doubt to arrange his personal affairs. He returned in Dec., and in the following years a number of his compositions were performed before the king or court, and all were well received: pastorals, serenades, Italian airs, motets, dance airs, instrumental pieces. His first opera, 'Nican-dro e Fileno', was produced before the court at Fontainebleau in Sept. 1681. The libretto was by Filippo Mancini-Mazarini, Duc de Nevers, Cardinal Mazarin's nephew.

The 'Mercure', jealously hostile to Lully and his monopoly of the Opéra, saw in Lorenzani a champion of Italian music, a rival to the surintendant, and never lost an opportunity of praising him. Lully, on the other hand, who had made great efforts to create a purely French music, and, until then, had succeeded in destroying all recollection of the Italian influence which had been so strong at the time of Mazarin, did not view with any satisfaction the arrival of this Roman musician. Their quarrel, however, owing to diplomatic intervention, never came to open hostility. But the death of the queen (July 1683) gave a fatal blow to Lorenzani's fortunes in depriving him of his place at court. On 20 June 1685 he accepted as a waiting post the employment of maître de chapelle to the convent of the Théatins — an Italian order, a branch of which had been established in Paris by Mazarin. His motets were the best-known of his works; they were esteemed by amateurs with those of Du Mont, Lalouette and Lully himself. They made the success of the famous Wednesdays at the 'Théatins' "Saluts en musique", to which both court and townspeople went eagerly for almost ten years.

However, in spite of the death of Lully (Mar. 1687), Lorenzani did not readily find access to the king. The French musicians jealously barred the way. Nevertheless, he found means to present an opera with French words — his only one — 'Orontée', which the Prince de Condé had ordered for the festivities at Chantilly in the summer of that year. It was given on 23 Aug. and the libretto was by Michel Leclerc, translated from Cicognini's Italian one, 'Orontea', set by Cesti in 1649. In spite of good mounting and playing by the Académie de Musique, this opera, on which the composer had founded such great hopes, had no success. His failure was due far more to the absurd libretto than to the music, of which the score unhappily has never been recovered. A few years later Lorenzani embarked again on another scheme which was to cost him very dear. He began to publish his motets (1693) in sumptuous editions (Ballard). In his dedication to the king he let it appear that he hoped to be employed afresh by him. This work sold badly, and Brossard says that the very cause which should have favoured it was of disservice. Lorenzani's motets were too famous; too many copies of them had been already distributed for the maîtres de chapelle to rush to acquire them in this expensive edition.

Then Lorenzani dreamed of returning to his own country. The post of maestro di cappella at St. Peter's in Rome, for which he had schemed years before, was vacant by the death of Francesco Beretta. It was offered to him, he accepted and was nominated 19 July 1694, in the centenary year of the death of his illustrious predecessor Palestrina. After Lorenzani had left France, Ballard published a collection of Italian airs which had a great success. In Rome Lorenzani, director of the Cappella Giulia and guardiano dei maestri of the congregation of St. Cecilia, had a brilliant career of close on twenty years. He died at the age of seventy-three and was buried, like Benevoli, at San Spirito in Sassia.

Lorenzani's works, which the circumstances of his life attach at one time to the history of Italian music and at another to that of French music, are valuable. His vocal compositions to Italian words, cantatas, detached airs, serenades, etc., denote a musician of the Roman school and a follower of Carissimi. But his melody, more luscious and with a subtly refined symmetry, his finished harmony, his little developed recitatives indicate that he belonged to an epoch of transition and allow him to be considered as one of the most interesting representatives of the bel canto links between Carissimi and Bononcini. His music to French words is more curious, because it shows that he knew (in order to succeed in France) how to adapt his style to that of Lully as far as he wished; his airs, in the style of Ballard's collections, are in no way distinguished from those of other contemporary composers of works in the same manner. Nevertheless, the motets of his Parisian period take their place in the literature of the French classical motet, alternating solos, chorus and symphonic ritornelli. They hold an important place and are worthy of the favour in which they were held by the public.

The following printed works are known:

- 'Motets à I, II, III, IV et V parties. Avec symphonies et basse continue par Monsieur Lorenzani, maître de musique de la feuë Reyne' (Paris, Ballard, 1693), containing 25 motets.
- Other motets in the collective volumes 'Scelta di motetti sacri . . . a due e tre voci' (Rome, 1675) and 'Sacri concerti . . . a due e tre voci' (Bologna, 1675).
- 'Airs italiens de Monsieur Lorenzani, maître de la musique de la feuë Reyne' (Paris, 1690), containing 6 airs.
- Other airs in 'Airs italiens composez par les plus célèbres auteurs . . . recueillis par les sieurs Fossard et Philidor l'aîné' (Paris, 1695).
- An air by "M. Laurencin" (probably Lorenzani), 'Printemps, ne reviens plus', in the 'Mercure galant' (May 1680).
- An air sérieux, 'Quand mon destin, belle Silvie', in 'Airs sérieux et à boire' (Paris, 1696).
- Air, "Tornami in petto, speranza cara", from 'L'Empeur dans la lune' (1684), in 'Théâtre italien de Gherardi' (Paris, 1700).
- 'Scène du sommeil de Filli' from the opera 'Nicandro e Fileno', ed. by Henry Prunières (Rev. Mus., Aug. 1922).

Manuscripts of airs and cantatas are preserved in the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris (Brossard Collection), and outside that collection, treble parts of the overture and the dance airs of the opera 'Orontée' (with a false attribution to Carissimi), the only known fragment of this part.

Fétis points to Rome (after Baini) for some manuscript Psalms for 4 choirs and also a volume of Magnificats for 9 voices which would have been printed there in 1690. Q.-L., on the other hand, indicates manuscript works in the Library of Modena. The mention which is there made to an oratorio 'Dimna' in the Bibliothèque Mazarine rests on a mistake. It should be the 'Santa Dimna', sung in Rome in 1687, of which the libretto is by Giovanni Andrea Lorenzani, while the music is by Flavio Carlo Lanciani (score in the Biblioteca Estense at Modena).

LORENZO FERNÁNDEZ, Oscar (b. Rio de Janeiro, 4 Nov. 1897; d. Rio de Janeiro, 27 Aug. 1948).

Brazilian composer. He studied at the Instituto Nacional de Musica with Braga, Nascimento and Oswald. He graduated in 1922, winning the three first prizes for composition in a national competition. The following year he gave a concert of his own compositions in Rio de Janeiro, and in 1924 won a municipal prize with his 'Trio brasileiro'. In 1925 he was appointed a professor of the Instituto (now the Escola). An orchestral Suite of his was played at the Barcelona Festival of Ibero-American music in 1929. In 1935 Lorenzo Fernández founded the Conservatorio Brasileiro de Musica, which he directed till his death. He represented Brazil at the Bogotá quadricentennial festivals in 1938, and in 1941 was on the committee of the Santiago de Chile quadricentennial music competition. The same year he gave several symphonic and chamber-music concerts of Brazilian music in Buenos Aires, where his own works were very well received. He was a founder-member of the Brazilian Academy of Music, member of the Unión Cultural Universal of Seville, honorary member of the Unión Musical of Panamá, member of the Argentine Association of Chamber Music, of the Faculty of Fine Arts of the University of Chile, academicien of the Academia Nacional de Artes y Letras of Cuba, where he also received the National Order of Merit from the government.

Among his compositions are the opera 'Malazarte' (Teatro Municipal, Rio de Janeiro, 30 Sept. 1931, conducted by himself); the ballet 'Amaya' (1939); two Symphonies; four symphonic poems: 'Imbapara', 'Nau Catarineta', 'Macumba' and 'Maioral'; a 'Batuque' for orchestra (given by Toscanini in U.S.A., Stanford Robinson and Maurice Miles in England); a pianoforte Concerto (1937); a violin Concerto (1942); a wind Quintet; pianoforte Trio; 2 string Quartets; and many pianoforte pieces and songs. N. F.

LORIOD, Yvonne (b. Houilles, Seine-et-Oise, 20 Jan. 1924).

French pianist. She studied at the Paris Conservatoire, where she won no less than six first prizes, for pianoforte playing, harmony, fugue playing, accompaniment, chamber music and musical analysis. She has toured throughout North Africa, America, Spain, France, England, Austria, Switzerland, the Netherlands and other European countries, and has performed with the great orchestras of three continents. She plays a considerable amount of music by living composers, and has given many first performances of works by Schoenberg, Bartók, Messiaen, Jolivet and others. She is a member of the jury of the examinations at the Paris Conservatoire.

LORTZING (Gustav) Albert (b. Berlin, 23 Oct. 1801; d. Berlin, 21 Jan. 1851).

German actor, singer, librettist and composer. The family belonged to Thuringia, and the composer's grandfather was a hide merchant; but his father took to the stage. His mother, Charlotte Sophie Seidel, descended from a French family of emigrants named de La Garde, spoke French fluently and was musically gifted. It was doubtless from her that Albert had his first music-lessons, while his gifts as an actor seem to have come from his father's side. Although the parents kept a leather shop in Berlin during the first eleven years of Albert's life, they belonged to an amateur dramatic society, with which the boy appeared as a child actor. He also studied music for a time with Rungenhagen. But in 1812, the family business being threatened with ruin, the parents decided to take to the stage professionally. They were engaged by the municipal theatre of Breslau for the first six months, the father as a character actor and the mother for light parts in comedy and opera. Their son received his first impressions of great acting from Ludwig Devrient and was able to hear the opera rehearsals conducted by the musical director, Gottlob Benedikt Biercy, Weber's successor. He picked up further musical instruction from reading music and studying on his own, and he learnt the pianoforte and cello; he also began to compose songs, including a setting of Schiller's ballad 'Die Burgschaft'.

After Breslau the family was condemned to a wandering life, with stations at various theatres up and down Germany — Coburg, Bamberg, Freiburg i/B. (with Baden-Baden in the summer), Aachen, Bonn, Cologne, Düsseldorf, Elberfeld, and so on. In his adolescence Albert continued to play youthful parts, especially in Kotzebue's plays, and he developed an agreeable voice that could serve for light tenor and baritone parts. He also began to write odd pieces of incidental music whenever the management of the moment required them. By 1820 he had begun to compose instrumental music not designed for the stage, though that line was not to be pursued by him once the theatre had begun to claim him as a composer. An unpublished Andante with variations for horn and orchestra dates from that year and a lost 'Overtura alla turca' from 1821. In June 1822 followed the first of his only two sacred choral works, a setting for solo voices, chorus and orchestra of a Hymn by Mathisson, the second being the oratorio 'Die Himmelfahrt Jesu Christi', to words by Carl Rosenthal, first performed at Münster on 15 Nov. 1828. They are said to show the simple melodic fertility that characterizes Lortzing's dramatic pieces, but to lack interest in texture.

Meanwhile, on 30 Jan. 1823, Lortzing had married the actress Rosina Regina Ahles at Cologne, having met her during the family's engagement at Düsseldorf. She was nearly two years older than he, but the marriage was a happy one and in time produced no fewer than eleven children, including two pairs of twins, though not all of them survived. In 1824 Lortzing's first opera, 'Ali Pascha von Janina', was written. The engagement at Cologne united him at the same theatre with both his wife and his parents, the four often appearing on the stage together, as for instance in Schlegel's translation of 'Romeo and Juliet' in 1825. But the Lortzings were mainly comedy actors, and Albert, after the first attempt at a sensational subject in 'Ali Pascha', developed into a typical exponent of comic opera.

In 1826 Lortzing and his wife were separated from his parents, having obtained a better engagement at the newly opened court theatre of Detmold, whose company also served Münster and Osnabrück as well as, in the summer, the watering-place of Pyrmont. These four towns remained the young Lortzings' sphere of action until 1832, and it was there that the composer provided incidental music for plays by Hans Sachs, Grabbe, Scribe and others. In addition, he not only acted and sang parts on the stage, but occasionally played the cello in the orchestra. 'Ali Pascha' was at last produced at Münster on 1 Feb. 1828, and in Nov. his oratorio was given there.

In the summer of 1833 Lortzing and his wife were engaged by the municipal theatre of Leipzig, and there they were reunited with his parents, who had been transferred from Cologne. Lortzing made many friends there, especially among his fellow-actors and other artists, but seems to have had little to do with musicians, with the exception of Marschner: Mendelssohn, Schumann and Wagner he knew only casually, though he often appeared with Wagner's sister Rosalie, who was in the same theatre company. He was, after all, still merely a local stage composer and in no sense a celebrity. In 1835, however, he completed the first of his comic operas which fully represents his individual manner and has retained a place in the German operatic repertory: 'Die beiden Schützen' ('The Two Marksmen'). But this was not produced, even at the Leipzig theatre where he was on the spot, until 20 Feb. 1837, for the opera repertory there consisted mainly of translations of French works of the lighter kind, just as that in Berlin, Dresden and elsewhere was still chiefly Italian. The influence of the French opéra-comique style is thus very much more clearly evident in Lortzing's stage works than that of Rossini or Donizetti. But as he approached maturity he began to develop another element of style that is so distinctly Germanic as to confine his operas, for all their many delightful qualities, almost exclusively to the German stage, where they still enjoy great popular favour. As a librettist — for he usually wrote his own books, apparently with some outside help in the matter of versification — he shows a humour that is clean, but often obvious and childish; he creates characters that have life and variety but whose appeal is local; and there is a certain Gemütlichkeit about his plots and situations the enjoyment of which demands a voluntary suspension of criticism and a willingness to be touched by extremely naive sentiments wherever amusement is suspended.

'Die beiden Schützen' began to spread Lortzing's reputation. It was taken up by Berlin, Munich, Prague and other stages, and there was even a French edition, though no performance in France is on record. But his first great success was 'Zar und Zimmermann', like the earlier work based on a French literary model (see Catalogue of Stage Works), a story of Peter the Great working in disguise as a shipwright, operatically treated before Lortzing by Grétry, Weigl and Donizetti. It was produced at Leipzig surprisingly soon after the preceding work — 22 Dec. 1837. But its success was not decisive until Berlin brought it out in 1839, after which 18 German theatres took it up the following year and it soon became, as it still remains, one of the most frequently performed minor operas of the German repertory.

The next three, 'Caramo' (1839), 'Hans Sachs' (1840) and 'Casanova' (1841), have not maintained themselves; but it is curious that the middle work, whose hero is that of Wagner's 'Meistersinger', shows in incident after incident a remarkable resemblance to that later and infinitely greater work, if only because both may have had a common origin in a play by Deinhardtstein. There are even one or two musical similarities: David's motif in Wagner's work appears, for a bar and a half, note for note in Lortzing's opera. The following work (Leipzig, 31 Dec. 1842) was 'Der Wildschütz' ('The Poacher'), in some ways Lortzing's best and certainly the one most likely to succeed outside Germany. The libretto, based on a comedy by Kotzebue, is amusing and well constructed, the character of the elderly schoolmaster is alive, the music is less ready to lapse into sentimentality than in the other works that are still popular, and there is a scene of excellent parody, no doubt aimed at Mendelssohn's 'Antigone' music, where the Countess compels her servants to listen to a reading of Sophocles. It is not musical parody, however, for Lortzing had no gift for that comparable with Sullivan's, though there is at any rate one exceptional instance of it in the mock-Handelian chorus in the third act of 'Tsar and Carpenter'.

Lortzing had in the meantime begun to act as opera producer as well as singer, and in 1843 his long-cherished wish to be appointed conductor was at last fulfilled, thanks to a change of management. But he was too amiable and easy-going to feel comfortable in a commanding position or to enforce obedience, so that in spite of distinct ability he was not altogether successful in either capacity.
